H. R. 7459, by Mr. MORGAN, passed House March 7, Senate May 10, Seventieth Congress. To authorize the appropriation for use by the Secretary of Agriculture of certain funds for wool standards, and for other purposes. The purpose of the bill is to make funds available for carrying on and extending the marketing-research work of the Department of Agriculture with respect to wool, making it possible to emphasize particularly the standardization of wool, so that the work for that commodity will be more comparable to work which has been done for other major commodities, such as fruits and vegetables, dairy products, meats, hay, and so forth. The purpose of the bill is to make possible an extensive educational work, by putting the standard grades into actual use, so that the wool producer can be educated to become familiar with the market value of his clip, which will contribute to the production of higher quality wool, through improvement of flock, and result in greater returns to the producer.

H. R. 8130, by Mr. REED, reported to House April 11, 1928, Seventieth Congress. Authorizing the creation of game refuges on the Ouachita National Forest. The lands now embraced in the Ouachita National Forest were once the home of an abundant supply of game and birds. The creation of game refuges serve as breeding places for wild life and permit restocking.

H. J. Res. 26, by Mr. HAUGEN, passed House April 2, 1928, Seventieth Congress. Authorizing Secretary of Agriculture to dispose of real property located in Hernando County, Fla., known as Brooksville Plant Introduction Garden. In 1911 the Government secured title to this property for the purpose of growing, testing, propagating, and distributing oriental bamboos, and for experimental work in such new crops for the South as found adapted to experimental work as dasheen, tropical yams, chayotes, arrowroot, edible cannas, and various other crop plants. Active work at the plant was discontinued in 1923, and there being no further use for the property, authority was granted the Secretary to dispose of the same.

H. J. Res. 81, by Mr. FULMER, passed House January 16, 1928, Seventieth Congress. For amendment of the act of March 3, 1927, authorizing an annual appropriation to carry out cooperative experiments contemplated by the act. Authorizes appropriation to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with the State of South Carolina Agriculture Experiment Station. Corrects language in the original act, so as to make this work continuing.

H. J. Res. 89, by Mr. HAUGEN, passed March 7, 1928, Seventieth Congress. Authorizes Secretary of Agriculture to dispose of real property in Loudoun and Clarke Counties, Va., no longer required for observatory and laboratory purposes. Authorizes the disposition of property no longer required by the department and costing the United States about $2,000 per year in upkeep.

H. J. Res. 112, passed House January 16, 1928, Seventieth Congress. Amends the act of May 29, 1884, as amended, the act of February 2, 1903, act of March 3, 1905, as amended, to include poultry within their provisions. The acts amended by this resolution provide for investigation as to the existence of contagious diseases of livestock and authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to establish rules and regulations concerning their transportation and empowers quarantine against contagious diseases of livestock. Makes the above acts applicable to poultry.

H. J. Res. 140, by Mr. HAUGEN, passed House March 7, 1928, Seventieth Congress. Amend sections 1 and 2 of the act of March 3, 1891, which provides for the inspection, safe handling, and safe transport of export cattle and amends the same so as to include horses, sheep, goats, and swine.

H. R. 10374, by Mr. WOODRUFF, passed House March 14, 1928, passed Senate May 10, 1928, Seventieth Congress. For the acquisition of lands for an addition to the Beal Nursery at East Tawas, Mich. Provides for additional lands for planting a future timber supply, and as a demonstration of practical forestry. Additional land needed to fill out the program of supplying trees and seeds to plant in the national forest, and fill out the planting program.

S. 1181, by Mr. WOODRUFF, passed House and Senate, Seventieth Congress, and through conference. Authorize appropriation to be expended under the provisions of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams," and so forth, and is designed to create a fiscal policy covering the purposes of the Clarke-McNary Act, which amended the act of March 1, 1911, known as the Weeks Act. Approximately 5,000,000 acres of pine lands are to be secured under the above-mentioned acts, and the bill makes it possible to set up an established policy for obtaining and maintaining such lands to build up artificial reforestation, which is an exceedingly slow program, requiring more than 40 years for completion.

H. J. Res. 200, by Mr. ANDRESEN, passed House April 11, 1928, Seventieth Congress. Amend section 10 of the act entitled "An act to establish the upper Mississippi River wild-life and fish refuge." The bill makes it possible to continue the purchase of acreage to make up the total acreage intended for the refuge. Approximately 85,000 acres remain to be acquired, and the bill makes it possible to secure the additional acreage at higher values than the original bills provided for.

H. R. 10958, by Mr. HAUGEN, Seventieth Congress. To amend the definition of oleomargarine contained in the act entitled "An act defining butter; also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine." The purpose of the amendment is to clarify the language of the act and include fish oils and fats, so as to bring a third class of fat compounds in addition to the two specifically enumerated in the existing law within the definition of oleomargarine, and therefore within the taxing and regulating power of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Markets of the United States in the past few years have been flooded with fat compounds made from coconut oil, imported, and peanut oil, under names and disguised as cooking compounds, but, in fact, are salted, colored, and put up in semblance of butter and often flavored with synthetic-butter flavor. The new definition is sufficiently inclusive to bring about a wholesome and complete protection of the public against the purchase of these compounds as or for butter or oleomargarine. To protect the producer in his legitimate market for his product, and the consumer against the fraudulent sale of a substitute lacking in nutritive value at exorbitant price.

H. J. Res. 215, Public Resolution 25, by Mr. HAUGEN, Seventieth Congress. To authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to accept a gift of certain lands in Clayton County, Iowa, for the purposes of the upper Mississippi River wild life and fish refuge act, Public Resolution 25. Enable the Secretary to accept a gift of 488 acres, which embraces the famous Pikes Peak, an excellent lookout point. It fits in with the upper Mississippi wild life and game refuge act and goes far in accomplishing the aim of a bill introduced by Mr. HAUGEN in 1917 to establish a national park near Prairie du Chien, Wis., and McGregor, Iowa, to provide a suitable park on our Nation's greatest river and set aside a historic and picturesque spot on our greatest river, the Mississippi, the Father of Waters, with its grandeur and scenery to rival that of the Rhine, the Italian lakes, and the fjords of Norway, and properly referred to by many as the Switzerland of America, one of the richest in scenic beauty. Historic Pikes Peak, dominating the landscape, most famous of the Mississippi hills, was the first land seen by white men on the discovery of the upper Mississippi, and overlooked the stirring events which took place about the confluence of the Wisconsin and the Mississippi Rivers in the beginning of our history. It was a favorite vantage point of the Indians and often a battle ground. In 1805 Lieut. Zebulon Pike, the great explorer, shelved his boat on the pebbly shore at the foot of the hill which has since borne his name, climbed to the top, and planted there the first American flag raised in the Northwest.

H. R. 11579, Public, No. 270, by Mr. JONES, Seventieth Congress. Relating to investigation of new uses of cotton. This bill authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce to engage in technical and scientific research in American-grown cotton and its by-products and their present and potential uses, including new and additional commercial and scientific uses for cotton and its by-products, and to diffuse such information among the people of the United States.

S. 2569, Public, No. 178, by Mr. WARREN, Seventieth Congress. Providing for horticultural experiment and demonstration work in the semiarid or dry-land regions of the United States. It will serve a territory of great area in the high plateau and mountainous country which is in great need of shade and ornamental fruit and shelter belt trees, shrubs, vines, and vegetables.

S. 2030, by Mr. COPELAND. Reported to House May 11, 1928, Seventieth Congress. To provide for research into the causes of poultry diseases for feeding experimentation, and for an educational program to show the best means of preventing disease in poultry. It is the intention of the bill, that an extensive investigation should be made into the causes of influenza, infectious bronchitis, white diarrhea, and other diseases of poultry from which great losses occur to the producers each year.

S. 3194, Public, No. 304, by Mr. COLTON, Seventieth Congress. To establish the Bear River migratory bird refuge. Authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to construct at Bear River Bay dikes, ditches, spillways, etc., for the establishment of suitable refuge and feeding and breeding grounds for migratory wild fowl. The river marshes, extending about Bear River, comprise the greatest area of this character in the Rocky Mountains, and form the gathering place for millions of wild fowl, such as ducks and geese during the north and south migrations. During each breeding season vast numbers of wild fowl rear their young in this area. Due to diversion of water for irrigation purposes the shallow waters in many parts of these marshes, during summer and fall of each year, become concentrated solutions of alkali resulting in myriads of fowl being poisoned and perish in enormous numbers. The construction of dikes, ditches, etc., will stop this loss.

H. J. Res. 237, by Mr. BUCHANAN, Seventieth Congress, passed House and Senate May 12, 1928. To provide for eradication of the pink bollworm and authorizing appropriation therefor. Makes money available to eradicate the pink bollworm, a very serious pest to cotton growth, ranking with the boll weevil in damage.

S. 757, passed House May 8, passed Senate March 14, 1928. To extend the benefits of certain acts of Congress to the Territory of Hawaii. Provides that future annual appropriations made to carry out the provisions of certain acts to establish and endow agricultural experiment stations provide for the participation of Hawaii in the benefits of such acts.

H. R. 12632, by Mr. PURNELL, passed House April 11, passed Senate April 24, 1928. To provide for the eradication or control of the European corn borer. Authorizes appropriations to continue the work started last year for the eradication of the European corn borer, considered a serious pest and menace to the Corn Belt of the United States.

H. R. 12878, by Mr. WOODRUFF, reported to House April 21, 1928. To insure adequate supplies of timber and other forest products for the people of the United States, to promote full use for timber growing and other purposes of forest lands in the United States, including farm wood lots and those abandoned areas not suitable for agricultural production, and to secure the correlation and the most economical conduct of forest research in the Department of Agriculture. It will develop methods of utilization of waste matters from our pulp mills and plants, which have polluted our streams and destroyed our fish. It will make it possible for the country to use in a better way that vast section of our country which we call the forest area, and which comprises more square miles than do the lands now devoted to agriculture.

H. R. 13646, by Mr. VINSON of Kentucky, reported to House May 11, 1928, Seventieth Congress. For the prevention and removal of obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in cotton by regulating transactions on cotton futures exchanges, and so forth. Transactions in cotton involving the sale thereof for future delivery as contracted on cotton exchanges are affected with a national public interest. Such transactions are carried on in large volumes by the public generally and by persons engaged in the business of buying and selling cotton in interstate commerce, and the prices of such transactions are generally quoted and disseminated throughout the United States and in foreign countries as the basis of determining the price to the producer and consumer of cotton, and the transactions on such cotton exchanges are extremely subject to speculation, manipulation, and control, and that sudden and unreasonable fluctuations in the prices thereof often occur as the result of such speculation, manipulation, and control, and the fluctuations are an obstruction to and a burden upon interstate commerce in cotton, and the bill removes and prevents such practices.

S. 3555, by Mr. HAUGEN, passed Senate April 9, passed House May 3, 1928, Seventieth Congress, sent to conference May 4, and conference report agreed to in House on May 14. Establishes a Federal Farm Board to aid in the orderly marketing, and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce. The bill is similar in principle to the farm relief bill passed in the last session of the Congress, and the aim of the bill is to enable the farmer to market his commodities in his own way, at an American price level, and to afford him the benefit of a system which is the equivalent of the numerous protective laws that have been enacted, such as that restricting immigration, the Federal reserve act, and tariff acts, the Adamson Act, and many others. To give the farmer the benefit of the protective laws already established to make them effective to the farmer, as they are generally made effective to organized industry and labor.

To make the protective laws effective to the farmers as they are generally made effective to organized industry. For instance, the tariff is made effective to organized industry by pooling the whole production, by selling a portion of the product at the American price level, the world price plus the tariff and other expenses incident to importation of the foreign commodity, and to sell in the world market at the highest net price obtainable, and to equalize the price and pay the producer the equalized price, thus materially advancing the average price to every producer.

To create and finance a marketing board, and vest it with power to withhold or collect an equalization fee in an amount sufficient to equalize the price and the cost of marketing, so that each producer may contribute his ratable share of the cost of marketing and receive his proportionate share of the profits from marketing, so that the producer may have the opportunity to sell on the domestic market at the American price level, and to sell on the foreign market at the highest net obtainable price, and in this way materially advance the average price to each producer, and to wrest from exporters and operators on exchanges the power which they exercise in the manipulation of prices and the doctoring of grades, and thus reestablish the foreign market for agricultural commodities which was destroyed through the practice of manipulation of prices, doctoring of grades, and mixing of grain with dirt, screenings, and rubbish and selling it at grain prices. To mete out justice to agriculture and promote prosperity not only to agriculture but to all other citizens, and to do, as was requested by representatives of labor appearing before the committee, pleading with the committee, to report out legislation that might restore the purchasing power of the farmer, so that they might go back to work, and, as stated by Mr. Wallace, of the American Federation of Labor:

> The farmers are our customers; when they have no money we can not work. We are the farmers' customers. Hence I think it is to the interest of all the workers. I can not see any hope for improvement except the farmers can buy. Those are the people on whom we depend. What does it profit us if we can get meat for 10 cents a pound, if we haven't the 10 cents?

To relieve the depressed condition in agriculture. To do for the farmers what was done for others by the enactment of the Federal reserve act, the railroad act, the Adamson law, the restricted immigration act, and the many acts extending aid, assistance, and relief to numerous other activities; to afford the farmer the advantages, aid, and opportunities extended to others. In short, a fair and square deal to all; nothing more, nothing less.

RESTRICTIONS IN LANDS OF CERTAIN MEMBERS OF THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 4448) to amend section 4 of the act entitled "An act to extend the period of restrictions in lands of certain members of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes, approved May 10, 1928.

The Clerk reported the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McKEOWN. I object.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 46, relating to Muscle Shoals, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether that is in order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is quite within his rights. It is not a usual procedure, but a perfectly parliamentary procedure. It is seldom that the House has made such a request, but it has frequently been done in the Senate. If the Chair will indulge me, so far as I have been able to ascertain, the practice began in the Senate in the passage of the Dingley revenue bill in 1897. Following that it was the practice on revenue bills for many years. The present occupant of the chair I am sure will remember that what became known as the Payne-Aldrich bill, to the making of which he contributed so great a part, passed the Senate, and immediately on its passage the Senate moved to insist on its amendments and ask for a conference. So the gentleman from Pennsylvania is quite within his parliamentary rights in making the motion. As I say, it has frequently happened in the Senate, but not very frequently on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. It occurs to the Chair that it is rather lacking in courtesy to the Senate. The Chair does not remember of its being done in the House since he has been a Member of the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think it has occurred several times in the House, and frequently in the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to see any particular advantage there would be in it—it might save possibly a day. It seems to the Chair that it is a little short of improper. The fact that it has been done in the Senate is no reason why it should be done in the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is not without precedent. The parliamentary situation created is that upon a conference report the other body would have to act before the House acts. That is the parliamentary situation it creates.

The SPEAKER. There is no disagreement yet between the House and the Senate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The House is proposing to make it.

The SPEAKER. It depends upon whether the Senate may or may not agree to the House amendment. It is assuming that by no possibility can the Senate agree to the House amendment, and the Chair does not know that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I simply repeat that it is not unprecedented.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would prefer not to recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make that motion.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it for the time being.

Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 13446, a bill to amend the national defense act, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up the bill (H. R. 13446) to amend the national defense act, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act for the promotion of rifle practice throughout the United States," approved February 14, 1927 (44 Stat. 1095), which adds an additional paragraph to section 113 of the national defense act, is hereby amended to read as follows: "That there shall be held an annual competition, known as the national matches, for the purpose of competing for a national trophy, medals, and other prizes to be provided, together with a small-arms firing school, which competition and school shall be held annually under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War."

SEC. 2. The national matches contemplated in this act shall consist of rifle and pistol matches for the national trophy, medals, and other prizes mentioned in section 1 above, to be open to the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, National Guard, or Organized Militia of the several States, Territories, and District of Columbia, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the citizens' military training camps, rifle clubs, and civilians, together with a small-arms firing school to be connected therewith and competitions for which trophies and medals are provided by the National Rifle Association of America; and for the cost and expenditures required for and incident to the conduct of the same, including the personal expenses of the members of the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice, the sum necessary for the above-named purposes is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually as a part of the total sum appropriated for national defense: Provided, That no competitor shall be entitled to commutation of rations in excess of $1.50 per day, and when meals are furnished no greater expenses than that sum per man per day for the period the contest is in progress: Provided further, That in lieu of traveling expense and commutation of rations while traveling the sum of 5 cents per mile may be paid to civilian competitors, and such travel pay for the return trip may be paid in advance of the performance of the travel.

SEC. 3. For the incidental expenses of the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice, including books, pamphlets, badges, trophies, prizes, and medals to be expended for such purposes, the sum of not more than $7,500 is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes on Saturday next after the completion of the special orders heretofore granted.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from California asks unanimous consent to address the House on Saturday morning next for 30 minutes after the completion of the special orders heretofore agreed to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PHILIPPINE CONSTABULARY

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 3463) to recognize commissioned service in the Philippine Constabulary in determining rights of officers of the Regular Army, on the Union Calendar, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the bill S. 3463, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in determining the pay period and rights of retirement in the case of officers of the Regular Army, active duty performed as an officer of the Philippine Constabulary shall be credited to the same extent as service under a Regular Army commission or other active duty recognized under the provisions of section 127a of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MORIN. Certainly.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is the gentleman going to call up the Wainwright bill?

Mr. MORIN. No; we are not going to call up the Wainwright bill to-day.

ADDRESS OF HON. CORDELL HULL

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an address made by my colleague Hon. CORDELL HULL over the radio last evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks I include the following address:

POLITICAL ISSUES OF 1928

The Nation will be governed during the next four years by either the Democratic or the Republican Party. The Democratic Party tenders its services this year with a reaffirmation of its original creed and the promulgation of a broad program of truly national issues. The claims of the Republican Party, in control of all branches of the Government since 1920, must rest upon its official record of omission and commission during this period. Each political party has a creed and serves the Nation by applying that creed to new and changing problems and conditions. The Democratic Party draws its inspiration and derives its principles from the philosophy of Thomas Jefferson. They lie at the base of popular government, here and everywhere. Lincoln said: "The principles of Jefferson are the definitions and axioms of free society, and it is no child's play to save them from complete overthrow in this Nation." The course of the Democratic Party was originally charted on lines broad enough, foundations deep enough, and structure sound enough for all time. Its ancient doctrine of equal rights will be as pertinent centuries hence as it is to-day.

Since the death of Lincoln the creed of the Republican Party has been bottomed on the doctrines of Alexander Hamilton—doctrines which that party dares not openly profess, but consistently practices every day in the year. The Jefferson philosophy was but slightly conceived until he gave it full development in the Declaration of Independence, the bill of rights, and his first inaugural address. The opposing philosophies of Jefferson and Hamilton, however, have been at war in some form since the days of the Athenian commonwealth. No finer opportunity to judge the effects of their practical operation is to be found than by contrasting the political, moral, and official standards and achievements of the recent Wilson administration of eight years with those of the subsequent administrations of Harding and Coolidge.

The first and outstanding problem of the American people, therefore, is to make a vigorous and searching reexamination into the manner in which representative government has functioned in this country during these two eight-year periods of most recent rule by the respective political parties, and by their votes in November decide definitely whether the ideas of Hamilton or those of Jefferson shall guide the future course of this Republic. If the people are not to be deceived or misled in the course of this inquiry and appraisal, they must look to the practices of the political parties when in power rather than to their professions, to performance rather than promise.

The end of eight years of Republican leadership and rule finds the American people less attentive to governmental duties and tasks than at any time in the Nation's history. There is a hopeless confusion about fundamentals. The spirit of our institutions—the spirit of America—is at its lowest ebb. Extreme political and moral debasement and a hopeless decline of official standards are the distinguishing characteristics of the Republican administrations since 1920. The Government has been in the deadly clutches of a commercialized political system, the success of which involved bribery extending from the administrative officials at Washington back to the wholesale corruption of State electorates. Corruption seems to have become essential to the government of the Nation by the dominant leaders of the Republican Party, who have not only tolerated such corruption but denounced those seeking to expose it. The inescapable issue of whether morals have lost their power with the people is thus presented to every voter by the Harding and Coolidge administrations. This slimy trail of prostitution since 1920 has been the inevitable result of government by class—a class that furnished tens of millions for the wholesale debauchery of both voters and high officials in return for vast governmental favors and special advantages. They alone are the governing class under the single doctrine of sordid materialism, which is rooted in selfishness and wholly repugnant to the original ideas on which the Government was founded. Human rights, human welfare, national character, high ideals, morals, and Christian vitality, on which alone freedom and civilization can securely rest, have been viewed with purely minor consideration by those in charge of the Government since 1920. These indispensable doctrines and policies were of the essence of the recent Wilson administration in both profession and practice.

The shameless Republican record of the past eight years has thus been a disgrace and a menace to popular government, whereas the marvelous achievements of the Democratic administrations during the like preceding period will stand out in history like mountain peaks for the next 250 years. A relatively few persons of large pecuniary interests, who are primarily interested in building up their fortunes and families, have constituted the directing force of the Republican Party and the Government since 1920. Their controlling thought is to buy elections and then shape legislation and government so as to favor their private interests. They never visualize the broad and fundamental principles of popular government. They have for some years been able to deceive the people by the wholesale circulation of myths and other misleading propaganda.

They divert attention from their unspeakable record by shouting such myths as Coolidge economy, debt reduction, protection to American labor, and prosperity. They well know that Democratic economic policies would insure sounder and wider prosperity. They boldly controvert in practice the Democratic view that while prosperity in itself is excellent, honesty and morals are better things than prosperity. They brazenly assume credit for total public debt reduction of $8,084,000,000 to July 1, 1927, although they know that the Wilson administration supplied either the money or the cash assets with which to effect $6,332,000,000 of this total reduction. They know that their claim of economy in reducing public expenditures is a bogus and concocted one in the light of the official figures, which, excluding postal expenditures, show a total of $3,677,000,000 for 1923, and virtually the same level of $3,626,000,000 for 1928, comprising the past six-year period. They know that more than 75 per cent of American labor is engaged in industries not sheltered by tariffs and receives far higher wages than that in tariff-protected industries, such as the textiles, and yet they constantly reiterate the monstrous libel that ultra-high tariffs are responsible for those high living standards and high wages in the automobile and other industries not protected.

More of the great Jeffersonian doctrines of liberalism are challenged to-day than in Jefferson's own time. The very creed itself is flouted, undermined, and put in issue. The insolent forces of corruption and governmental favoritism tender Democrats such acute individual issues in addition as the following: Corruption in politics and in government, justice to agriculture, the unchecked growth of paternalism and bureaucracy, the loss of all vision and high ideals, the lack of basic policies, suppression of crime, a modernized tariff and trade policy, indefinite presidential tenure, the collapse of foreign policy, restoration of rule by the people, the bold attempt to conduct popular government on the single doctrine of sordid materialism, and general administrative reform.

The Democratic Party this year should resolutely enter upon a great crusade for the political, moral, and spiritual regeneration of the Nation, for the rebirth, revival, and restoration of those fine concepts, aims, and ideals so vital to the permanency of this great democratic Republic. Then will the people rise up and exclaim with the prophet of old: "Let justice roll down like waters, and righteousness like a mighty river."

RETIREMENT OF LICENSED ENGINEERS, ARMY TRANSPORT SERVICE

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 10478) providing retirement for persons who hold licenses as navigators or engineers who have reached the age of 64 years and who have served 25 or more years on seagoing vessels of the Army Transport Service, on the Union Calendar, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up the bill H. R. 10478, on the Union Calendar, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter licensed officers of the Army Transport Service who have reached the age of 64 years and who have served 25 years or more on Army transports, who have become physically unfit for service in line of duty, shall be retired.

SEC. 2. Those persons retired as specified in section 1 of this act shall receive compensation equal to three-fourths of the average annual pay received for the past five years of service: Provided, That such retirement pay shall not include any amount on account of subsistence or other allowance.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WAINWRIGHT-M'SWAIN BILL

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, it is evident that several gentlemen did not hear the announcement made by the chairman of the committee with respect to the Wainwright-McSwain bill a short time ago. This is a very controversial subject, and it will be called up this afternoon by the chairman.

HEADSTONES OVER GRAVES OF SOLDIERS WHO SERVED IN CONFEDERATE ARMY

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 10304) authorizing the Secretary of War to erect headstones over the graves of soldiers who served in the Confederate Army and to direct him to preserve in the records of the War Department the names and places of burial of all soldiers for whom such headstones shall have been erected, and for other purposes, on the Union Calendar, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the bill H. R. 10304, on the Union Calendar, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized to erect headstones over the graves of soldiers who served in the Confederate Army and who have been buried in national, city, town, or village cemeteries or in any other places, each grave to be marked with a small headstone or block which shall be of durable stone and of such design and weight as shall keep it in place when set and shall bear the name of the soldier and the name of his State inscribed thereon when the same are known. The Secretary of War shall cause to be preserved in the records of the War Department the name, rank, company, regiment, and date of death of the soldier and his State; if these are unknown it shall be so recorded.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS AT BATH, N. Y.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12953) to authorize the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to accept title to the State camp for veterans at Bath, N. Y., and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up the bill H. R. 12953, on the Union Calendar, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, when directed by the President, is authorized to accept on behalf of the United States, free from all encumbrances and without cost to the United States, title in fee simple to the land, including buildings and structures, constituting the camp for veterans at Bath, N. Y. Upon acceptance of such land by such board of managers, such land, buildings, and structures shall become a branch home of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that attached to this home is a cemetery, and there is a separate bill for the Government to take over the cemetery. The cemetery bill was on the Consent Calendar the other day and was objected to for the reason that I did not believe it would be good to establish a precedent for the Federal Government to take over small State cemeteries. Inasmuch as this cemetery is connected with the home, I would suggest to the committee to take the bill with the cemetery and make it section 2 of this bill. That would not establish a dangerous precedent.

Mr. STALKER. That would be satisfactory to me. Mr. Speaker, I offer as section 2 of the bill H. R. 12953 a provision derived from a portion of the bill H. R. 7464.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STALKER offers an amendment at the end of the bill, to be inserted as a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to accept a conveyance, free of cost to the United States but subject otherwise to the provisions of section 355 of the Revised Statutes, of the cemetery at the New York State Camp for Veterans, containing approximately 20 acres, and located near Bath, State of New York, to be maintained as a national cemetery."

Mr. STALKER. I have eliminated the last proviso.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, this measure ought not to be passed without the attention of the House being called to a situation involved. Members of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation have since the opening of the session sought to secure from the Committee on Military Affairs some joint consideration of the problem concerned.

Recently when a bill was presented relating to hospital construction, from the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, it proved impossible to secure consideration unless a section was taken out, which would have resulted in some action on this problem. As a result, I introduced as a separate bill the section in question. One on the same subject had early in the session been introduced by the chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. Both bills went to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I was informed that the matter had been referred to a subcommittee, but this subcommittee has not yet given the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. JAMES. I may say to the gentleman that our committee has had no request from the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation on that or any other bill.

Mr. LUCE. I fear the gentleman is mistaken. Unless my recollection deceives me, I addressed a letter to the chairman of the committee asking for a hearing on the matter. I am talking about the result of the elimination of a section of the hospital bill that came from the World War Veterans' Committee. Whether what the gentleman says is correct or not, I ask the committee now to face this question.

This hospital at Bath, which it is proposed to take over, at one time housed 2,000 veterans of the Civil War. It now contains less than 200. Yet it is proposed by this bill to turn this hospital over to the Managers of the Soldiers' Homes.

Mr. STALKER. A representative of General Wood visited the home and approved of the buildings and grounds and specifically said they did have need of those buildings.

Mr. LUCE. The figures of occupancy of the soldiers' homes would not, in my opinion, justify that statement. I am not saying a word against taking over this home, but urge its need by the Veterans' Bureau for the treatment of veterans of the World War. It is not needed at the moment for the mere housing of veterans.

Mr. STALKER. There is a hospital there which at all times will be available for the World War veterans.

Mr. LUCE. That is just the hospital that we want to get.

Mr. STALKER. It will be available to them when this bill is passed.

Mr. LUCE. There are already at least two hospitals practically full of veterans of the World War which are under the control of the Managers of the Soldiers' Homes. Here it is proposed to put in charge of these managers another hospital, one that ought to be under the control of the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. STALKER. The Veterans' Bureau were not disposed to take it over, whereas the Managers of the Soldiers' Homes did desire to take it over. It has the approval of the Budget Bureau.

Mr. LUCE. I am familiar with those circumstances. The gentleman submits to me nothing new. The point is that there is at this soldiers' home a hospital which very quickly could be made to accommodate 400 neuropsychiatric veterans of the Veterans' Bureau.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. LUCE. May I have three minutes more?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCE. This hospital is needed because there is in western New York and western Pennsylvania no Veterans' Bureau neuropsychiatric hospital. It would be a convenience to a considerable number of patients and their relatives or friends as well as an economy to the Government if the hospital might at once be taken over by the Veterans' Bureau.

I did not rise to object to the bill but to represent the desirability of some speedy cooperation between two committees of the House whose jurisdiction in some measure overlaps, in order to study amicably and effectively the problem which the steady decrease of veterans of the Civil War brings to us. That problem demands a speedy solution. I am not here asking that the present management of the homes be abolished. What the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation desires at once is that the hospitals of the soldiers' homes be put under the command and in the control of the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. STALKER. But the gentleman will agree that the hospital is available for the veterans of the World War.

Mr. LUCE. It is an unfortunate situation when a hospital occupied by veterans of the World War is under the control of the trustees of the soldiers' homes and not completely under the control of the Veterans' Bureau, as it should be. That does not work for efficiency, for economy, or for the convenience of all concerned.

This matter demands attention, and I am taking the floor simply to impress, if I can, upon gentlemen of the Military Affairs Committee the desirability of paying heed to the request of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation that their views in this matter may be considered.

Mr. STALKER. If the gentleman will permit, General Hines did not request that this hospital be taken over for the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. LUCE. I am quite aware of that fact, but the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation has a right to an opinion of its own.

Mr. STALKER. That is very true.

Mr. LUCE. It enacts the legislation for these matters and it has the duty, which it tries to perform, of studying the hospital situation throughout the country.

Mr. STALKER. My correspondence with the Veterans' Bureau shows that they have many empty beds and do not need it at this time.

Mr. LUCE. Then the gentleman has greatly misinterpreted what they have said if he has understood that there is not a lack of beds for neuropsychiatric patients. The fact is that there is a crying need for more of such beds. We have just passed through this House a bill appropriating $15,000,000, nearly all of which is for the purpose of providing beds of this sort, and sharp complaint is made because, in the belief of many veterans themselves, we have not provided for enough such beds. Although we ourselves feel the immediate need will be met by the provision we are making, it is a need sure to grow and there is sure to be use for such additional facilities as the Bath hospital offers.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. STALKER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The bill H. R. 7464 was laid on the table.

INDEBTEDNESS DUE THE UNITED STATES FROM ENLISTED MEN

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate bill 1829, to authorize the collection, in monthly installments, of indebtedness due the United States from enlisted men, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up Senate bill 1829 and asks unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, when it has been administratively ascertained that an enlisted man of the Army is indebted to the United States or any of its instrumentalities, the amount of such indebtedness may be collected in monthly installments by deduction from his pay on current pay rolls: Provided, That the aggregate sum of such deductions for any month shall not exceed two-thirds of the soldier's rate of pay for that month: And provided further, That whenever any part of the pay of a soldier for a certain month shall have been legally forfeited by sentence of court-martial, or otherwise legally authorized to be withheld, then no deduction under this act shall be so applied as to reduce the actual pay received by the soldier for that month below one-third of his authorized rate of pay therefor: And provided further, That the Secretary of War, under such regulations as he shall prescribe, may cause to be remitted and canceled, upon honorable discharge of the enlisted man from the service, any such indebtedness incurred during the current enlistment and remaining unpaid at the time of discharge: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent collections of such indebtedness on final statements from pay, in the proportions hereinbefore indicated, or from clothing-allowance savings.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

READJUSTMENT OF PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF THE COMMISSIONED AND ENLISTED PERSONNEL OF THE ARMY, NAVY, MARINE CORPS, COAST GUARD, COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY, AND PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up H. R. 12110, to amend the act entitled "An act to readjust the pay and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service," approved June 10, 1922, as amended, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up H. R. 12110 and asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to readjust the pay and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service," approved June 10, 1922, as amended, is hereby further amended by striking out in paragraph 5 of section 1 of said act, relating to the pay of the fourth period, the following words appearing in lines 11, 12, and 13 of said paragraph (vol. 42, Stat. L. 626): "except those whose promotion is limited by law to this grade and who are not entitled under existing law to the pay and allowances of a higher grade."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PERCENTAGES OF ENLISTED MEN OF THE ARMY IN THE SIXTH AND SEVENTH GRADES

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up H. R. 13250 to authorize the Secretary of War to fix the percentages of enlisted men of the Army in the sixth and seventh grades, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up H. R. 13250, and asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to comment very briefly upon this bill. While I am in favor of the bill and think it will greatly encourage enlisted men to continue their service in the Army, yet I do not think it will entirely correct the evil of desertion that prevails in the Army. I think it is quite a reflection upon the American Army that from 8 to 12 per cent of its enlisted personnel has deserted every year since 1920.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and to include therein a statement prepared by a very responsible citizen of the State of Maryland, Mr. R. H. Phillips, in connection with this matter of desertions in the Army.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I am printing in this connection a statement made by Mr. R. H. Phillips, of Kensington, Md., in connection with the subject of desertions from the United States Army.

This statement shows very emphatically how at least one American citizen is impressed by the large percentage of desertions from the Army. Personally I think it is a crying shame and little short of a disgrace. The military profession is old and honorable, and there must be something fundamentally wrong when about 10 per cent of the rank and file of the soldiers desert annually.

Young men do not desert from their schools nor from their business positions. On the contrary, young men are earnestly seeking to get into schools and to obtain business positions. The Army ought to be put on such a plan that young men would seek of their own notion to enlist in the Army, just as they are constantly seeking to obtain civil-service appointments. They should go into the Army with the purpose and intention of making it a life business, just as the officers do. Of course, there will be many cases where the individuals will find themselves unfitted for the service and will find the service unfitted for them; but they certainly should be able to endure the conditions for two or three years rather than place a stigma upon their good names for life.

This subject deserves the most earnest and serious consideration of the responsible officers in the War Department and should enlist the attention of Members of Congress directly charged with the responsibility of national defense.

STATEMENT BY R. H. PHILLIPS, KENSINGTON, MD.

Thousands of young men are enlisted as privates in the Regular Army of the United States. The recruiting sergeants deceive them as to the actual conditions of Army life and service. Within a few months after they sign the muster rolls of the Army hundreds of these young men, dissatisfied with Army life, quit the service, are entered on the roll as "absent without leave," and become thenceforth outlaws, outcasts, renegades, and termed "deserters," who dare not return to their homes or communicate with kindred, or associate with anyone who ever knew them for fear of capture and being compelled to endure tyrannical and despotic penalties for quitting the service in time of peace and public order. Such outcasts speedily become criminals due to environment as outcast and outlaw. And thus are recruited the criminal classes of America, who soon become expert in every variety of lawlessness.

Is it not reasonable to regulate a military administration of the Government that permits such hideous mistreatment of youngsters who leave country homes and drift into cities seeking employment, and are deceived into entering military service in time of peace, and simply quit because they don't like the job, as it is a universal idea in this free Republic instilled in childhood that if a man dislikes a job he may quit at will?

If the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, performed his simple, practical, plain duty instead of having his time occupied in making the White House a rendezvous of curiosity seekers and camera exploiters, and conducted the administration of the American Government in a plain and practical way, he would see that a discharge order would be entered on muster rolls of the Army for all youngsters who are absent without leave after absence from the service a week or 10 days.

The American people believed after the armistice at the end of the Great War that there would be a severe reduction of military activities, extravagances, and standing-army personnel, at least such reduction as was provided for in 1876, a few years after the close of the Civil War, when the entire standing army was reduced to 25,000 enlisted men, even when there was a vast area west of the Mississippi occupied by warlike Indians, requiring many military posts and stations on the Indian frontiers.

At present America is at peace with the world, and yet keeps on the pay rolls about 12,000 idlers and unemployed, with commissions as officers in the Regular Army, and is maintaining at an expenditure of nearly $400,000,000 per annum a standing army of practically 120,000 privates. Such a standing army is a disgrace in time of peace to American principles and traditions, but if such an extravagance is to be tolerated, there should be no such inhuman, despicable, and tyrannical treatment of youngsters who quit Regular Army service and are forced to concealment among American citizens, to become renegades and refugees.

If Congress in its wisdom would require the Regular Army to be employed in useful work in time of peace, as building roads or docks, as was done in days of Rome, Americans would not suffer such disreputable Army conditions.

The founders of the Government established a strict provision to regulate Army appropriations that they be limited to two years' duration. This seems to require that Army commissions should expire by strict limitation two years from date. If this were followed, the pruning knife would be applied to the personnel of the Army at two-year intervals, with the result of great benefit to the taxpayer and proper Army administration.

NEW YORK, N. Y., May 19, 1928.

SIR: I have read your report on new uniforms for the Army. If the committee wants to diminish the number of desertions they should pass laws stopping the few unscrupulous Army officers from hounding men and having them court-martialed on fake charges and have the recruiting service tell the truth about Army life. On the Bowery of this city there is a recruiting office in a labor agent's office. The said labor agent has been robbing all the laborers he sends to positions, and by having the recruiting office there it will stop enlistments at that place.

I am on the pension roll under certificate No. 1466453. Served in the Volunteer Army 1898–99, Regulars 1901 to 1915.

I remain, very sincerely,

Hon. JOHN J. MCSWAIN, M. C.,
Capitol Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MCSWAIN: I was very much interested in reading two articles or summaries of an address delivered by you either to Congress or before the committee. This was with reference to vocational schools for enlisted men in the Army.

For your information, the writer is a native of Orangeburg County, S. C., and a graduate of the high school at Charleston. For 10 years he resided at Cheyenne, Wyo., where Fort D. A. Russell is located, and where you had in mind the location of such an institution. I have no interest in the matter whatever, except from the standpoint of good citizenship, but I want to say to you that your thoughts and suggestions express my sentiments exactly. I have thought along these lines for several years, especially when I was secretary of the chamber of commerce at Cheyenne, and observed the enlisted men closely, noting particularly that the majority of them had no ambitions or aspirations except to "soldier" because their future did not seem bright. For that reason I was well pleased when the much-maligned Josephus Daniels, as Secretary of the Navy, made it possible for the sailors either to learn a vocation or become ensigns or naval officers.

I trust that you will become successful in your efforts and that you will have the cooperation of all branches of the Government in your laudable undertaking.

Very sincerely yours,

S. S. PEARLSTINE.

LETTER FROM A REAL SOLDIER

APRIL 6, 1928.

Hon. J. J. MCSWAIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CAPTAIN MCSWAIN: Your letter and the copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing your bill and remarks on same was received some time ago. I read your bill and remarks very carefully, and it is my opinion that if such an institution could be established it would be the very best thing that has ever been done for the Army.

The establishment of such an institution would stimulate enlistments wonderfully, and we would get more recruits from the better classes; that is, more youngsters just out of high school would enlist with a view to fitting themselves for commissions in the service. As things are now in the service, I can not and would not advise any youngster to enlist who is a graduate of a high school or has a future of any kind assured him. An ambitious youngster can do much better and go farther in civil life.

Of course, your proposed bill, creating a school for young soldiers to prepare themselves for commissions, will not be of any material benefit to myself or the other old-timers in the service, but as we all love the service (or we wouldn't be here) and are interested in everything that is for its betterment, we say "more power to you," and may the Lord hasten the day when such an institution will be in operation.

I was in hopes that Congress would see fit to pass some sort of bill at this session for the relief of we old-timers who were commissioned during the war and are still struggling along in the enlisted grades, but it seems that nothing of the sort is going to occur. Don't get the idea that we blame our Congressmen entirely for this failure to pass such legislation. We know that the most of the blame belongs with our General Staff, who have opposed this session the following measures that would have meant some relief: A bill reducing the retirement to 25 years. A bill increasing the allowance of enlisted men on the retired list. And they have continually opposed every proposed measure to make us warrant officers, but supported the bill making all civilian field clerks warrant officers! Can you beat that? Thanking you for the interest you have displayed in my affairs and for answering my letters and wishing you success in all of your undertakings, and especially in your efforts to improve the service by establishing a school for enlisted men to prepare themselves for commissions.

Sincerely yours,

——— ———.

LETTER FROM A GENTLEMAN IN SOUTH CAROLINA

MARCH 20, 1928.

Hon. JOHN J. MCSWAIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have a son who at an early age manifested a very intense desire to become an Army officer. He was so anxious that at the age of 17 he joined the Army with my consent, and it had been reported to him by the recruiting officer that he would be sent to a military school and would stand a chance to go to West Point.

After enlisting, the chances to go to West Point soon began to appear very remote, and everything else was very different from what was reported to him and to me, as to the kind of education he could get. Falling sick and spending a good part of his time in the hospital, he became very much dissatisfied and finally I sacrificed and raised the money to enable him to buy his discharge. That was all very unpleasant to me, as well as a financial burden, because he does not spring from a line of "quitters."

After he served one year at Fort Humphreys, Va., and obtained an honorable discharge, he went to school one year at the Porter Military Academy at Charleston and was coached for three months preparatory to his contesting for a scholarship to the Citadel at Charleston. He was unsuccessful in his efforts to obtain a scholarship, and due to my financial situation as a farmer he has had no chance to complete his education elsewhere.

He is now working in the daytime in Charleston and taking a night course at the College of Charleston.

Now, what I want to ask you is, Can you so amend your bill (H. R. 12042) that a boy such as my son can enter the Army school you proposed in your bill? My son is still very anxious to finish his military education and to become an officer in the Army. But if he has to enlist again and serve two years in the Army, he would then be over 25 years old.

If you could not do this to your bill, can you suggest some other way whereby my boy may obtain an education and a commission in the Army?

It seems he will never be satisfied out of the Army, and I believe that he would make good if he could just get in on some such footing as the other young men had. It doesn't seem fair for some boys to have so many chances in the world and my boy, who has been so anxious to be an Army officer, and has worked so hard to get an education, and is still so anxious to do everything in his power, should be denied this greatest desire of his heart.

Please let me hear from you at your earliest convenience.

Yours respectfully,

———— ————.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the aggregate authorized number of enlisted men of the Regular Army, including the Philippine Scouts, in the sixth and seventh grades shall be as now or hereafter prescribed by law, and shall be distributed between such grades in such proportions as the Secretary of War may, from time to time, direct, and within the limits so fixed enlisted men may, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, be transferred from the seventh grade to the sixth grade, and vice versa, upon recommendation of organization commanders.

SEC. 2. This act shall be effective July 1, 1928, and all laws and parts of laws, in so far as they are inconsistent with this act, are hereby repealed as of that date.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "grades," strike out the words "shall be as now or hereafter prescribed by law, and."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, in view of the observations of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN], and inasmuch as this is a fairly important bill affecting the enlisted men of the Army, I think a word of explanation from me as its introducer may be necessary.

We are hearing a great deal about measures to be taken to benefit the commissioned personnel of the Army and to relieve the congestion in promotion and to do away with the evils growing out of what is termed "the World War hump." This bill deals not with the commissioned personnel of the Army but with the enlisted men and is intended to benefit their prospects and to benefit their condition.

This bill provides that the present limit of 25 per cent of enlisted men in the sixth grade—the sixth grade being those who receive $30 a month—shall be removed so that the President may increase this number. This will mean that a considerably greater proportion of the enlisted men of the Army will be receiving $30 rather than the present basic pay of $21. It will mean that an enlisted man will have the prospect of being raised from the $21 class to the $30 class at a very much earlier period in his enlistment. It is intended, and undoubtedly will, do a great deal to encourage good service, to encourage men to stay in the Army, and to recruit a better class of men, because the prospect can be offered to them that very shortly after they have entered the service, just as they do in the Navy, they can be raised from the $21 class to the $30 class.

This bill is one of the recommendations of the so-called General Personnel Board that was appointed at the request of the Military Affairs Committee a year ago to consider the whole question of promotion and retirement in the Army. This board of distinguished generals of the Army has wisely and properly determined that while it was dealing with the question of the commissioned personnel it had better see if something could not be done for the enlisted personnel, and this is the answer, and this is the measure that they recommend. There is no question that this bill will have a very beneficial effect upon the entire enlisted personnel of the Army, and it is a most meritorious measure and certainly should be enacted into law.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RECOGNITION OF SERVICES OF ELLSBERG, HARTLEY, AND HAWES

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an address I made before the Naval Affairs Committee.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under the permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following extracts from the hearings before the House Committee on Naval Affairs of April 20, 1928:

A bill for recognition of meritorious service performed by Lieut. Commander Edward Ellsberg, Lieut. Henry Hartley, and Boatswain Richard E. Hawes

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint Edward Ellsberg, late a naval constructor in the Volunteer Naval Reserve, United States Navy, with the rank of admiral, upper half.

SEC. 2. That the thanks of Congress be, and the same are hereby, tendered to Edward Ellsberg, United States Navy, for his services in raising the U. S. submarine S–51.

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint Lieut. Henry Hartley, United States Navy, a lieutenant commander in the Navy, to date from July 5, 1926, in recognition of his services as commanding officer of the submarine rescue ship Falcon in connection with the salvage of the U. S. submarine S–51.

SEC. 4. That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint Chief Boatswain Richard E. Hawes, United States Navy, an ensign in the Navy, to date from July 5, 1926, in recognition of his services and personal bravery in connection with the salvage of the U. S. submarine S–51: Provided, That the said Chief Boatswain Richard E. Hawes shall suffer no loss of pay or allowances as a result of such promotion.

STATEMENT OF HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF COLORADO

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, when I heard of the introduction of this bill by Mr. CELLER I promptly went to his office and asked permission to join him in saying a few words to this committee. I want to tell you a brief human-interest story.

Soon after I was elected to Congress the first time, in 1908, two vacancies occurred at Annapolis, and the matter being quite extensively mentioned by the press throughout the State, I was besieged with a large number of applicants for those two appointments. I was Congressman at large and I decided to make the selections by a competitive examination. As I recollect it, there were 35 applicants from all over Colorado to take that examination. I had each of our four large State educational institutions select one of their professors, and they and the State superintendent of public instruction and some eminent physicians conducted that examination. Five of the applicants were eliminated on account of physical defects, and the remainder took a severe mental examination. I did not know any of them. When the results were announced one young fellow stood far above all the rest, and I appointed him to the Naval Academy at Annapolis.

At the end of the first year he was the top man; at the end of the second year he was again the top man; at the end of the third year he was again the top man; and at the end of the fourth year he was again the top man and graduated at the head of his class in June.

I went over to Annapolis to attend the graduation exercises and saw President Woodrow Wilson call Edward Ellsberg the first one and present him with the first-prize diploma for standing at the head of his class. He had not only the highest rating in scholarship, but, as you probably know, the Daughters of the American Revolution annually offer a silver cup to the boy at Annapolis who has the highest rank in seamanship and international law. Young Ellsberg won that prize. Also Col. R. M. Thompson, formerly head of the United States Navy League, gives an annual prize for the cadet at Annapolis who has the highest proficiency in navigation. Ellsberg won that prize also. The academy gives an annual medal for fencing, and Ellsberg won that prize also. The academy also gives an annual medal for the championship in dueling, and Ellsberg won that prize. The academy also awards some medals for the best English essay work, and Ellsberg won several of those medals. In short, this officer has won everything in the way of efficiency that he has ever gone after, from his boyhood to this time. The only things excepting promotions he has not won or at least deserved, are those that he has not cared to try for. I have here with me the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for June 6, 1914. At page 9973 of that volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 6, 1914, I read as follows:

"Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

"Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to speak on the pending bill, but to briefly mention another matter. I had the pleasure yesterday of visiting the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis and attending the graduating exercises of the class of 1914.

"That class started four years ago with 231 members and graduated only 154. There were 3 Colorado boys in the class, and all 3 of them were within the 10 honor graduates of the class.

"Midshipman Edward Ellsberg, of Denver, graduated with the highest honors and was the first one to be presented with his diploma by President Woodrow Wilson. Young Ellsberg not only graduated at the head of the class of 1914, but he led his class during the entire four years' course and was the honor man at the end of each year. In addition to the distinction of making the highest record in scholarship during the entire four years, he won several very highly-prized medals. He won the splendid silver cup annually donated by the Daughters of the American Revolution for the one in each graduating class who attains the highest proficiency in seamanship and international law. He also won the honorary prize of a navigating sextant presented annually by Col. R. M. Thompson, of the class of 1868, for the highest proficiency in navigation; also a medal for fencing, another for the championship in dueling, and two or three others for the best English essay work.

"Another boy, Midshipman Frederick E. Pelton, of Denver, stood fourth in the class one year, fifth another, sixth another, and graduated eighth in the class.

"I am supremely proud to say to the House that those two Colorado boys were my first appointments to Annapolis. [Applause.] They were the two highest in a competitive examination which I held during my first term in Congress.

"The other Colorado boy that graduated with honors was Abraham Marron, also of Denver, appointed by the late Senator Charles J. Hughes, jr. His standing was ninth in the class. I believe I am safe in saying that no State in this Union has ever equaled this record.

"It speaks well for our school system and is an inspiration to the youth of our State. Colorado is proud of these boys, and they are entitled to this mention and this record, because the course at that academy is most awfully hard work.

"By reason of their rank, Midshipman Ellsberg was allowed to select his ship, and he chose the new battleship Texas, while, I understand, young Pelton and Marron chose the battleship Maryland, to which they will be assigned.

"This is the first time in the history of our State that Colorado has carried off the highest honors at Annapolis. Some 25 years ago Gen. Irving Hale, from Colorado, was the honor man at West Point, and he has been a credit to our State ever since; and I am confident that these three Colorado boys will likewise during the future years be an honor to our country, to the Navy, and to the Centennial State." [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR. I made that brief speech to the House on June 6, 1914. The newspapers at that time stated that Colorado only had 1 per cent of the membership of that academy and that this one boy had won 30 per cent of all the honors at Annapolis.

Mr. BRITTEN. That speaks well for your competitive examination.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir; and also for our Colorado school system. I will insert a very brief mention of his various assignments, as follows:

SUMMARY OF SERVICES OF EDWARD ELLSBERG, LIEUTENANT COMMANDER, UNITED STATES NAVY

Graduated from the Naval Academy on June 5, 1914.

Served on the U. S. S. Texas as ensign in the following capacities: Assistant navigator, assistant torpedo officer, assistant turret officer, division officer, broadside battery.

Recommended by commanding officer, Capt. A. W. Grant, for special postgraduate training.

Detached Texas January, 1916, and ordered to postgraduate school at Annapolis for naval-construction course.

Ordered to postgraduate school at Massachusetts Institute of Technology in October, 1916, for further instructions.

Detached Massachusetts Institute of Technology on outbreak of war in April, 1917, ordered for duty at navy yard, New York.

Had charge of refitting U. S. S. Olympia after her wreck.

Promoted to lieutenant (junior grade) in June, 1917, and transferred to construction corps.

Had charge of repairing U. S. S. Huntington, after grounding on reef. Commended therefor by commanding officer and construction officer.

Promoted to lieutenant (senior grade) late in 1917.

Had charge of refitting ex-German vessels Prinzess Irene and Kaiser Wilhelm II, to transports Pocahontas and Agamemnon. Both jobs finished ahead of schedule.

Outside superintendent on construction of U. S. S. Tennessee, the largest ship ever built at New York Navy Yard.

Ordered to Massachusetts Institute of Technology in September, 1919, to finish interrupted course in naval architecture.

Promoted to lieutenant commander (temporary rank) in 1919, and permanently to lieutenant commander later.

Received degree, master of science, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, in June, 1920. Thesis, Design of a Submarine Boat.

Ordered to the navy yard at Boston, Mass., in June, 1920, as planning superintendent. Refitted steamship George Washington for Shipping Board.

Designed low-pressure evaporating system, known as the Denver type, installed on cruisers Denver and Galveston and several other cruisers and tankers. System highly successful and resulted in commendation from commandant at Boston and commanding officers of vessels involved.

Ordered to navy yard at New York, in June, 1924, as outside superintendent. At request of Shipping Board, was ordered to special duty to redesign ventilation and forced draft system of the Leviathan. The system was designed and installation made early in 1925. Proved extremely satisfactory, and resulted in commendation from Shipping Board and Navy Department.

In October, 1925, was ordered as salvage officer U. S. submarine S–51, sank September 25, 1925. Served as such until the raising of S–51 was completed on July 5, 1926. Became an expert diver and personally supervised the diving work, both on surface and on bottom. Invented an improved under-water cutting torch of great importance for that kind of work.

Recommended for promotion by Capt. E. J. King, officer in charge of salvage squadron, and by Rear Admiral Plunkett, commandant of the navy yard at New York.

Awarded distinguished-service medal by the Navy Department for work on the S–51.

Submitted to the Navy Department a very elaborate and detailed report on salvage operations on submarine S–51, with numerous recommendations and drawings, for important improvements in salvage methods and equipment. That report is entitled "Navy Department, Bureau of Construction and Repairs, Technical Bulletin No. 2–27," and is a volume of over 100 pages, with many extensive drawings.

After submitting that report he resigned as senior lieutenant commander in the Construction Corps to enter civil life, in December, 1926, to become an engineer in the industrial field.

Invented a stabilized type of pontoon for future submarine salvage. The Navy Department rebuilt six S–51 pontoons to this design.

He stopped his work immediately when he learned of the sinking of the submarine S–4, December 17, 1927, and rushed to Boston and volunteered as a civilian, and within an hour and a half he was back in the Navy again.

Commissioned a lieutenant commander in the Volunteer Naval Reserve by the Navy Department, and ordered to Provincetown and put in charge of the diving operations at the scene of the wreck, and served in that capacity during the rescue period of two weeks on the same kind of work as on the S–51. He immediately dived on the S–4 himself and learned and reported the nature of the damages and possibility of salvage. He came very near losing his life in that diving work on the bottom of the ocean in the mud on the wreckage of S–4.

I understand he is the only regular Annapolis officer in the history of our Navy who has become a proficient diver, and has personally gone right along with the divers and personally directed operations on the bottom of the ocean.

The S–4 was finally raised, using the methods and pontoons developed by Lieutenant Commander Ellsberg, thereby making the work much easier and quicker than it was on the S–51.

His lectures and numerous articles for the press and magazines throughout the country graphically describing these two appalling catastrophes are thrilling chapters in the history of our Navy.

I want to especially mention his splendid article in the World's Work for March, 1928, entitled "Safety for our submarines—What we must have—Better mechanisms—More caution."

He is given the credit of being the highest authority in the United States on the question of salvaging disabled undersea boats.

He returned to civilian work in January, 1928, and was commended by the Secretary of the Navy for his work on the S–4.

I have never seen Ellsberg from the day he graduated at Annapolis on June 5, 1914, until 10 minutes before we came into this room for the hearing this morning. And have had no opportunity to talk with him about his career in the Navy during all these nearly 14 years. What little I know about it I have learned from the New York, Washington, and Denver newspapers, and from magazine articles and conversation with his friends. He was raised in Denver, graduated from one of her high schools, and went to our State university. His parents have lived there from the early days and his mother is living in Denver now. His father died about two years ago, I think. He has never asked me to do anything for him, or written me anything about his record. He does not know anything about, and is not at all responsible, for anything I say here.

I confess I feel somewhat derelict in not having introduced this bill myself two years ago. A few months after Commander Ellsberg raised the submarine S–51, he resigned from the Navy and accepted a very important and lucrative engineering position in private life, and he is in that civilian position now.

He was requested by the Navy Department to write a series of three articles for the public press, in connection with the salvaging of the two submarines S–51 and S–4. These articles were widely published throughout the press of the United States, in the issues of December 24, 25, and 26, 1927. In Washington they appeared in the Evening Star. I have them here if the committee desires to see them. He did that work at the request and with the approval of the Navy Department, while he was on the U. S. S. Falcon at the scene of the disaster.

His entire record has been one of exceptionally efficient and distinguished services to the Navy and to our country.

I also desire to insert a copy of a very exceptional and most remarkable letter from the Secretary of the Navy, dated January 5, 1928. You all understand that this officer is the one to whom the country gave the credit for raising the submarine S–51. All the newspapers of the United States, I think, gave him the principal credit for doing that great work. Of course, I may be wrong, and I do not want to cast any discredit upon the efforts of others who did heroic work. But there are about a million people in Colorado, and I think many more millions throughout this country, who will always feel that if the recommendations of this officer had been followed, after the raising of the S–51, and especially if he had been given complete command of the salvage operations in connection with raising the submarine S–4 instantly after she went down, the results might possibly have been very different.

Secretary Wilbur's letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
Washington, January 5, 1928.

MY DEAR COMMANDER ELLSBERG: Upon the completion of your trying experience in the rescue and salvage work on the ill-fated U. S. submarine S–4, I desire to express my sincere appreciation and the appreciation of the Navy Department for your patriotic and unselfish action, by which the wealth of experience gained by you in the United States Navy was whole-heartedly and splendidly given in the work incident to the loss of the S–4 and the lives of the 40 officers and men who constituted her crew and inspection party.

Upon hearing the news of the accident you were in Westfield, N. J., in a civilian status, having resigned from the naval service upon the termination of the salvage work of the U. S. submarine S–51. Without hesitation you immediately got in touch by telephone with the officials of the Navy Department and offered your assistance in the work to be done. You were told that your offer was heartily appreciated and to immediately proceed to the navy yard, New York, to confer with Rear Admiral Plunkett, the commandant. Upon arrival there you were immediately enrolled in the United States Naval Reserve and proceeded to the scene of the accident by train and destroyer.

Your experience as a result of the S–51 salvage work stood you in good stead and you were able to prove of invaluable assistance to Rear Admiral Frank H. Brumby, United States Navy, in charge of the rescue and salvage work, and to his chief assistant, Capt. E. J. King, United States Navy, with whom you had been associated on similar work. You also found assigned to the hazardous work many of the Navy divers with whom you had worked in past years.

During the rescue and salvage work you labored unceasingly with the divers, lending to the problem in hand unselfish and devoted work of the highest order. In addition to supervising the diving operations you personally donned the dress of a diver and made a thorough survey of the conditions on the ocean's bottom at the resting place of the S–4. You risked your life in this work, performed under terrible conditions of cold and wind and sea.

In addition to the supervisory and actual work which you so ably performed, you were of assistance in placing before the people of the country an accurate account of the conditions and work performed through a series of newspaper articles. These were valuable in that they gave the layman knowledge which he lacked of submarine problems and deep-sea diving; a picture of the situation which helped him to grasp some of the tremendous obstacles which continually confronted the brave men who were daily risking their lives in pursuit of their duty.

I have tried to summarize from the facts at my command of the work you have done, not because it was your duty to do so, but because, as a former naval officer possessed of a high sense of loyalty and duty, you saw fit to step forward and out of your civilian status to resume again the work familiar to you. For this work well done, cheerfully done, and loyally done I thank you in behalf of the Navy.

Sincerely yours,

CURTIS D. WILBUR.

Mr. BRITTEN. That certainly is a nice letter.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is a most wonderful letter, of which the commander and all his friends are supremely proud. My thought is that Congress ought to prove to the world that this Republic is not ungrateful. This patriotic and very exceptional officer does not need an advanced rank. He can make a living and a splendid record any place in the world by his own superior ability and energy. But his proper recognition would be an inspiration to the youth of this country. I don't believe this committee has ever heard of a record that equals his from the time he entered the academy to this very moment.

He has rendered some of the greatest and most valuable services to our Navy. In fact, the whole Navy and our country are under obligations to him which neither this pending bill nor anything else can ever repay.

I am interested in doing things that are worth while and that will serve as an incentive and impetus to the youth of our country. Some of you Members may recall that I recently introduced and passed a bill to change the name of the Ancon Hospital in the Canal Zone to the Gorgas Hospital, in honor of Maj. Gen. William C. Gorgas. General Gorgas has been dead eight years now, and there is no memorial or statue or monument or tablet or anything to perpetuate his memory. He was the economic savior of Cuba and the redeemer of the Tropics. He made it possible to build the Panama Canal by eradicating yellow fever from the Isthmus of Panama, and afterwards from the world. He is one of the greatest benefactors to humanity that has ever lived. I feel that Congress did a great act for the youth of the world by paying that tribute to General Gorgas and making that great and beautiful hospital a memorial to him forever.

I merely refer to that as an illustration of sentiment, of national pride, of incentive to heroism, to great service, to patriotism, that I think Congress should encourage. While, of course, we should not go to an extreme, yet, for really great and heroic services to our country, I think these kinds of bills are eminently worth while to our country. I believe that Congress should show its appreciation of this kind of high-class service as an inspiration to the youth of our country. It does not cost Uncle Sam a dollar, and I earnestly hope that the committee will fittingly recognize Commander Ellsberg's distinguished service to our country. I know the State of Colorado would be supremely proud to have Congress pay some appropriate and deserved recognition to this officer.

Mr. BRITTEN. What is the date of his resignation?

Mr. TAYLOR. December, 1926. I may say in passing that Commander Ellsberg did not come here at all at his own request. Mr. CELLER and I asked him to come here from New York to be present if any member of this committee desired to ask him any questions.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am wondering whether there should be anything in this legislation providing for a so-called extra number.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not know the Navy system of promotion at all. I am just presenting to you a statement of facts. I don't know what the extra numbers are, or the difference between the upper and the lower half.

Mr. BRITTEN. We provide by law now a specific number for the upper grade.

Mr. VINSON. Let me ask Mr. Taylor this question: We all recognize the distinguished service performed by Lieutenant Commander Ellsberg. If he had not resigned, what would be your viewpoint with reference to Congress enacting a law of this character?

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not know anything about the practice of this committee or the rules of the Navy in matters of this kind. I am presenting a very exceptional record of achievement and appealing to your committee to report out a bill that will suitably show our country's appreciation of that great service. Whether an officer is in or out of the service it seems to me if he made the record that Ellsberg did at the academy and ever since graduation, especially a record like Mr. Ellsberg's wonderful work in raising the submarine S–51 and submarine S–4, I feel that Congress should give him a fitting and worthwhile promotion in rank, or a congressional medal, or something of real importance, and not just say, "Thank you." I feel very strongly that Congress should appropriately recognize the kind of distinguished service Commander Ellsberg has rendered in order that that recognition may not only show a suitable appreciation to him, but also prove an incentive to the youth of our country and a proper encouragement to the boys in the Navy. Frankly, I think the Navy is entirely too conservative. I firmly believe they would have a higher morale, a better feeling, and more enthusiasm, spirit, and ambition, and less desertions if the higher authorities would show a little more encouragement and kind approval of good work, rather than making an adverse report on as meritorious a bill as was ever introduced in Congress.

Mr. VINSON. If the commander were still in active service, would you give him a distinguished-service medal for performing this extraordinary service? Congress did give him a distinguished-service medal.

Mr. TAYLOR. Congress has not given him anything.

Mr. VINSON. The Navy Department has given him a distinguished-service medal, which is permitted by the Congress. If he were still in the service, do you think it would be right for Congress to pass a law granting to him, or to any other officer who has performed a valuable service of this character, a promotion of this kind?

Mr. TAYLOR. I am not familiar, only in a very general way, with the policy or practice of your committee or of Congress or the Navy in this matter of awarding a higher rank for very hazardous and distinguished and successful services, either in the line of duty or after an officer is out of the service. I do not know whether you ever recognize that any man possibly could perform such extraordinary service to his country as would warrant Congress in giving him an expression of approval. If you do, then certainly Commander Ellsberg is most deserving of a substantial and worthy promotion, because no officer in the Navy during our entire history has ever had a record that parallels the record of this officer. I have been here in Congress nearly 20 years, and I feel perfectly safe in making that statement. When the S–4 was sunk he was a private citizen. There was no obligation upon him to instantly drop his important engineering work and leave his wife and little daughter and rush all night to the scene of the disaster and get there at 3 o'clock in the morning in frightful weather and immediately put on diving togs and dive down to the wreck and examine it and get entangled in the wreckage and come within an ace of losing his life, and come up and tell the Navy and the world the exact condition of the submarine and how it could be raised. Why didn't some Navy officer in the service do that? There are probably a good many reasons why they didn't.

Mr. VINSON. Assuming that the commander had remained in the Navy and done all these great things which he has done and rendered great assistance in the effort to raise the submarine S–4, would you think it the right thing to do for Congress for all that service, while he is in the Navy, by legislation to raise him from lieutenant commander to the rank of rear admiral of the upper half?

Mr. TAYLOR. I will ask Mr. Celler to answer that question.

Mr. VINSON. I am asking you to answer that from a legislative viewpoint—as a legislative policy.

Mr. TAYLOR. "From a legislative viewpoint" I look at it from the human side; and as a "legislative policy" I am in favor of recognizing, encouraging, and rewarding patriotism, loyalty, and devotion to our flag and to the Navy. I think Congress should do that if the Navy don't. I do not know whether you recognize distinguished services or not. I am simply making a patriotic appeal to this committee to do something that is preeminently just and that would prove an inspiration to the youth of our country, to show some suitable appreciation of a very exceptional and truly wonderful record. I think that is eminently in the interest of the Navy. Human nature is just the same in the Navy as out of it. There is a human and a common-sense side to this matter. I am surprised and disappointed at what seems to me an utter lack of any proper appreciation shown in the department's report on this bill. We are all only grown-up children and we never get too old to appreciate an act or a kindly word of approval. That applies to both Congress and the Navy. Where there is clearly a richly deserved reward of merit, if the Navy can not or does not act, I believe Congress should. Of what practical benefit is the splendid and eloquent letter of commendation by Secretary of the Navy Wilbur on January 5, 1928, when Acting Secretary of the Navy Robinson on March 5, 1928, reports that Ellsberg is entitled to practically no consideration by Congress?

Mr. VINSON. I am trying to find out what you, as a Member of the House, think about this matter. From your point of view, if a naval officer is in the service and renders such services as Commander Ellsberg has rendered, what would you do for him legislatively?

Mr. TAYLOR. I would have Congress grant this promotion in rank to Ellsberg. I have shown that from the day he entered Annapolis there is not a parallel case to his in the history of our Government. If that is true you are certainly justified in granting this recognition for that 15 years' service, both in justice and fairness to him, and also as an inspiration to other officers and men who have done, or who may do a great service in the future. I have for several years understood that he is one of the greatest construction engineers in the Navy. I don't know how many other officers there are in the Navy who have a master's degree from the Boston Institute of Technology. If there are any that have that degree and anything like Ellsberg's record of efficiency, there is one thing dead certain, his rank is much higher than a lieutenant commander.

Mr. VINSON. My question has to do with the condition if he should now by a member of the Navy.

Mr. TAYLOR. While the form or manner of promotion might be different, he has rendered these many very great services to our country, and our country should properly and ungrudgingly recognize that obligation, whether he is now in the Navy or not. I do not see why there should be any difference.

Mr. VINSON. I think it makes a great difference.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not think it does. If our country is ever going to have an efficient submarine corps that can compete with the world, we have got to get some more Ellsbergs, if it is possible, and in my judgment it will not be possible, if they are treated the way I think Ellsberg has been treated. That's not the way to build up a navy. I wish the committee could read the record of his services during and since the war. You would be thrilled with admiration for his modest, unselfish, always energetic and phenomenally efficient and inspiring work. He is not here begging for anything. Our country needs him a thousand times more than he needs a higher rank in the Reserve Corps. Us Congressmen who know him and know his unparalleled services to our country are here asking as a matter of right, of justice, of fair dealing, and for the upbuilding of the Navy, and for the welfare of our country in future years that you authorize the President to appoint Edward Ellsberg, formerly a naval constructor, in the Naval Reserve, United States Navy, with the rank of rear admiral, upper half, which will not cost the Government a dollar, and when the next submarine is sunk within the next three years there will be available, if needed, a thoroughly capable officer to instantly take command of the rescue work.

I want to interpose the suggestion that in my judgment the services of Lieutenant Commander Ellsberg have been worth $1,000,000 a year to the Government from the time we entered the World War to the present. I think he is the best equipped and greatest construcion engineer the Navy has had during that period. I feel confident his record on the submarines conclusively proves that.

I do not want this bill to become involved in any controversy for which the commander is in no wise responsible. And I am not at all personally familiar with the facts. But I do feel, like I think a large number of the Members of the House feel, that the statements made regarding these submarines by Representative ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN, of New York, in his four different speeches in the House, which appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 20, 1926, and March 26 and 31, 1928, and May 17, 1928, respectively, are worthy of very serious consideration by Congress.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, your committee need have no apprehension whatever of unduly setting a precedent in this case that others may try to avail themselves of, because there certainly was no one in Ellsberg's class during the four years he was at Annapolis, and I feel positive the records show there has been no one in his class in the Navy during the nearly 14 years since he graduated. And if any other officer ever does equal that record, he certainly ought to be promoted very much sooner and more than we are asking for Commander Ellsberg.

Colorado was proud of this boy when he graduated at Annapolis with all those honors, and my State has been proud of him ever since, and we are all more proud of him than ever since his superb work on the sunken submarines S–51 and S–4.

Mr. CELLER. I am not so much interested in the amount of rank accorded this man as I am in getting some congressional recognition for him.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is right—that is all we are asking for, some suitable and appropriate recognition by Congress of that wonderful and supremely patriotic service.

Commander Ellsberg performed every sort of job at these submarine disasters. He learned how to dive.

He invented the very pontoons that were used in the raising of the sunken submarine S–4. He personally inspired all the divers with his own courage. He did not ask those men to do anything that he himself was not willing to do. In all sorts of weather he himself went down into the sea and made the necessary observations. On several occasions his own life was dispaired of, particularly when working with the S–4.

Permit me to place in the record an article, with reference to his prowess and courage, that appeared in the New York Times:

"COMMANDER ELLSBERG SINKS DEEP IN SEA MUD—BARELY EXTRICATES HIMSELF IN HIS DIVING SUIT

[Special to the New York Times]

"PROVINCETOWN, MASS., December 22.—Lieutenant Commander Ellsberg, incased in 200 pounds of diving suit and paraphernalia, was let down over the side of the Falcon this afternoon and met below with an experience that might have cost him his life. After a descent of a few feet he found the escape air valve on his helmet was too tight. He signaled to be pulled up. In the air he made an adjustment and went down again to examine the air lines running into the 'S. C.' tube.

"'I found them all right,' he said hours later after he had come out of the decompression chamber.

"'I walked back. About 20 feet aft of the torpedo compartment the superstructure had been torn away, but the hull itself was intact. In crossing this space I slipped and went down, but recovered my footing again.'

"Groping along, Ellsberg came in contact with the 4-inch gun on the deck of the submarine. He found the gun twisted so that its blunt muzzle poked over the port side.

"Making his way over the slimy barrel of the gun, Commander Ellsberg worked aft to find that the bridge on the conning tower had been torn away.

"'Up to this time,' he said later, 'I had found no hole and then I found it—and fell into it. I did not go way down, but in pulling myself out I ripped a hole in my suit and water began to trickle in.'

"Once more on his feet, his air lines saved by purest luck from being cut on the jagged edges of the hole, Commander Ellsberg slipped and tumbled off the deck down the rounded sides of the submersible into the mud on the port side.

"'I went right down into the mud, was buried in it, and it seemed as if I was there for good. They asked me if I wanted any help and I certainly did.'

"The men on the phones on the deck of the Falcon instructed Diver Carr, working on the other side of the submarine, to help Commander Ellsberg, but while Carr was working his way over the boat to his chief Ellsberg had extricated himself.

"'I had to do something so I tightened my exhaust a little and increased the pressure in my suit. It evidently worked, for I started up.'

"Slowly the men on the deck took in the air and life lines in order that this amateur diver might not come up too fast. Hands reached over the rail to bring him in. Even then, he said later, he did not realize that he was out of the water."

His amazing courage was not for a moment or for a day. It was continuous death-defying courage extending over many months. Each day he and Hartley and Hawes willingly, unflinchingly faced death. It was not the momentary courage displayed in battle. Here was battle lasting weeks and months.

Commander Ellsberg himself is here and I should be glad for you to interrogate him and hear him for a few moments.

I could go on and on and tell you so much about his wonderful achievements, but I will not take your time further at this time. I think it is by this time discernible that his work is quite outstanding indeed.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will you insert in the record those reports you just referred to?

Mr. CELLER. Certainly.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will also insert some other data that I have, and revise and extend my remarks, with your permission.

Mr. BRITTEN. That will be all right.

Mr. CELLER. I will insert in the record what the officer in charge of operations at the sunken submarine S–51 said about Lieutenant Hartley and Boatswain Hawes and Lieutenant Commander Ellsberg:

1. This report on personnel engaged in the salvage operations on S–51 is submitted in advance of the general and detailed reports of the operations themselves.

2. It is obvious that the successful outcome of the salvage of the S–51 could only have taken place through the efforts of the personnel assigned to the work and that, while all hands did their utmost from beginning to successful conclusion, there are certain officers and men whose deeds have earned them a special mention and special recognition. While all hands would have done exactly the same, no matter what the outcome of the operations, it should be taken into account that the operations were completely successful.

3. Before naming the officers and men who distinguished themselves and brought added prestige to the Navy, it is considered desirable to say that none but those present constantly on the job can realize and appreciate what it meant in slogging, dogged, hard work, day in and day out, from early morning until late at night, for weeks on end, when the chief diversion was the daily coming of the tug Penobscot with mail and food. Other diversions were afforded by the hazards of the work, by disappointments as to progress, and by unforeseen and unexpected difficulties, but these chiefly affected the officers directing the work and the men themselves had little but their strong sense of duty in a worthwhile job to keep them alert, which they always were.

4. The salvage operations occupied two periods—October 12 to December 7, 1925 (about 8 weeks), until divers' air hoses froze up solid with ice while on the bottom and required suspension of the work—and April 25 to July 7, 1926 (about 10½ weeks), when the S–51 was delivered at the navy yard, New York, N. Y.—in all, 18½ weeks (4½ months).

5. As senior officer present and as officer in charge of salvage operations, I deem it my duty to say that the perseverance, resourcefulness, determination, pluck, and efficiency of all hands merit the highest praise and is deserving of suitable recognition in the instance hereinafter set forth. I think the clearest indication of the spirit that prevailed was evidenced when the wreck grounded on Man of War Rock in the East River, in sight of the destination, when the universal attitude was, "Well, there's one more difficulty to overcome. Let's get at it!" The results speak for themselves.

6. It is not too much to say that, while all officers and men did their utmost at all times, two of the officers and a certain few of the divers and of the crew of the Falcon played paramount and outstanding prominent parts in the operation.

7. The two officers who were "indispensable" and to whose efforts the success of the operation is chiefly, primarily, and unmistakably due are, first, Lieut. Commander Edward Ellsberg, Construction Corps, United States Navy, assigned as salvage officer; and, second, Lieut. Henry Hartley, United States Navy, commanding U. S. S. Falcon, assigned as salvage vessel.

8. Lieut. Commander Edward Ellsberg was in direct personal charge of every phase of the work on the hull of S–51. I have no hesitation in saying that the Construction Corps would have the greatest difficulty in furnishing another officer who could have done what he did. Not only was his technical knowledge and resource adequate for every difficulty, but he displayed the highest order of leadership. He set an example to the divers by learning to dive and by actually descending to the S–51 on the bottom no less than three times during the period April–July, 1926. Again, on July 7, 1926, while working on top of No. 3 port pontoon with the aid of a derrick, a wire strap gave way, and the men on the pontoon were in great danger, but Lieutenant Commander Ellsberg (who was one of them) saved himself and turned immediately to the saving of the pontoon (on which the whole job depended at that time), even to the extent of shoving thumbs into broken vent pipes, with the pontoon awash, until wooden plugs could be secured. His ingenuity was inexhaustible, his perseverance in the face of countless setbacks was unfailing, and his determination animated and inspired all hands. One of his contributions to the salvage work was the perfection of a high-speed underwater cutting torch, and he is responsible for the development of the technique of lowering and placing pontoons with accuracy and facility hitherto not known. It is desired to repeat that to his efforts and skill the successful salvage of the S–51 is primarily and unmistakably due. Lieutenant Commander Ellsberg is now one of the senior lieutenant commanders of his corps, and I wish strongly to recommend his advancement to the rank of commander and the award to him of a distinguished-service medal in recognition of his work on the salvage of S–51.

9. Lieut. Henry Hartley was in command of the Falcon, which was salvage vessel, was necessarily present whenever actual work was being done on the wreck of the S–51. In fact, the Falcon was the first vessel to move in the morning and the last to secure at night. Lieutenant Hartley's seamanship was of the highest order, his devotion to duty unceasing, his judgment sound, and his advice in all matters was invaluable; his handling of the Falcon going in and out of the moorings over the wreck (congested with buoys, lines, and air hoses) was invariably correct. I do not see how the Falcon could have been more usefully and efficiently commanded. Lieutenant Hartley is now 42 years old, and stands about 550 on the list of lieutenants, but I am convinced that he is in every way competent to be a lieutenant commander, and strongly recommend his advancement to that rank, and the award to him of a distinguished-service medal in recognition of his work on the salvage of the S–51. The comment and recommendation of the salvage officer, Lieutenant Commander Ellsberg, in regard to Lieutenant Hartley, appears as an inclosure, and is heartily concurred in.

17. Boatswain Richard Hawes, of U. S. S. Falcon, by his attitude of willing cheerfulness in the face of discouraging conditions, by his acts on the day of the accidental rising of the bowing of S–51 on June 22, 1926, and in securing No. 2 port pontoon on the evening of July 5, 1926, and on numerous other occasions, displayed the finest attributes of courage, devotion to duty, and leadership. He is strongly recommended for promotion to the rank of chief boatswain and for the award of a Navy cross. The report and recommendations of the commanding officer, Falcon, Lieut. Henry Hartley, United States Navy, appear herewith as an inclosure, and are strongly concurred in.

I will also insert the article referred to in the World's Work, which is a very learned presentation of the submarine situation and should be very instructive and useful to Congress, as follows:

"[From the World's Work, March, 1928]

"SAFETY FOR OUR SUBMARINES—WHAT WE MUST HAVE—BETTER MECHANISM, MORE CAUTION

"(By Edward Ellsberg, lieutenant commander, United States Naval Reserve. Commander Ellsberg won the distinguished service medal for his work in raising the wrecked S–51 and took active part in the early steps to rescue the living on the S–4. Therefore, he writes with authority on the question of salvaging disabled undersea boats. At Annapolis he won the highest scholastic honors in the class of 1914)

"The loss of the S–4 and the lingering death of Lieutenant Fitch and his five companions trapped in her torpedo room have driven home to the country what may come in the wake of a submarine disaster. The S–4 is merely the latest in a long string of submarine disasters both in our own and in foreign navies. I still vividly remember the day, 13 years ago, in the mess room of the Texas, when our radio officer burst in and announced breathlessly: 'The Navy has lost its first submarine.' The F–4 had just vanished while submerged off Honolulu. She was the first, but in her wake have gone, among others, R–6, O–5, S–5, S–48, S–51, and S–4. In other navies, a similar story.

"Submarines are sunk for the same reasons that trains are wrecked—carelessness, defective machinery, and collision. Submarines are far more dangerous to their crews than are ordinary vessels. This results from the fact that, to permit submerged operation, they must be packed with special machinery and literally lined with pipes and valves. If something goes wrong with any of this mass of machinery and piping, the boat may never rise again.

"The submarine designer is faced with a hard problem. In the given tonnage assigned for the boat he must include a specially strong and reenforced hull to withstanding crushing when submerged; he must provide one kind of engines, Diesels, for propulsion on the surface and carry the fuel oil for them; he must then provide a different type of power, electric motors, for underwater propulsion and install 220 huge storage batteries to supply the current; he must include tanks for filling with water for submerging and a heavy bank of compressed-air tanks for expelling the water so that the boat can rise; he must provide torpedoes, torpedo tubes, and a gun so that the vessel may have some value as a ship of war; and he must include auxiliary tanks, adjusting tanks, trimming tanks, bow and stern diving rudders, and the most intricate system imaginable of water lines, high-pressure air lines, low-pressure air lines, oil lines, electric lines, and ventilation lines. When all this is included, it is easy to see how the submarine can submerge, but it seems amazing that she ever comes up again even when everything is working perfectly.

"After the absolutely necessary items to allow the submarine to dive and to attack are provided for, the designer has little buoyancy left for either the comfort or the safety of the crew. In the small weight and space remaining, the designer tries to strike a balance between safety features and the absolutely necessary items to permit the crew to live and navigate their craft.

"As designers included more and more machinery to increase the reliability of operation, the radius of action, the power of attack, and the habitability, the boats grew larger and larger. They became less likely to sink because of defective design, but the very thing that brought this about—namely, increase in size—also made it more and more difficult to salvage them when they did sink. Submarines began to venture out of harbor, where they were likely to sink in water both deep and exposed to storms; and they were so heavy that bow and stern lifting eyes could no longer be properly installed to take the weight of the flooded boat in lifting. At the same time, the weight became so large that even two of the largest floating derricks available at most ports, such as New York, were unable to budge one end of a damaged submarine. Such an attempt failed on the S–51. As an added complication, the derricks could not safely be taken out of harbor to try a lift except on calm days, so a large submarine sunk at sea had outgrown salvaging methods.

"The French Navy several years ago designed a special lifting vessel with twin hulls to raise submarines. The design was copied by the Germans, who built the Vulcan, a catamaran type of ship with two parallel hulls joining into one bow, the idea being to lift the damaged submarine up between the two hulls by numerous lines to be passed under. The Vulcan type, while it appealed to the fancy as a fine solution, suffered from practical defects that prevented complete success. Submarines grew to such a size that the Vulcan could not handle them, and larger Vulcans from both financial and technical standpoints were not feasible to construct. They were limited then to submarines of such size as are now obsolete.

"The greatest drawback, however, comes from the large number of lifting lines that were required from the Vulcan to the submarine to be lifted. In the open sea, with motion on the ship, it is a hopeless task to get the lines from the surface secured without getting them snarled and kinked; even if this could be accomplished, it is too much to expect to keep the load evenly distributed while the surface vessel pitches and rolls, and heavy strains far beyond normal suddenly applied will snap the cables in succession. This has happened in numerous instances to floating derricks when passing swells have rocked them. The Vulcan type, therefore, has never worked except in calm and sheltered waters, and in such cases harbor derricks are quite as suitable and more likely to be at hand.

"Nor has the Vulcan ever raised a flooded or nearly flooded submarine of any size. Several German boats that had only slight amounts of negative buoyancy, with their whole crews alive inside but unable to make the boats rise, were assisted up by lines from the Vulcan under ideal conditions for salvage, but in similar cases no American crew has ever failed to raise one or the other end of their boats and escape without the help of any Vulcans. In the one instance of which I have a record, where a German submarine was sufficiently flooded to make her an appreciable dead weight, the Vulcan failed to justify herself. The submarine was sunk in shallow water in Kiel Harbor. The Vulcan was close at hand, and the boat was small. The water was smooth, diving was continuously possible and easy. Several of the crew, including the commander, were still alive in the control room. In spite of this ideal situation for salvage work and the supposedly large number of safety devices in German submarine boats, the men were all dead long before the Vulcan succeeded in getting sufficient lines attached to try a lift. Shortly after this occurred, German submarines outgrew the Vulcan altogether; the Germans showed what they really thought of the design of such a vessel by not repeating the type in a larger ship.

"The British, meanwhile, from 1900 onward, were losing more submarines than anyone else. They had the Vulcan and its prototypes under their noses, but with their usual respect for the practical in ship design, they decided to build no Vulcans and depended for lifting on surface pontoons or scows. Some of their disabled submarines were recovered, and others were lost with their entire crews, but on the whole the British record was better in rescue and salvage than that of their continental neighbors. The best British performance was in the case of the K–13, a large boat that went down with a flooded engine room, but with the control room and the whole forward half of the boat dry and light. Here the water was but 90 feet deep and remained calm; the light bow being up about 20 feet off the bottom. In this case, divers were able to work continuously, attached a pipe to a valve on the hull, and sent down food and air. Steel cables were passed under the bow, this being rendered easy since the bow was well clear of the ocean floor. Meanwhile, all ballast tanks forward were blown dry by air supplied from above, and surface pontoons lifted the lightened bow enough after 57 hours to cut a hole in it and release about half the crew who were still alive. The bow then slipped out of the slings and sank again.

"Carelessness is a major cause of submarine accidents. It takes practically every man in the crew while diving or running submerged to operate the intricate machinery and valves. The failure of only one man to perform his part properly may lead to disaster and the death of the whole crew. In the case of the British K–13 just mentioned, which was a steam-driven boat, a fireman forgot to close the valve on the smokestack when the boat dived. Half the crew, including the forgetful fireman, were promptly drowned. Carelessness or oversight in handling vents caused the accidents to the American submarines F–4, R–5, S–5, and S–48. The S–5 and S–48 are two outstanding instances of how our sailors in half-flooded but otherwise undamaged submarines have by their own efforts raised one end of their craft above the surface to allow their escape. In a number of other instances, where the boat was disabled but not partly flooded, the crews have managed to raise the whole boat themselves, and thereby have done unaided what the Germans with their Vulcan have considered quite a feat.

"Aside from sinkings due to carelessness in submerging, collisions with other vessels have been the most frequent cause of disaster. The O–5 and S–51 were sunk by collisions while they were on the surface; the British M–1, the Italian Venieros, and our own S–4 were sunk while running submerged. On the surface a submarine has the same rights and must observe the same rules as any other vessel; submerged, she has no rights at all and it is up to her to keep clear of all other vessels. A submarine submerges for purposes of concealment; she is then wholly out of sight or shows only the top of her periscope, which is intended to be invisible. Consequently it is asking too much in time of peace to expect merchant vessels to keep clear of ships they can not see or whose course and speed, if a periscope is sighted, they can not properly judge.

"Safety for submarines when submerged depends partly on the carefulness of the crew and partly on the instruments provided for seeing and listening while below the surface. It is an old rule in the submarine service that a boat should either navigate at least 60 feet down, so that surface vessels can pass over her safely, or else should be at periscope depth, where she can look around and observe surface craft. Any intermediate depth is dangerous. But even this rule failed in the case of the S–4, which had two periscopes showing, but evidently failed to see the Paulding bearing down on her as she planed to the surface.

"Our submarines are equipped with listening devices of various types—the S–4 had an SC tube mounted over the torpedo room for this purpose. With this or similar arrangements it is possible to hear the propellers of an approaching vessel, and every submarine below 60 feet and until her periscope breaks surface is supposed to listen for vessels on the surface before rising high enough to endanger herself. It is questionable that the SC tube on the S–4 was manned during her last trip, as she was not below periscope depth and evidently relied on her periscopes.

"With 50 or more submarines in commission, some making long cruises, it is impracticable to have tenders waving red flags over the ocean to indicate that somewhere within a few miles there is a submarine. This practice is just as obsolete for modern submarines as would be an attempt to enforce now the old law (still on the books in some localities) that requires a man with a red flag to precede any engine-propelled vehicle on a highway. As a matter of fact, such a tender is more a danger to the submarine than a safeguard, as she constitutes a ship that is always close around to be dodged. It is, perhaps, forgotten now that the last salvage job at Provincetown that the Navy was called on to perform occurred in 1910, when the submarine Bonita held diving practice off Cape Cod, while the U. S. S. Castine flew the red flag to warn all ships to keep clear. The Bonita rammed the Castine, and the unfortunate tender promptly sank. Luckily the submarine escaped. Since that day submarine captains have preferred to dive unattended.

"We can rest assured that in spite of everything, as long as there are submarines there will be submarine accidents. And if this is so, it is necessary to consider the submarines themselves to make it possible for the crew to save themselves and as much of the boat as they can from flooding in case of an accident; then to make it possible for them to breathe while they try to raise their boat; to include means of providing air, food, and heat from the outside while the rescue efforts proceed; to render lifting the boat by surface held as quick and sure as humanly possible; and, lastly, to provide a means of escape should lifting be impossible. (Such escape is extremely hazardous to the crew and should be attempted only as a last resort.)

"Most submarines are divided into five water-tight compartments—torpedo room, battery room, control room, engine room, and motor room. Hinged water-tight doors with heavy dogs to hold them closed are provided in each bulkhead. These doors are habitually open for purposes of access and communication while submerged. It is of the utmost importance that the doors be quickly closed in case of trouble, and that the bulkheads hold tight against leakage. On the majority of our submarines this is not now possible. On the S–51, rammed while on the surface, the crew was not able to close a single door against the volume of water that rushed in through the hole in the battery room made by the City of Rome's bow. Everyone inside quickly drowned.

"On the S–4 the hole made by the Paulding was much smaller, the water entered the battery room less quickly. The six men in the torpedo room managed to close the door at the forward end of the battery room, while the men in the control room succeeded in shutting the afterdoor to the same compartment. The damaged compartment was thus isolated, and the remainder of the ship should have stayed dry and in the hands of the crew. Under such circumstances Lieutenant Commander Jones, left in possession of the control room, should have been as well off as either S–5 or S–48. But he was unable to remain. Chlorine gas or water (probably both) leaking in through the forward bulkhead, which is pierced by numerous cables and lines, soon forced the captain and crew to leave the control room and take refuge aft, where they closed and dogged down tight the door leading to the control room.

"Had Lieutenant Commander Jones been able to retain possession of his control room, the history of the S–4 would have been vastly different. This room is the heart of the ship. Here are the connections to the compressed-air banks with which he could have expelled all his fuel oil and all the water from his undamaged ballast tanks; he could certainly have brought the stern of his boat to the surface, if not the whole boat; and in any case so lightened up the bow that a slight pull from the special lifting cable in the Bushnell's stern would have brought up the S–4's bow. He could have fed air gradually from the banks to his own men and to the 6 men forward; and finally, had it been necessary, the 33 men with him could have passed up one by one through the escape trunk, to be assisted to the surface by divers. All this could have happened had the forward bulkhead of this room stayed tight against gas and water. It was possession of the control room that allowed the crews of the S–5 and the S–48 to lift their boats and save themselves; and it was the loss of the control room that meant death to the crews of the S–51 and the S–4.

"Consequently, the type of door on a submarine bulkhead and the tightness of the stuffing boxes around the numerous electric cables, pipes, and rods going through the bulkheads are of primary importance. The control room doors, at least, should be of the sliding 'long-arm type,' which require no releasing of catches, and which will cut through a heavy stream of water and still close. Leakage of chlorine gas through supposedly tight bulkheads nearly killed the crew of the S–5; fortunately, they got the stern of their boat up before chlorine forced them to abandon the control room. The crew of the S–4 were apparently not so lucky.

"A trapped submarine crew needs both a supply of fresh oxygen and the removal of the carbon dioxide from the foul air to live very long. Fresh oxygen can be obtained either from the compressed air in the ship's banks—provided the crew has access to the control room—or from oxygen flasks stored in each compartment. The S–4 had one such flask in each compartment—with the men evenly distributed through the boat this should suffice for about 72 hours. But fresh oxygen is not enough. If the quantity of carbon dioxide generated by breathing rises to 7 per cent, unconsciousness and death quickly follow. Consequently, if nothing is done to remove the foul air from the compartment, the results are fatal.

"For purification purposes, all submarines should—and most of ours during the war did—carry a supply of soda lime in each compartment. When this is exposed, it absorbs the carbon dioxide, and a moderate quantity will purify the air for several days. The S–4 had no soda lime aboard, though it appears that her commanding officer had previously asked for it. Soda lime in the after compartments might have prolonged life till after the divers came on Sunday; forward it might well have prolonged life till the weather moderated and diving was again possible on Wednesday.

"All our submarines have what is known as the compartment salvage air line; this starts from an external valve in the side of the conning tower and runs the length of the boat, with a branch leading into each compartment and discharging into it through a nonreturn valve and a gag valve. The intention is that the gag valves shall be left open so that, in case of accident, aid can be supplied from the outside. In the flooded compartments, this air is supposed to enter and expel the water, but, as it is practically certain that the damage that caused the flooding will extend to the top of the compartment, any air entering such a compartment will promptly escape and do no good.

"In the compartments where men are alive, if the outside air line is connected up, the men are supposed to take air when they want it and then close the valve in their room. However, the nonreturn valve prevents bad air from leaving the room, and it shortly happens that if the men take air this way, they will build up a pressure in their room that will soon equal the outside water pressure. The trapped men will then be subjected continuously to the same pressure as the diver; the latter can stand it only a few hours; the submarine survivors will probably not be able to stand it that long before they contract severe pneumonia from the heavy pressure and very quickly die.

"I can not recollect a case in the history of our submarine disasters where the compartment salvage air line has ever been of use. On the S–51 it was cut in half by the stem of the City of Rome; on the S–4 the survivors also reported it flooded on Sunday night. The compartment salvage air line should be removed immediately from all submarines, and replaced by either one or two valves attached directly to the hull in way of every room on the ship. In this way, even with one valve per compartment, fresh air could be supplied by a hose from the surface, bad air could be vented out, and the men in the room subjected only to a little above atmospheric pressure, under which they could survive indefinitely. Hot soup for food could be run through the same hose. Such an arrangement was urged on the Navy Department after the S–51 disaster by at least one inventor. It was not then adopted, but no more time should now be lost.

"Quick lifting of the boat is the most important feature in rescue work. Derricks and salvage ships are useless in such cases as S–51 and S–4, where rough water and deep water prevail. As an instance of this, when the S–51 sank off Block Island, the weather was good enough for divers to work steadily for the next five days, passing heavy wire slings under the S–51's stern, which was just clear of the mud. Nevertheless, the commercial salvage company that was hired at that time, and had its two largest derricks at Point Judith, 15 miles away, considered the weather too bad for derricks and refused to send the derricks out to the wreck until the fifth day, by which time it was certain all hands were dead.

"Pontoons can be used in any weather in which diving is possible. Derricks require that the water be smooth, or they will probably carry away their booms if they do not capsize. Pontoons are the quickest and surest method. After the S–51 job we designed a new type of pontoon that can be lowered and secured in less than an hour. (Most of the Navy pontoons have since been converted to this type.) It is possible for the Falcon to lower and secure a pontoon in less than an hour; six pontoons can be secured in less than 12 hours, and are enough to lift half of a completely flooded S boat; 12 pontoons can be secured in 24 hours and will lift the entire boat, even if completely flooded. But to do this requires 20 experienced divers, a well-drilled crew on the Falcon, and a quick means of attaching chains.

"In using any external lifting means attachments to the submarine are necessary. Our boats have none. On the S–51 it was necessary to dig tunnels under the boat to get the lifting chains under. With the ordinary means (a fire hose) our first tunnel took several weeks to dig, and several divers nearly lost their lives when the tunnel caved in on them. We then employed an improved nozzle, which allowed us to cut tunnels faster; the time was reduced to two days for a moderate length tunnel under the S–4. But even with this nozzle tunnelling is still slow and dangerous, and I marvel that men can be found who in cold blood will hazard the perils of burrowing in the darkness and the cold at the bottom of the sea through sand and mud beneath a buried submarine. For salvage work this method, while slow and dangerous, is at least feasible. For rescue work, when the lives of a trapped crew may depend on a quick lift, it is ridiculous.

"The strain in lifting on each chain of a pontoon is only 40 tons. It is easy to provide permanent padeyes on the side of every submarine, properly spaced to take pontoon chains. For an S boat 12 such padeyes on each side will permit attaching 12 pontoons in 24 hours; the weight of all the padeyes is less than 6 tons. The need for tunnelling is eliminated; the divers can quickly shackle the pontoon chains to the submarine and with a proper salvage crew and 24 hours of moderate weather the boat will be afloat again. But it must be remembered that to do this requires sufficient divers, a salvage ship well drilled and not too far away, and a set of pontoons somewhere in the vicinity.

"Deep-sea diving is vastly different from diving in shallow water. Our Navy has developed the art; practically every deep-water diver in this country was trained in the Navy or by Navy instructors. Except for ex-Navy men, there are probably not half a dozen qualified deep-sea divers in this country. But even in the Navy such divers are not so common as they should be. For the S–51 job it took more than a week to gather up 12; meanwhile we could find only 4 qualified civilians. Trained divers in large numbers constitute a major safety factor for submarines. A salvage ship like the Falcon should always carry at least 12 divers in her crew. By constant drill, both with divers and pontoons, the captain of the Falcon will be able to swing into action when a submarine sinks with the speed and precision of a battleship going into action against the enemy.

"How far the Falcon was from this state of readiness can be judged from the fact that on the day the S–4 sank there was only one qualified diver attached to her crew—Chief Boatswain's Mate Carr. The Falcon had not handled a pontoon since the day the S–51 came up a year and a half before. The pontoons themselves were scattered—six in New York and four in Norfolk—not enough in either place to raise a submarine. The four in Norfolk had not yet been converted to the new design and were slow and dangerous to handle. For proper preparation there should be a complete set of 12 pontoons in every major district where submarines operate. Two hundred pontoons, more than 16 complete sets, can be built for less than the cost of one moderate-sized Vulcan. These 16 sets scattered over our Atlantic and Pacific coasts will insure that pontoons are close at hand wherever submarines operate.

"The Navy has two salvage ships, the Falcon and the Widgeon, one in the Atlantic and one in the Pacific. These boats, converted mine sweepers, are ideal for the purpose, being small enough to handle easily and moor quickly in a seaway. They can hold position when a larger ship would be swept away by the wind, but though much crowded, they can carry all necessary machinery. Under Lieutenant Hartley the Falcon has done wonders, but really to fulfill her purpose such a ship must be given ample opportunity for drill. In addition, there should be at least four such ships properly to cover the areas where submarines work.

"And finally, in case a boat can not be raised, or the crew must be taken out before the raising equipment can arrive, the last desperate means must be provided to allow the crew to escape from the boat as it lies at the bottom of the sea. An airlock is the answer. This is a small trunk with one hatch below opening to the boat and another, either at the top or side, opening to the sea. The members of the crew enter the lock from below, one at a time, and close the lower hatch. Then either by compressed air or by admitting water to the lock, they raise the pressure inside till it balances the outer sea pressure, when the hatch to the sea can be opened. The man inside is then supposed to float up with the air released from the lock. The other members of the crew inside then close the outer door by a wire attached to it, drain out the water from the lock, open the lower hatch, and the next man enters.

"This is the theory. The practice is far different. In deep water the pressure would so collapse a man's lungs that he would have no buoyancy and would sink instead of rise. In deep water such escape has never been effected. In shallow water, it might be done. The only instance I know of where it was successful occurred on the British K–13 when the captain and first officer attempted to escape to give warning of the loss of the boat and her condition. Here the top of the conning tower was only 50 feet below the surface, and the pressure was not great. One officer rose successfully; the other was killed in the attempt.

"Each submarine has an air lock in the conning tower, but it often happens that the crew can not get to that. In addition, there should be one at each end of the boat, so that a crew, forced to get out or die from chlorine or because of lack of air to last them till divers or rescuers can arrive, can at least take this last desperate gamble with death. If divers are at hand but can not lift the boat, then the locks can be used with comparative safety. In such a case, the diver stands outside the lock, holding an extra diving helmet heavily weighted down and with air hose attached and blowing, ready to slip it over the head of each man as he comes out, before lifting him to the surface. In this way, one at a time, divers can rescue the entire crew of a submarine, provided the crew can get to air lock. To make this possible, all submarines should have at least three, one at each end, as well as the present one in the conning tower."

Mr. CELLER. Secretary of Navy Wilbur, in a letter to me September 24, 1926, said, "Raising the S–51 was good, arduous work ably performed." He goes on to say:

"Advancement in rank is reserved in other than very exceptional cases for especially meritorious service in war. It is the practice, however, to advance in rating enlisted men for efficient service in time of peace."

Raising the S–51 (and subsequently the S–4) was an exceptional case. Furthermore, it is time to recognize distinguished and meritorious service in peace time. Admiral Plunkett recognized that Ellsberg's achievement was of the highest merit and recommended accordingly advancement in rank. Furthermore, advancement went to Peary and Byrd and Lindbergh for peace-time service.

Admiral Plunkett, under date of April 17, 1928, writes me that his original recommendations in regard to Lieutenant Commander Ellsberg, Lieutenant Hartley, and Chief Boatswain Hawes, whose splendid work raised the S–51, were still good and that—"I was fully convinced that they had done a magnificent job. Much of the work they did was beyond what could ordinarily be expected of officers and men, and they had not hesitated to risk their lives in their efforts to solve the difficult problem which faced them."

Furthermore, Ellsberg in the S–51 expedition served in every capacity. He was salvage officer charged with technical responsibility for the expedition; he supervised and directed every diver on every dive made on the job; he acted as a draftsman in working out the designs; he acted as a seaman in handling the pontoons and the boats on the surface; as an inventor he perfected the existing inefficient underwater cutting torch so that it became a reliable salvage instrument; as a diver he did a fair proportion of the actual cutting with underwater torch on the S–51. He made several dives on the S–51 in emergencies when conditions were so bad that no other diver would go down, and the reason that the divers stuck to the job when conditions were desperate and success looked hopeless to them was mainly because he went down to the bottom of the sea with the divers and each diver knew that he was never asked to tackle a job that Ellsberg was not ready to undertake himself if necessary (no other naval officer in charge of a salvage job has ever before done this); and he personally worked out the salvage method and persuaded the Navy Department (with Admiral Plunkett's enthusiastic backing) to let the Navy do the job instead of entering into a ridiculous contract with a private salvage company whereby the Navy was to furnish at its own expense practically everything (including divers) and then pay the private company a fantastic price (more than the job cost the Navy) for the privilege of having the private company supervise the job.

The morale of any military organization is improved by promotion for achievement, not by stating that it is contrary to department policy to reward exceptional service. The Navy Department is quick to punish officers for their lapses, and demotion through loss of numbers quickly follows catastrophe through negligence or bad judgment. If the department's policy is to demote officers for their faults, fairness and consistency require that it approve the promotion of such officers as go outside the ordinary routine to risk everything to achieve success in hazardous and exceptional undertakings.

The raising of the S–51 from its grave in the open sea was an undertaking generally considered impossible in engineering and naval circles both in the United States and in foreign countries. (It was authorized by the Navy Department not because success seemed possible, but to appease a storm of public criticism raised by numerous disasters to the Navy at the time—the destruction of the Shenandoah, the loss of Commander Rodgers and the PN–9 off Honolulu, the Trenton explosion.) The only comparable operation ever attempted in the raising of a large submarine from deep water in the open sea (the S–5 off Delaware in 1920) was a total failure after nine months of work and was abandoned when the public had forgotten the matter.

The successful accomplishment on the S–51 brought luster to America and to the Navy.

The raising of the S–4, made possible primarily because of Ellsberg's work, again proclaimed to the world an outstanding achievement.

Recognition by Congress of this type of service is essential.

Mr. CELLER. We must remember that Lieutenant Commander Ellsberg would have been in the ordinary course of events elevated to the rank of commander if it had not been for the enactment of the equalization bill. In a sense we can almost admit that he would have been a commander so that there would not probably be any recognition in his advancement to the rank of commander.

Mr. BRITTEN. Commander Ellsberg, it has just been suggested that some members of the committee might like to report a bill that would make you a commander in the active Navy. Would you prefer that sort of recognition; would you care to return to the Navy as a commander?

Lieutenant Commander ELLSBERG. I have always prized my service in the Navy very highly and if I ever have another chance to do something for the Navy I will seize it. What I have done since resigning was for our Navy and the men in it.

However, I must decline from two points of view. The first is that I think it would be unfair to my old classmates at Annapolis who are now in the Navy to take a man who has resigned the service and been out for several years and restore him. Even though that man had not sought reinstatement, still it would cause hard feeling to bring him back into the Navy at an advanced rank. You might say that such action was being taken for a special reason, but nevertheless, having been out of the Navy, there would probably, even though unwittingly, be in the minds of those officers a feeling that somebody was being taken from civil life and put ahead of them.

My second point of view is industrial. I did not seek to leave the Navy. After working on the submarine S–51 job two months and when the prospects of success were very dark, indeed, I received an offer from a commercial concern, which offer I had not sought, to become their chief engineer. They desired that I resign immediately and take over their work. I considered the proposal a while and told the concern that I simply must finish the job in connection with the submarine S–51. With their consent I remained in the Navy six or seven months after that, and at considerable loss to their work, in order to finish the job in connection with the S–51.

I do not mind saying that I think it would be unfair to my associates in the industrial world now, those who have stood by me and behind me in the past and given me this opportunity, to tell them that now that Congress offers me an opportunity to get back into the service at an advanced rank I am going to leave them and go back to the service.

I regret to say that from both the Navy and the industrial side I hardly think it would be fair to anybody if I should return to the Navy. On the other hand, if I should remain in the Volunteer Naval Reserve Force my services would be available to the Navy in times of emergency, just as they were available in this last catastrophe. I do not mind saying that I think that such is the best solution. That is the answer to your question, Mr. Chairman.

There are a few other remarks I would like to make later, with your permission.

Mr. BRITTEN. You may proceed right now, if you will.

Mr. MILLER. That is a remarkable statement by the gentleman.

Mr. HALE. It certainly is a fine statement.

Mr. MILLER. It is magnanimous from every point of view.

Lieutenant Commander ELLSBERG. It is difficult, as you gentlemen appreciate, of course, for anybody to speak about himself, therefore I shall speak principally about Lieutenant Hartley and Boatswain Hawes. I have worked with those two officers on two different jobs in situations that presented great danger. I have a very vivid recollection of Boatswain Hawes risking his own life in trying to make successful the salvage of the sunken submarine S–51, and that at a time when success seemed very remote indeed. I would hate to think that because some years in the past he took an examination for ensign and failed on three subjects that anybody should say now he is not fit to be an ensign in the regular Navy. I hope you will consider that.

As regards Lieutenant Hartley, he came into the service as an enlisted man long ago when I was a small child. He became a quartermaster. During the war, because of his qualifications, he was made a temporary officer, and afterwards he was given a permanent commission. I know of no officer who has come from the ranks who is better qualified to be an officer than is Lieutenant Hartley. He is in every way qualified to be an officer of the Navy. But he is not a young man. He is probably 10 or 12 years older than I am. His service in the Navy can not last much longer, because under the action of law, I think, he will be forced out after a certain number of years in the service.

Lieutenant Hartley was a lieutenant during both of these salvage operations. His knowledge of seamanship and his knowledge of weather and his handling of the Falcon on several occasions prevented her being lost and the submarine from being sunk again.

On one particular occasion we were coming down the East River after the submarine S–51 had been raised. We were in sight of the navy yard and thought all our difficulties were over. The Falcon was towing astern of the S–51 and constantly pumping air into her to keep her afloat.

There was a distance of only 150 feet between the two vessels. We had taken on a civilian pilot stationed on the leading tugboat to take us down the East River. The pilot left his course, tried to pass between two reefs, and stranded the S–51. She stopped dead. You can imagine how short a time it takes for a ship to travel 150 feet and we were only that far astern of the submarine. We had only six seconds, but in that time Lieutenant Hartley had his engines going "Full speed astern" and had swung to port enough to miss the S–51. I tell you that if he had hit the S–51 in the stern, the S–51 would have sunk, a total wreck. There would have been no possibility of raising her. She would be there to-day, a danger to navigation. Instead of that, Lieutenant's Hartley's skill allowed us to bring her safely in.

Lieutenant Hartley, moreover, is a diving expert. He used to be a diver. However, he was too old to do any diving in connection with salvage operations of the S–51 and the S–4.

When you consider that he is not an Annapolis man and is consequently much older than lieutenants from Annapolis, you can see that promoting him 5 or 10 numbers does not mean much. You would do nothing but absolute justice by rewarding him, whether it meant 400 numbers two years ago or 200 numbers now, by making him a lieutenant commander as of the date suggested in this bill. I am sure that you will find no criticism of that action by officers or enlisted men of the Navy.

Hartley's value to the Navy is far beyond the value of the average lieutenant, even though Hartley did not come from Annapolis. When the next submarine disaster comes, I am of the opinion that the Navy will have to rely upon Lieutenant Hartley, and it ought to give him some appropriate rank. If he were given the rank of lieutenant commander there would not be so many officers with higher rank around him to interfere with his operations when he goes out in charge of salvage work on the Falcon. So much for Hartley.

As regards myself, I can only say a little. I think Admiral Leigh has made a few slight errors unwittingly. I was actually the senior lieutenant commander in the line of promotion in the Construction Corps at the time of the accident to the S–51 and at the time of my resignation in December, 1926. However, the Navy register, published before that, may have shown me as No. 2 on the list of lieutenant commanders in the Naval Construction Corps. The only man ahead of me had been passed over repeatedly by all selection boards and could not have been properly considered in line for promotion when the S–51 was raised. I was therefore No. 1 on the list. Two or three vacancies occurred in the Construction Corps the very next month. You passed the equalization bill in June, which abolished all future vacancies, and we raised the submarine S–51 in July. Then one naval constructor with rank of captain died and another rear admiral retired. If you had not passed the equalization bill, that would have made two vacancies, to one of which I would have been promoted even if I had never done anything special. If I had, so to speak, simply done my ordinary duty and kept out of trouble I would have been promoted to commander very shortly after July 1, 1926. I would have been promoted even if I had never seen a submarine disaster or had anything to do with trying to raise one.

Therefore, if it is a question of promotion of one rank, it seems to me that I should be promoted from commander to captain in the Naval Reserve Force, and that would mean nothing to officers on the active list.

I feel that if the Navy Department has not, as a result of the World War, actually recommended any officers for promotion, the fault is the Navy Department's and not that of the officers concerned. It would seem to show that the American Navy is proceeding upon a wrong principle. Nothing will so bolster up the morale and achieve results as a prompt recognition of exceptional service. A famous general who appreciated that more than anybody else, so it seems, took the rabble and the mob and made of them the best army of its day. I refer to Napoleon. If a man of extraordinary qualifications did anything well in the army of Napoleon, he was promptly promoted, so that when trouble happened Napoleon had a man on the job who could handle it.

I expect that to apply to both Lieutenant Hartley and Boatswain Hawes. I trust that you will consider this.

Perhaps our military policy is all wrong. If so, it is not the fault of the officers who have done the things that Admiral Leigh has recited. It is the fault of the Navy Department, it seems to me.

I should like to know whether the department as the result of the World War, recommended anybody for promotion? Perhaps it has not, but in spite of that several people have been retired by the Congress in an advanced rank.

As has been stated, Commander Byrd was a lieutenant when he left the service and after retirement he became a lieutenant commander. Then Congress, by its own action, made him a commander on the retired list. His was an outstanding case.

I will say for the men who worked on these two submarine jobs that for a man to expose his life under the conditions that we faced on the S–51 and the S–4, on the surface and on the bottom of the sea required a greater amount of courage over a longer period than it does, we will say, for a person in the heat of action on a battle field or on a battleship to perform an act of bravery that may suitably be rewarded by a medal. It requires a cold courage over a long period to keep a man going in the face of danger for the several months required for the carrying through of a job like salvaging the S–51 and the S–4 successfully.

As for myself, I can earn my living on the outside, but Boatswain Hawes and Lieutenant Hartley will stay in the Navy until they are retired. Earnestly, I should like to see them get, not just a few numbers, but a substantial recognition that will be worth something to them and will be an example and inspiration to the officers and men who are in the Navy.

I do not think of anything else I have to say, unless gentlemen of the committee care to question me.

Mr. BRITTEN. Inasmuch as it is 12.30, let us adjourn to meet at the call of the chairman.

Thereupon at 12.30 o'clock p. m., Friday, April 20, 1928, the committee adjourned to meet at the call of the chairman.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to incorporate therein a short editorial appearing in the Wisconsin Agriculturalist and a letter from the president of the Milwaukee Association of Commerce on the Muscle Shoals legislation.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following short editorial appearing in the Wisconsin Agriculturist, and a letter from the president of the Milwaukee Association of Commerce on the Muscle Shoals legislation:

MILWAUKEE ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE,
May 14, 1928.

Hon. JOHN C. SCHAFER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: It is our understanding that the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 16th instant, will take further action in regard to the Muscle Shoals bill, Union Calendar No. 324, S. J. Res. 46.

Our national affairs committee, composed of representative Milwaukee business leaders, and the chairman of which is Max W. Babb, Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., has to-day carefully considered this bill by request of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and of Wisconsin business interests.

As a result the Milwaukee Association of Commerce is opposed to this proposed legislation on the premise that it is unwise and unsound for the Government to engage in the business of manufacturing and selling commercial fertilizer in competition with private industry.

It is our belief, furthermore, that the Government should without exception refrain from undertaking any phase of business which can be successfully conducted by private enterprise.

It is our earnest hope, therefore, that you will deem it consistent to oppose the passage of this legislation not only for the reasons above stated but because of our understanding that in the event this legislation is not enacted at the present session of Congress, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States will cause a complete investigation to be made of the matter and the result of which will doubtless be made available to the Congress.

Assuming that such action might be consistent on your part, we should be glad also to have you cause the comment herein to be read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Yours very truly,

O. F. STOTZER.

MUSCLE SHOALS FERTILIZER BILL

Many schemes have been projected to utilize the power plant at Muscle Shoals. Disposition of the plant has been before Congress ever since the close of the World War.

The bill now before Congress has been hailed with joy by some farm leaders and politicians because it seeks to put the Federal Government in the fertilizer business. It proposes to provide working capital, amounting to $10,000,000 so that a corporation may utilize the full power of the Muscle Shoals plant for making fertilizer which shall be sold for cost, spot cash at the plant. It also authorizes the corporation to sell power, the proceeds to be applied to reducing the cost of fertilizers made. It also proves that new sources of rock phosphate may be acquired and operated.

Will such a measure help farmers in general? We do not think so. Most farmers do not buy fertilizers for spot cash. Most farmers prefer to deal with their local agents. Most farmers probably could not secure their supplies from the Shoals plant because Government operation in business has not proved its efficiency.

The plan sets a dangerous precedent. Why not have the Government take charge of the farms as well as the fertilizer business? Perhaps it could succeed as well as it did with the railroads, but probably not. The experience with Government railroad management is not a strong recommendation for Government in business.

The investment in the fertilizer business is some $300,000,000, and many thousands of people are employed. The production at Muscle Shoals would not supply the domestic demand, but the unfair competition of production at public expense would seriously affect the manufacturers who are now doing a good job and handling the business satisfactorily and at a fair cost. It is sincerely to be hoped that Government interest in fertilizer or any other business will not go beyond the realm of sensible regulation.

RANK OF OFFICERS IN THE ARMY AND NAVY

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 9961) to equalize the rank of officers in positions of great responsibility in the Army and Navy, and ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DEFINITION OF TERMS "CHILD" AND "CHILDREN" AS USED IN THE ACTS OF MAY 18, 1920, AND JUNE 10, 1922

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12449) to define the terms "child" and "children" as used in the acts of May 18, 1920, and June 10, 1922, and ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 10, strike out the comma after the word "children" and the word "stepchildren."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL MILITARY PARK AT BATTLE FIELD OF MONOCACY, MD.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 11722) to establish a national military park at Monocacy, Md., and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to commemorate the Battle of Monocacy, Md., and to preserve for historical purposes the breastworks, earthworks, walls, or other defenses or shelters used by the armies therein, the battle field at Monocacy, in the State of Maryland, is hereby declared a national military park whenever the title to the lands deemed necessary by the Secretary of War shall have been acquired by the United States and the usual jurisdiction over the lands and roads of the same shall have been granted to the United States by the State of Maryland.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to cause condemnation proceedings to be instituted in the name of the United States under the provisions of the act of August 1, 1888, entitled "An act to authorize condemnation of lands for sites for public buildings, and for other purposes" (25 Stat. L. 357), to acquire title to the lands, interests therein, or rights pertaining thereto within the said Monocacy Battle Field National Military Park, and the United States shall be entitled to immediate possession upon the filing of the petition in condemnation in the United States District Court for the District of Maryland: Provided, That when the owner of such lands, interests therein, or rights pertaining thereto shall fix a price for the same which, in the opinion of the commission hereinafter referred to and the Secretary of War, shall be reasonable, the Secretary may purchase the same without further delay: Provided further, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to accept, on behalf of the United States, donations of lands, interests therein, or rights pertaining thereto required for the Monocacy Battle Field National Military Park: And provided further, That no public money shall be expended for title to any lands until a written opinion of the Attorney General shall be had in favor of the validity of title thereto.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to enter into leases with the owners of such of the lands, works, defenses, and buildings thereon within the Monocacy Battle Field National Military Park, as in his discretion it is unnecessary to forthwith acquire title to, and such leases shall be on such terms and conditions as the Secretary of War may prescribe, and may contain options to purchase, subject to later acceptance, if, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is as economical to purchase as condemn title to the property: Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into agreements upon such nominal terms as he may prescribe, permitting the present owners or their tenants to occupy or cultivate their present holdings, upon condition that they will preserve the present breastworks, earthworks, walls, defenses, shelters, buildings, and roads, and the present outlines of the battle fields, and that they will only cut trees or underbrush or disturb or remove the soil, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, and that they will assist in caring for and protecting all tablets, monuments, or such other artificial works as may from time to time be erected by proper authority: Provided further, That if such agreements to lease cover any lands the title to which shall have been acquired by the United States, the proceeds from such agreements shall be applied by the Secretary of War toward the maintenance of the park.

SEC. 4. The affairs of the Monocacy Battle Field National Military Park shall, subject to the supervision and direction of the Secretary of War, be in charge of three commissioners, consisting of Army officers, civilians, or both, to be appointed by the Secretary of War, one of whom shall be designated as chairman and another as secretary of the commission.

SEC. 5. It shall be the duties of the commissioners, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to superintend the opening or repair of such roads as may be necessary to the purposes of the park, and to ascertain and mark with historical tablets or otherwise, as the Secretary of War may determine, all breastworks, earthworks, walls, or other defenses or shelters, lines of battle, location of troops, buildings, and other historical points of interest within the park or in its vicinity, and the said commission in establishing the park shall have authority, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to employ such labor and service at rates to be fixed by the Secretary of War, and to obtain such supplies and materials as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. The commission, acting through the Secretary of War, is authorized to receive gifts and contributions from States, Territories, societies, organizations, and individuals for the Monocacy Battle Field National Military Park: Provided, That all contributions of money received shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States and credited to a fund to be designated "Monocacy Battle Field National Military Park Fund," which fund shall be applied to and expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. It shall be lawful for the authorities of any State having had troops engaged at the battle of Monocacy to enter upon the lands and approaches of the Monocacy Battle Field National Military Park for the purpose of ascertaining and marking the lines of battle of troops engaged therein: Provided, That before any such lines are permanently designated the position of the lines and the proposed methods of marking them by monuments, tablets, or otherwise, including the design and inscription for the same, shall be submitted to the Secretary of War and shall first receive written approval of the Secretary, which approval shall be based upon formal written reports to be made to him in each case by the commissioners of the park: Provided, That no discrimination shall be made against any State as to the manner of designating lines, but any grant made to any State by the Secretary of War may be used by any other State.

SEC. 8. If any person shall, except by permission of the Secretary of War, destroy, mutilate, deface, injure, or remove any monument, column, statue, memorial structure, or work of art that shall be erected or placed upon the grounds of the park by lawful authority, or shall destroy or remove any fence, railing, inclosure, or other work for the protection of ornament of said park, or any portion thereof, or shall destroy, cut, hack, bark, break down, or otherwise injure any tree, bush, or shrubbery that may be growing upon said park, or shall cut down or fell or remove any timber, battle relic, tree or trees growing or being upon said park, or hunt within the limits of the park, or shall remove or destroy any breastworks, earthworks, walls, or other defenses or shelter or any part thereof constructed by the armies formerly engaged in the battles on the lands or approaches to the park, any person so offending and found guilty thereof, before any United States commissioner or court, justice of the peace of the county in which the offense may be committed, or any other court of competent jurisdiction, shall for each and every such offense forfeit and pay a fine, in the discretion of the said United States commissioner or court, justice of the peace, or other court, according to the aggravation of the offense, of not less than $5 nor more than $500, one half for the use of the park and the other half to the informant, to be enforced and recovered before such United States commissioner or court, justice of the peace, or other court, in like manner as debts of like nature are now by law recoverable in the several counties where the offense may be committed.

SEC. 9. The Secretary of War, subject to the approval of the President, shall have the power to make and shall make all needful rules and regulations for the care of the park and for the establishment and marking of lines of battle and other historical features of the park.

SEC. 10. Upon completion of the acquisition of the land and the work of the commission the Secretary of War shall render a report thereon to Congress, and thereafter the park shall be placed in charge of a superintendent at a salary to be fixed by the Secretary of War and paid out of the appropriation available for the maintenance of the park.

SEC. 11. To enable the Secretary of War to begin to carry out the provisions of this act, including the condemnation, purchase, or lease of the necessary land, surveys, maps, marking the boundaries of the park, opening, constructing, or repairing necessary roads, pay and expenses of commissioners, salaries for labor and services, traveling expenses, supplies, and materials, the sum of $50,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to remain available until expended, and disbursements under this act shall be annually reported by the Secretary of War to Congress.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider by Mr. MORIN was laid on the table.

RESERVE DIVISION OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 11683) to create the reserve division of the War Department, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much to object to the present consideration of this bill. Owing to its importance and far-reaching possibilities, I feel that it should go over until the subject can have more time for deliberate consideration. No hearings have been held on the bill by the House Military Committee and I have been informed that certain organizations desire to present their views on the proposal.

Mr. JAMES. There have been hearings on the bill in the Senate.

Mr. SPEAKS. But no hearings in the House. The Senate hearings were not satisfactory, owing to the absence of persons desiring to oppose the bill.

Mr. JAMES. There were no requests for hearings, and they said they did not want hearings because the evidence had all been produced in the hearings in the Senate, and they said it was very urgent that the bill be passed at the present session.

Mr. SPEAKS. Because of the interest displayed in the bill by my friend from Michigan, I hesitate to object. However, I feel it a duty under the circumstances to ask that it go over for the present. I wish it understood that I am not unfriendly to the reserves.

Mr. JAMES. Of course, the gentleman from Ohio understands that if I were to insist upon my rights we might consume about two hours in a discussion of this bill. Many other bills are following this one in which Members of the House are interested, including a bill sponsored by the gentleman from Ohio, which I favor, and as I do not want Members of the House to suffer because of my insisting upon my rights, I will therefore withdraw the unanimous-consent request that my bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I will offer an amendment which may cure the difficulty raised by the gentleman from Ohio, and with which amendment I would be glad to vote for the bill; and if it is not adopted I should oppose it. I move to strike out, on page 2, line 12——

Mr. GARNER of Texas. The bill is not before the House for consideration yet.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SPEAKS. I was prepared, Mr. Speaker, to offer the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New York, but considering conferences I have had with representatives of groups greatly interested in the bill, I feel under the necessity of objecting for the present.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the bill.

REQUIRING CERTAIN WAR DEPARTMENT CONTRACTS TO BE IN WRITING

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12352) to require certain contracts entered into by the Secretary of War, or by officers authorized by him to make them, to be in writing, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up the bill H. R. 12352, on the House Calendar, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter whenever contracts in excess of $500 in amount which are not to be performed within 60 days are made on behalf of the Government by the Secretary of War, or by officers authorized by him to make them, such contracts shall be reduced to writing and signed by the contracting parties. In all other cases contracts shall be entered into under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RECOGNIZING AVIATION ACCOMPLISHMENTS

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 4235) to amend section 12 of the act entitled "An act to provide more effectively for the national defense by increasing the efficiency of the Air Corps of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1926, on the Union Calendar, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up the bill S. 4235, on the Union Calendar, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 12 of the act approved July 2, 1926, entitled "An act to provide more effectively for the national defense by increasing the efficiency of the Air Corps of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting after the words "in an aerial flight" the following: "and to citizens of foreign countries, visitors to the United States, who have distinguished themselves by extraordinary achievement in an aerial flight or flights made at least in part within the bounds of the United States or its possessions."

With the following committee amendment:

After line 2, page 2, insert the following as a new section:

"SEC. 2. That the first paragraph of section 127a of the national defense act, as amended and approved June 4, 1920, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 127a. Miscellaneous provisions: Hereafter no detail, rating, or assignment of an officer shall carry advanced rank, except as otherwise specifically provided herein: Provided, That in lieu of the 50 per cent increase of pay provided for in this act any officer who has heretofore been announced in War Department orders as having qualified on or before December 31, 1913, as a military aviator or any officer upon whom the rating of military aviator has heretofore been conferred for having specially distinguished himself in time of war in active operations against the enemy, shall, while on duty which requires him to participate regularly and frequently in aerial flights, receive the pay, allowances, and additional pay as provided by the act of June 3, 1916, and the act of July 24, 1917, for the rating of military aviator. At any time after the passage of this act any officer who has heretofore been announced in War Department orders as having qualified as a military aviator on or before December 31, 1913, shall, if he make application therefor to the President, be retired from active service and be placed upon the retired list. The retired pay of any officer who has heretofore been announced in War Department orders as having qualified as a military aviator on or before December 31, 1913, shall be 75 per cent of all the pay and allowances, including flying pay, of the grade in which he is retired. No extra pay or allowances shall accrue under the provisions of this section for services rendered prior to the passage thereof.'"

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker. I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 7, after the period add a new section to be known as section 3, to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to present the distinguished-flying cross to Lieuts. Lowell H. Smith, Leslie P. Arnold, E. H. Nelson, and John Harding, jr., of the United States Army, in recognition of their extraordinary achievement in making the first round-the-world flight by airplane, covering a distance of approximately 28,000 miles."

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order against the amendment. Has any consideration been given this matter by the committee?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No. Let me say this on the point of order. The committee has brought in an amendment to amend the title so as to read:

An act for recognizing aviation accomplishments.

If this be an act for recognizing aviation accomplishments, it certainly is in order to offer an amendment to the act which would confer the distinguished-flying cross on the four Army aviators who made the first round-the-world flight, covering a distance of some 28,000 miles. On the merits of the proposition, let me say that at the time these four Army flyers accomplished this extraordinary feat, we did not have the distinguished-flying cross. These four aviators accomplished this great feat in 1924. It was not until the passage of the Air Corps act in March, 1926, that we brought into being the distinguished-flying cross. These flyers were given other recognition. As I recall, they were tendered the thanks of Congress, but they did not get the distinguished-flying cross because it was not in existence at the time.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Does the 1926 act authorize the President of the United States to bestow the distinguished-flying cross at his discretion?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; there is a limitation, and, as I understand it, that limitation limits the President's authority to conferring the cross on men who are now in the Army. Some of these flyers have left the Army.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, permit me to suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that the name of one of the aviators be stated in full—Eric H. Nelson.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I think the first name should be stated. It is stated in the other cases.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to amend my amendment by striking out the letter "E." and inserting in place of it the word "Eric," so that it will read "Eric H. Nelson."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. May I ask the gentleman whether Lieutenants Maitland and Hegenberger have had the distinguished-flying cross bestowed upon them for their great flight to Hawaii?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I do not know; but under the present law the President of the United States has the authority to confer the cross on these two flyers. I think it has been bestowed, but I would not say for sure. These flyers are still in the service, and in my judgment should have the cross.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. If it has not been done, it is eminently fit that it should be done.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Absolutely.

Mr. REECE. What does the gentleman think about the propriety of also authorizing the distinguished-flying cross to be awarded to the World War aces?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I think we ought to take that matter up as a separate proposition. Speaking of the World War aces, I do not know offhand how many we have, and I doubt if the gentleman himself could name them here this afternoon. I hope the gentleman will not inject that into this bill at this time.

Mr. REECE. I shall probably not press the suggestion, but we seem to be giving a great deal of attention to the bestowal of decorations and honors on those who have distinguished themselves in peace-time aviation. It has reached a point where I am much impressed with the fact that we did very little to honor men who distinguished themselves and added glory to their country during the World War, and we are now precluded from honoring those great flyers. We had as great flyers during the war as we have now. Their achievements were just as wonderful as those that have been made by peace-time flyers, and I regret that some of these honors can not be bestowed upon them. For instance, there is Eddie Rickenbacker, our ace of aces, for whom we have done but little and who deserves any honor which may be in our power to give. There can be no more daring flight, flights that are comparable with those war-time flights, that have been made in peace time.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I will say to the gentleman that I will do everything I can to secure recognition for those flyers.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I reserved a point of order for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that we are here this afternoon with very few Members present, and are passing these bills by unanimous consent, and whenever you begin to enlarge the scope of these bills without their having had committee consideration we are very likely to pass some amendments that might not be entirely acceptable to the membership of the House. I will not make the point of order, but I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN], in view of the fact that we are passing these bills virtually by unanimous consent, that he ought not to call up any that will provoke controversy. At the proper time I want to see all of our brave flyers properly rewarded.

Mr. KETCHAM. How does it happen that Lieut. Leigh Wade, who, if I have the matter correctly in mind, was a member of this very party, is omitted from this list?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. This is the list of those who started out on the flight and finished it.

Mr. KETCHAM. He finished his flight.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I am not so advised by the War Department.

Mr. KETCHAM. He started and finished the flight with great credit. He is a constituent of mine, and I would not like to see bills passed honoring all these men without including his name.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act for recognizing aviation accomplishments."

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a commission of five distinguished citizens of the United States to whom Orville Wright, and all other persons in any way interested, shall be publicly invited to present evidence as to which was the first successful heavier-than-air flying machine.

SEC. 2. That said commission shall serve without compensation but shall be permitted actual expenses, including one round trip travel pay from their respective homes to Washington, D. C., and subsistence not exceeding $10 a day for not exceeding 10 days while in Washington.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to furnish the necessary clerical and stenographic assistance for the use of said commission; and the testimony, records, documents, and minutes of proceedings of said commission shall be preserved by the Air Corps of the United States Army.

SEC. 4. That the report and conclusions of said commission shall be filed with the President of the United States not later than November 1, 1928, and shall in turn be transmitted to the Congress on the first Monday in December, 1928, and 10,000 copies thereof shall be printed and equally allotted to the Members of Congress through the folding room.

SEC. 5. That an appropriation not exceeding $2,000 is hereby authorized to carry out the provisions of this joint resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter, with an accompanying article, from Prof. Edward B. Huntington, of Harvard University, on the apportionment of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following letter, with an accompanying article from Prof. Edward B. Huntington, of Harvard University, on the apportionment of Representatives:

CAMBRIDGE, March 31, 1928.

Hon. FREDERICK W. DALLINGER,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The question of the comparative merits of various methods of apportionment has often been supposed to be of such mathematical complexity as to discourage investigation by individual Congressmen.

Since 1921, however, a method has become available which is much simpler and more direct than any of the processes heretofore used. It is now possible, for the first time, for each individual Congressman to satisfy himself by a direct test that an actual apportionment for which he votes—no matter where it came from nor how it was computed—can not be improved by any transfer of a Representative from any State to any other State.

It is no longer necessary to determine in advance any arbitrary "ratio for division," or to discuss any "quotients" or "remainders." To settle any dispute between two States the only data now required are the populations of the two States directly concerned, and the proposed assignments to each.

This modern method is the method of equal proportions. It has been indorsed by the advisory committee to the Director of the Census, and by the consensus of opinion of practically all other competent scientific authorities. It was specified in the only apportionment bill which came before Congress last year, and at that time (according to Hasbrouck's recent book on Party Government, p. 126) it was "pretty generally favored over the method of major fractions, which had been the basis of the 1911 apportionment." Since it is still comparatively new, however, and therefore probably not wholly familiar to many Members of Congress, I take the liberty of handing you a short pamphlet containing a simple explanation of it in nontechnical language.

An exhaustive mathematical analysis, readily accessible in the technical journals, has shown that the method of equal proportions is the only method which has no bias in favor of either the large States or the small States. The so-called method of major fractions has a systematic bias in favor of the large States. (An extreme example of how great this difference might be is shown on p. 8.) There is another method which has an equally strong bias in favor of the small States. Between these two stands the method of equal proportions, holding the balance even among all the States, as the Constitution clearly intended.

My own interest in this problem is a purely scientific one, and I hope that the inclosed pamphlet may help to clarify a situation that has become much confused by needless discussion of obsolete technical details. If there are any questions about the mathematical aspects of this problem which you would care to ask, I shall be happy to answer them.

Very truly yours,

EDWARD V. HUNTINGTON,
Professor of Mechanics, Harvard University,

A SIMPLE EXPLANATION OF THE METHOD OF EQUAL PROPORTIONS

By E. V. Huntington, Harvard University

IMPORTANCE OF THE PROBLEM

The question of how best to adjust the fractions which unavoidably occur in the apportionment of Representatives in Congress has been a baffling perplexity to successive Congresses for more than a hundred years.

Up to about 1921 there was practically no information available concerning the tests which a good apportionment should satisfy. Various empirical processes of computation had to be employed, most of which were later discarded. Since 1921, however, a scientific study of the problem has made it possible to state in clear and simple nonmathematical language all the tests between which Congress must make its choice; so that now for the first time Congress is in possession of adequate information on which a sound decision can be based.

Moreover, it is now for the first time that the problem has become an urgent one. In former decades any State that felt aggrieved could be pacified by increasing the total number of Representatives. But under the present proposal to limit the size of the House to 435 Members any gain for one State will necessarily mean a loss for some other State, so that the need for a sound and fair method of apportionment is obvious.

Cases can occur in which the use of a wrong method would affect every State in the Union, half the States having more Representatives and half the States having fewer Representatives than they are justly entitled to.

The problem is this: Suppose an actual apportionment of 435 Representatives on the basis of the 1930 census is laid before Congress for approval. How shall Congress determine whether this is a good apportionment or whether some change should be made in it? Since the size of the House is fixed, the only possible change is by a transfer of a Representative from some State to some other State. Suppose such a transfer is suggested, say, from State A to State B. How shall Congress decide whether or not this transfer is an improvement which ought to be made?

Among the numerous tests that have been studied many quite plausible tests proved to be "unworkable," because they failed to lead to a definite decision. (There should be no loophole left for the exercise of any "discretionary power.") Among the "workable" tests there are two that are of special interest, test 1 and test 2.

The first test is suggested by the following obvious fact: In a theoretically perfect apportionment the population per Representative in any State would, of course, be exactly equal to the population per Representative in any other State. In an actual case, however, the population per Representative may be 220,000 in one State and 200,000 in another State. Now, 220,000 is 10 per cent larger than 200,000, or, in other words, the percentage difference between these two numbers is 10 per cent; and it is clear that the smaller this difference the better is the apportionment as far as these two States are concerned. This suggests at once the following test:

Test 1: If the percentage difference between the population per Representative in any State and the population per Representative in any other State can be reduced by a transfer of a Representative from one State to the other, then this transfer should be made.

This test can be applied by anyone without the use of any mathematics beyond the simplest arithmetic.

For example, suppose the dispute is between two States, A and B, having populations as shown in the following table:

State	Population	First proposal		Second proposal
		Number of Representatives	Population per Representative	Number of Representatives	Population per Representative
A	1,602,000	5	320,400	6	267,000
B	1,011,000	4	252,750	3	337,000
Difference.....per cent..			26.8		26.2

"Under the first proposal, A has five Representatives and B has four. To find the population per Representative—that is, the average size of the "congressional district"—we divide the population of each State by the number of Representatives, getting 320,400 for State A and 252,750 for State B. State A therefore feels aggrieved, and contends that a Representative should be transferred from B to A, as in the second proposal.

"Under the second proposal, A has six Representatives and B has three. The population per Representative is 267,000 for A and 337,000 for B, so that B is now the aggrieved State.

"Which proposal should be preferred? Applying test 1, we find that 320,400 is greater than 252,750 by 26.8 per cent, while 337,000 is greater than 267,000 by only 26.2 per cent. (To find the 'percentage difference' between two numbers, we take the difference between the two numbers and divide by the smaller.) Since 26.2 is less than 26.8, the second proposal is better than the first.

"In a similar way, the desirability or undesirability of a transfer between any other two States can be immediately decided by applying test 1."

Now the remarkable fact, revealed by the modern mathematical analysis, is this: For any given size of the House, and any given populations of the States, an apportionment can always be found which can not be improved (in the sense of test 1) by any transfer from any State to any other State. Moreover, it is not necessary to go through the labor of applying the test to each pair of States separately, since a short-cut process (by which the apportionment would actually be computed in the Bureau of the Census) is known, which is guaranteed to produce the desired result.

A SECOND TEST OF A GOOD APPORTIONMENT

A second test which Congress may wish to consider is obtained by replacing the ratio of "population per Representative" in a State by the inverse ratio, namely, the "number of Representatives per unit of population." In a theoretically perfect apportionment, this ratio would be the same in any State as it is in any other State. In a practical case, however, it might vary from, say, 4 Representatives per million inhabitants in one State to 4.4 Representatives per million inhabitants in another State—the percentage difference being in this case 10 per cent. The smaller this difference, the better the apportionment, as far as these two States are concerned. Thus a second test is suggested, as follows:

Test 2: If the percentage difference between the number of Representatives per million inhabitants in any State and the number of Representatives per million inhabitants in any other State can be reduced by a transfer of a Representative from one State to the other, then this transfer should be made.

This test also can be readily applied by anyone.

For example, suppose the dispute is between two States, A and C, having the populations shown in the following table:

State	Population	First proposal		Second proposal
		Number of Representatives	Number of Representatives per 1,000,000 inhabitants	Number of Representatives	Number of Representatives per 1,000,000 inhabitants
A	1,602,000	5	3.1211	6	3.7453
C	2,187,000	8	3.6580	7	3.2007
Difference.....per cent...			17.2		17.0

Since 17 is less than 17.2, the second proposal is better than the first.

With regard to test 2 as well as test 1, it has been shown mathematically that an apportionment can always be found which can not be improved (in the sense of test 2) by any transfer from any State to any other State, and a short-cut process of computation is known. Both of these tests, therefore, are "workable" tests.

THE METHOD OF EQUAL PROPORTIONS

As between these two tests, there seems little to choose. One is about as simple and natural as the other; and if Congress had to decide between them it would, indeed, be a difficult choice.

Fortunately, however, it is not necessary to face this dilemma, since the modern mathematical analysis has shown that the two tests are equivalent; that is, an apportionment which satisfies either test 1 or test 2 will automatically satisfy the other also.

The method of apportionment which satisfies both test 1 and test 2 is known as the method of equal proportions. A compact description of this method is obtained by combining test 1 and test 2 in the following statement, the truth of which has been mathematically established:

The method of equal proportions is the only method which makes both the ratio of population to Representatives and the ratio of Representatives to population as nearly as possible the same in all the States.

This, it might be said, is the method for which Congress has been seeking for over a hundred years. It has been indorsed by the advisory committee to the Director of the Census in an elaborate report published in the Journal of the American Statistical Association for December, 1921, and by the overwhelming consensus of all other qualified scientific authorities. In the light of present-day knowledge of the subject, all the other methods which have been employed in the past must be regarded as obsolete. The method of equal proportions is the best scientific solution of this highly technical problem.

(Readers who may be interested in the mathematical theory of this subject, or in the technical details of the process of computation, will find full references in a recent article by E. V. Huntington in the Transactions of the American Mathematical Society, vol. 30, pp. 85–110, January, 1928; or in an earlier article in the Journal of American Statistical Association for September, 1921, pp. 859–870. But none of these mathematical details are of any importance for Congress.)

TWO CONFLICTING METHODS

Although test 1 and test 2 leave nothing to be desired, as simple and natural tests which a good apportionment should satisfy, there are two other tests (test 1a and test 2a) which, for the sake of argument, are here mentioned. These alternative tests differ from test 1 and test 2 only in replacing the idea of percentage difference by the less appropriate idea of absolute difference.

In similar problems in other fields the percentage difference has long been recognized as more significant than the absolute difference. For example, in an election contest, if we say that A has 10 per cent more votes than B, we have a fairly clear picture of the relative strength of the candidates; while if we said that A had absolutely 10 more votes than B we would have no idea of the relative strength. In a total of 250,000 votes, an absolute difference of 10 votes would indicate a very close contest; while in a total of 12 votes, an absolute difference of 10 votes would indicate a sweeping victory.

Similarly, in the problem of apportionment, the percentage difference, as between the "congressional districts" of two States, for example, is more significant than the absolute difference. (This was first pointed out by Dr. Joseph A. Hill, of the Bureau of the Census, in 1910.)

If one insists upon using the absolute difference, however, the tests read as follows:

Test 1a: If the absolute difference between the population per representative in any State and the population per representative in any other State can be reduced by a transfer of a representative from one State to the other, then this transfer should be made.

For example, in the dispute between States A and B, the first proposal is, according to this test, better than the second, since 67,650 is less than 70,000.

State	Population	First proposal		Second proposal
		Number of Representatives	Population per Representative	Number of Representatives	Population per Representative
A	1,602,000	5	320,400	6	267,000
B	1,011,000	4	252,750	3	337,000
Absolute difference			67,650		70,000

Test 2a: If the absolute difference between the number of Representatives per million inhabitants in any State and the number of Representatives per million inhabitants in any other State can be reduced by a transfer of a Representative from one State to the other, then this transfer should be made (provided that every State shall have at least one Representative).

For example, in the dispute between States A and C, the first proposal is, according to this test, better than the second, since 0.5369 is less than 0.5446.

State	Population	First proposal		Second proposal
		Number of Representatives	Number of Representatives per 1,000,000 inhabitants	Number of Representatives	Number of Representatives per 1,000,000 inhabitants
A	1,602,000	5	3.1211	6	3.7453
C	2,187,000	8	3.6580	7	3.2007
Absolute difference			.5369		.5446

Both test 1a and test 2a prove to be "workable"; but, unlike the original tests, these new tests lead to two conflicting results. Method 1a is called the method of the harmonic mean; method 2a is called the method of the arithmetic mean (which is the same as the so-called method of major fractions).

The method 1a favors the small States more than does the method of equal proportions, while the method 2a favors the large States more than does the method of equal proportions. This is illustrated in the following example, in which 16 Representatives are to be apportioned among the three States, A, B, C:

State	Population	Method 1a	Method of equal proportions	Method 2a
C	2,187,000	7	7	8
A	1,602,000	5	6	5
B	1,011,000	4	3	3
Total		16	16	16

The only method of apportionment which shows no bias in favor of either the large States or the small States is the method of equal proportions.

In the light of these facts, none of which were known before 1921, Congress is now in a position to make its choice between these three methods.

The method of equal proportions, defined by test 1 or test 2, is the method on which all scientific authorities are practically unanimous.

If Congress desires to favor the small States, it may adopt method 1a; if it desires to favor the large States, it may adopt method 2a.

To support method 1a on scientific grounds it would be necessary to contend (1) that the absolute difference is more significant than the percentage difference; and (2) that the ratio of population to Representatives is alone important, no attempt being made to equalize the ratios of Representatives to population among the several States.

To support method 2a on scientific grounds, it would be necessary to contend: (1) That the absolute difference is more significant than the percentage difference; and (2) that the ratio of Representatives to population is alone important, no attempt being made to equalize the ratios of population to Representatives among the several States.

As between methods 1a and 2a the choice presents a dilemma which is not easy to solve, as there seems to be no clear reason why either of the two ratios should be insisted on to the exclusion of the other. If the method of equal proportions is adopted, this dilemma need not be faced, since there is no such conflict between test 1 and test 2.

The method of equal proportions is the only method which makes both the ratio of population to Representatives and the ratio of Representatives to population as nearly as possible the same in all the States.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE ON THE SO-CALLED METHOD OF MAJOR FRACTIONS

The so-called method of major fractions, which was devised by Prof. W. F. Willcox in 1910 and used in the apportionment for that year, did not provide a test by which a dispute between two States could be decided directly. What it did provide was a process of computation which has been very much misunderstood.

It is often supposed that the method of major fractions begins by computing the exact number of Representatives to which a State would be entitled in a theoretically perfect apportionment and then proceeds by rejecting all fractions less than one-half and adding one Representative for each fraction greater than one-half.

This is not a correct description of the method of major fractions. The "exact quota" to which a State would be entitled in a theoretically perfect apportionment plays no part in the process. The actual assignment under this process may differ from the "exact quota" by more than one whole unit. "Nearness to the quota" proves, in fact, to be one of the "unworkable" tests.

Professor Willcox himself admitted in an official communication to Congress in 1911 that the method by which his results were reached "is somewhat difficult to explain." To use his own words, he begins with a mysterious "ratio * * * assumed arbitrarily as a starting point," and divides the population of each State by this arbitrary ratio. "If the ratio be then diminished," he says, "the decimal in each quotient will be slightly increased. * * * If the ratio be further reduced * * * the decimals continue to increase with each change of ratio. * * * The State whose decimal first reaches 0.500 * * * is accordingly entitled to the next Representative."

According to this description, the "title" which a State has to a certain number of Representatives is made to depend on the value of a ratio "assumed arbitrarily." In speaking of a particular case, Professor Willcox says: "The nearer the ratio is put to 239,940, the weaker becomes the admitted claim of Illinois." And in another place (1916) he says the "claim" of any State "matures" when the ratio has reached a certain value. The so-called "ratio" finally selected is obtained by a laborious process of trial involving all the 48 States; it is not the result of dividing the total population by the total number of Representatives.

Now, it is clear that the just "claim" or "title" of any State to any number of Representatives ought to depend only on the given populations of the States and the given size of the House, and not on any extraneous and arbitrary value. Professor Willcox's sliding ratio was merely an ingenious mathematical device, which bears no easily explainable relation to what any State is "justly" entitled to.

Fortunately, it is not necessary to go into the details of the process of computation for this or any other method. The result of the process is the important thing for Congress to examine. The modern theory has shown that the process used by Professor Willcox will always lead to a result identical with the result of one of the two conflicting methods mentioned above, namely, method 2a, so that a direct comparison between his method and the method of equal proportions can now be made.

The arguments that can be brought up for or against the method of major fractions are therefore precisely the same as the arguments for or against the method 2a, as outlined above.

In particular, method 2a has a systematic bias in favor of the large States (just as method 1a has a systematic bias in favor of the small States), when compared with the method of equal proportions.

The mistaken notion that the method of major fractions is "easier to understand" than either of the other two methods is based on a complete misunderstanding of what the method of major fractions really is.

The table is a hypothetical but perfectly possible case, showing the number of States that might be affected if the method of major fractions were used instead of the method of equal proportions. The populations assumed differ only slightly from the actual populations given by the 1920 census. In the first column the assignment is exactly the same as at present. In the second column 22 large States have gained and 22 small States have lost. In other words (leaving out of account the four States which have only one Representative each), the choice of method may affect the political fortunes of every State in the Union.

A possible case, showing how much the large States might gain and the small States lose under the method of major fractions as compared with the method of equal proportions:

PROHIBITION

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, the eighteenth amendment, providing for prohibition, has been in effect since January 20, 1920—only about eight years.

Its opponents complain that it is a failure because it has not been fully enforced and the country dried up and therefore ought to be repealed or nullified.

The Ten Commandments were laid down on tablets of stone some 4,000 years ago, and the principles pronounced therein have been enacted into laws of every civilized country of the world. The daily press of the country gives evidence that every commandment is being violated in every city practically every day.

Is there a great propaganda for the repeal of the Ten Commandments or the laws legalizing them? There is not. The people have long been accustomed to such laws. The memory of man runneth not back to the time when they were not the accepted ethics of civilized society.

National prohibition is a new thing—only about 8 years old. Many of the great minority who opposed it in its making are opposing its enforcement, are asking for its repeal or modification. There are many living who built up fortunes in the manufacture of liquors and in the legalized liquor trade. Many of these have fond dreams of the failure of prohibition and a return to the profitable days of license.

It is easy for promoters of wet organizations and schemes for propaganda to raise large sums of money for their exploitations. The minority, which wants a change in the laws, makes the big noise. The great majority, satisfied with things that are, say little.

Tons of propaganda from these wet organizations and promoters of wet funds pass over Congressmen's desks every year. The waste-paper privilege for the House Office Building is enhanced thereby.

The whole Federal machinery for enforcement is new. It is still in the making. Mistakes have been made. Improvements are being made. Lines are being tightened. Personnel is being improved. Public sentiment is being crystallized on law enforcement.

Prohibition has been a success in the main. There are violations, of course, and always will be. Show me a law on the statute books that has no violators. Even murder, the greatest crime of all, fills a good proportion of the front page of every daily newspaper every day.

Enforcement is being bettered both locally and nationally, and much depends upon the local community. To be properly enforced any law must have the backing of local sentiment. There have been communities, still are, perhaps, in which gamblers could not be convicted by a local jury. There certainly are communities to-day in which bootleggers can not be convicted by local juries, no matter how convincing the evidence may be. New York City is one of these. I could name others closer home. To get convictions you must have local sentiment. You must have a citizenship from which juries are drawn that will convict on proper evidence.

It is no fault of the law that in some communities convictions can not be had for bootlegging. The laws of the Nation are strong and effective. The laws of most of the States are as strong or stronger than the Federal laws. The Colorado statutes on the liquor question are more drastic than the Volstead Act. The laws of New York are practically nothing at all.

Again I want to emphasize the fact that national prohibition is a new thing—only 8 years old. A very short period of time, indeed, in considering the history of a country or the effect of a new law.

Conditions are improving rapidly. Sentiment for law enforcement is growing. Dry leaders are beginning to realize the fact that the battle was not entirely won when the eighteenth amendment was adopted.

Go back a little in the history of the movement. For 50 years before national prohibition was adopted there was a stirring agitation for temperance and prohibition. Societies and organizations were active everywhere. Sentiment was being created and sustained.

After the eighteenth amendment was adopted and the Volstead Act passed there was a feeling that the whole case had been won and settled for all time. There was a temporary lull in agitation, a let-up of sentiment-creating effort, a falling off in membership and activities of dry sentiment-building societies and organizations.

Now is coming the revival, and in it is a hopeful sign. Great leaders of public thought are taking up the battle for law enforcement. Great fraternal orders, lodges, and organizations are promoting law enforcement. The pulpit and the press are advocating the principle that a good country is a law-abiding country. Big business, corporations, and individuals are asking and insisting that the laws must be enforced.

Look ahead 25 years. A generation will have passed since the saloon sign has been seen in America. Those who have had money invested in and have grown rich through legalized liquor traffic will have passed on. Those who champ at the bits for that "personal liberty" of which they have been deprived, of standing with one foot on a brass rail and drinking at a bar, will have forgotten its charm for them.

A new generation will be in charge of affairs—business, social, and official. A generation of men and women who know not of public drinking places, of legalized liquor traffic. This coming generation will look back upon this "personal-liberty" talk in connection with legalized liquor traffic as this present generation looks back upon that "personal-property" talk of those of a former generation which believed so firmly in the slavery traffic, and with much the same feeling of disgust.

I have great confidence in the future, born of my observation of the past. I bought the newspaper I still own at my home town, Canon City, Colo., 33 years ago. The town then had eight licensed saloons. In my boyish enthusiasm I concluded that we would make that town dry. I recall that it was a shocking idea to the community at first, and certainly was not popular. But in time we won. Through my newspaper I have advocated the dry side in every election, city, State, and national, since July 1, 1895; had a little part in carrying the elections which made Colorado dry; and I was elected to Congress in time to vote for the Volstead Act in 1919. And have voted for all subsequent amendments.

I have watched the popularity of the dry movement grow through all these years. Gradually the country was voted dry, beginning with villages, towns, and cities, then counties and States, and finally the Nation.

Every decade has marked a great advance, and I am convinced that the country is drier, in fact and in sentiment, than it has ever been in the history of the Nation. The membership of the Congress is drier than it was 10 years ago, or even 6 years ago.

THE DRY AMENDMENT AND ITS ADOPTION

This is the simple wording of the eighteenth amendment to the United States Constitution:

ARTICLE XVIII

SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from, the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

SEC. 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

SEC. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.

This is the way every amendment to the Constitution must be proposed and adopted:

First. Proposed by a two-thirds vote of each branch of Congress, the United States Senate and the House of Representatives.

Second. Then the amendment so proposed must be ratified by the State legislatures of three-fourths of the States of the Union.

That was exactly what has been done by this amendment and by all others that have been added to the Constitution.

If any person thinks he sees a possibility of this country going back to a wet basis let him analyze that procedure carefully. It would be necessary to get two-thirds of each branch of Congress to vote in favor of a wet amendment and then to get 36 of the States to ratify it. Some job, I will say.

The eighteenth amendment was voted on in the United States Senate August 1, 1917, the vote being 65 to 20.

It passed the House of Representatives on December 17, 1917—vote being 262 to 128.

The Congress which proposed this amendment was elected in November, 1916, five months before this country was engaged in the Great War. It was a well-advertised fact that this Congress would vote on this dry amendment when it was elected.

The ratification by the States came along very rapidly. From January 8, 1918, to January 20, 1919, the necessary three-fourths of the States of the Union—the 36 necessary—had ratified the amendment. This made it effective January 20, 1920.

Later 10 other States ratified the amendment, making a total of 46 States. Only 2 States failed to ratify, these being Rhode Island and Connecticut. The total vote of Senators and Representatives in the 46 State legislatures which ratified was 5,102 for ratification to 1,245 against.

This was no sudden nor new thing up for consideration. Prohibition had been agitated for a hundred years. Maine voted dry in 1846 and again in 1851. Kansas adopted a dry constitutional amendment in 1880, North Dakota in 1889, Georgia and Oklahoma in 1907, Mississippi and North Carolina in 1908. Other States came along, so that before national prohibition became effective under the eighteenth amendment 33 States and 4 Territories had adopted state-wide prohibition.

As a matter of fact, before the eighteenth amendment became effective in January, 1920, 95 per cent of the area of the United States, containing more than 70 per cent of the population of the country, had voted itself dry under State prohibition and local-option laws.

COLORADO HAS VOTED ON QUESTION SEVERAL TIMES

Since the Nation adopted the eighteenth amendment several of the States have tried out the sentiment of the people by a referendum on some phase of the question or another. Almost invariably the States have given a larger vote each time for prohibition.

The growing dry sentiment in Ohio is quoted often. In different state-wide elections on the question its record is as follows:

1914: "Wet" by	84,152
1915: "Wet" by	55,408
1917: "Wet" by	1,307
1918: "Dry" by	25,759
1919: "Dry" by	41,853
1922: "Dry" by	189,472

The experience in Colorado has been interesting. The drys lost the first effort to vote the State dry in 1912, but carried the proposition and made Colorado dry in 1914.

Here is the official vote in the State for the several State elections in which prohibition has been an issue.

Election of 1912: This was the first state-wide election on the prohibition question. The title on the ballot read: The state-wide prohibition amendment to the constitution, adding Article XXI:

For	75,877
Against	116,774
Wet majority	40,897

Election of 1914: An amendment to the constitution of the State of Colorado by adding thereto a new article to be numbered and designated as "Article XXII—Intoxicating liquor," prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor and the manufacturing and importation of intoxicating liquor for purpose of sale or gift:

Yes	129,589
Dry majority	11,572

Election of 1916: Proposed constitutional amendment—manufacture and sale of beer:

Yes	77,345
Dry majority	85,789

Election of 1918: Bone-dry amendment:

Yes	113,636
Dry majority	48,896

Election of 1926: Amending Article XXII relative to intoxicating liquors:

Yes	107,749
Dry majority	46,923

GOVERNMENT APPROPRIATIONS HAVE BEEN LIBERAL

The Federal Government has been active in prohibition enforcement, and the Congress has been liberal with appropriations to carry on this work. In 1927 the Bureau of Prohibition was created for the better administration and enforcement of the prohibition and narcotic laws. A commissioner is in charge of the bureau. The country is divided into 25 districts, including one district in Porto Rico and one in Hawaii. An administrator is in charge of each district. Under these are about 4,500 employees, agents, and so forth. Many of these employees are being put under the civil service.

In the short space of time that has elapsed since prohibition was enacted it is natural that many intricate problems have been found to be worked out. Eight years ago many warehouses and many cellars were full of liquor. There have been some leaks. The bonded supply of whisky in warehouses has been cut down by withdrawals from 50,000,000 gallons to less than 20,000,000 gallons. As the supply dries up the leaks will be fewer and the enforcement easier. This division has had its problems with denatured alcohol, with supplies in bond, with fake physicians' prescriptions, with illicit manufacture and sales, with smuggling and border patrol. The Government has problems to work out that the good citizens back home can little realize nor appreciate. But the bureau is meeting them with intelligence and vigor. Administration and enforcement is being improved every year.

The Coast Guard has been very active in helping to enforce prohibition by preventing the landing of illicit cargoes of liquor at coast points. The story the commandant of the Coast Guard told before the Appropriations Committee sounds like a romance of the sea.

Little is known of the Coast Guard in the interior of our country. It is a development of many years. It has other duties to perform, but its major function in recent years has been to prevent liquor smuggling. In that it has been very effective.

The Coast Guard has in it a fleet of ships. The fleet includes 16 cruising cutters, 25 destroyers taken over from the Navy for prohibition patrol duty, 37 harbor launches, and 370 smaller patrol and picket boats—a total of 448 ships and boats.

To man this fleet there are 12,253 officers and men.

The Coast Guard has practically cleaned up "Rum Row," which used to be anchored off the east coast, and is making it harder every year for vessels to land and discharge cargoes of liquor on American shores. Last year the Coast Guard seized 169 vessels and boats in this illicit business.

The border patrol of the customs service is helpful in law enforcement and it is estimated that about one-third of the activities of the Department of Justice may be charged to prohibition enforcement.

The appropriation for the next fiscal year, the year ending June 30, 1929, for prohibition enforcement runs over $36,000,000. They are divided up as follows:

Bureau of Prohibition	$11,478,700
Coast Guard prohibition-enforcement activities	15,064,930
Customs for border patrol	787,500
Department of Justice—that portion chargeable to prohibition enforcement	8,900,000
Total	36,231,130

PRACTICAL RESULTS OF FEDERAL ENFORCEMENT EFFORTS

It just happens that I have been on that section of the Appropriations Committee which considers the appropriations for these prohibition-enforcement units. It is an interesting story, this, that comes to the committee from the Bureau of Prohibition, the customs service, and the Coast Guard. There is stuff here for a thrilling recital. I can give, however, only a few brief facts and figures.

I have been convinced of the thorough sincerity and patriotism of those in charge. I believe the different units are in excellent hands and work in harmony. I know that they are getting practical results.

Here are a few figures that tell the story better than flowery praise can do:

WAR MINERAL CLAIMS

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bills H. R. 11411 and S. 1347.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the Committee on Mines and Mining has reported both H. R. 11411 and S. 1347 in the same form. This is a most interesting bill. The subject matter grows out of an act passed March 2, 1919. That act dealt with two distinct classes of business losses associated with the prosecution of the World War. Let us get a clear and distinct understanding of these classes of business losses.

The first part of the act of March, 1919, provided for the payment of losses growing out of contracts, express or implied. It recognized a legal obligation on the part of the Government to those who had been operating under contracts, express or implied. Special provision for determination and settlement of the claims was made, providing an appeal in the event such was desired. All of those claims have been settled and paid.

The act of March, 1919, section 5, took notice of another class of losses. Certain mine operators claimed to have sustained special losses from ending of the war and consequent price deflations. However, no contracts, express or implied, had been made with the Government by the mine operators; but finally the Congress, in section 5 of the act of March, 1919, authorized the Secretary of the Interior to investigate and pay the net losses of the so-called mine operators. But in the act it was expressly provided that such payments were made on condition that no appeal should be allowed or taken from the judgment and determination by the Secretary of the Interior of the amounts of net losses sustained; his judgment was to be final. And no District of Columbia courts were allowed jurisdiction to hear or pass upon any such claims. These were the second class of net losses from the war that the Government paid.

Under this act of March, 1919, more than $7,000,000 of the $8,000,000 in claims were paid. These mine operators who claim to have sustained more than $8,000,000 in net losses were perfectly satisfied with section 5 of the bill, which reads that "The Secretary shall be the sole judge of the amounts of the net losses and that there shall be no appeal and that no other courts shall have jurisdiction." They understood that what the Government was paying was a mere gift or donation and that it was not owing according to the ordinary business operations.

But now, after six or eight years, this very same class of preferred mine operators come back to Congress with strong lobbies asking for another bill and more money. What does this bill provide for? It sets aside all settlements and payments made by the Secretary under the act of March, 1919. It resurrects and brings to life all these many claims which have been settled, and it provides that the claimants may keep the money which has been paid to them and which they have accepted in full settlement; may ignore those settlements and may yet appeal to the Court of Claims, and there have the right to have their claims opened up altogether and reconsidered and the question passed upon as to whether they sustained more net losses than for which they have been paid. And if the court should find that they sustained more net losses than they have been paid the Government should pay any remaining difference. And in the meantime the claimants may keep all the money the Government has paid them, whether wrongfully or not. Claimants are not required to bring their money back into court which has been paid them in settlement of their claims until after it is finally determined whether they are entitled to more money or less money.

In the first place this second class of claims never should have been paid. The claims were 100 per cent without merit. Why? Because there are thousands of other mine operators and business men and farmers who have lost equally heavily as a result of the war and in the same general way. Because the Government did not owe anything on these claims. They were not based on any kind of contract, and the hearings so disclosed. Because the payment of these claims was a mere donation or gift from the Government. For the Government to pay such claims as this is for it to discriminate against the farmers of the country, against the various other kinds of mine operators in the country, against many different kinds of business concerns in the country, all of whom lost equally heavily with this special class of mine operators.

No Member of this House can satisfactorily explain to the farmers of his district, to other mine operators of his district, to other business men of his district why it was that he voted to take so many millions of dollars out of the Treasury to pay a bunch of mine operators whom the Government did not owe a penny under contract of any kind. Every Member of this House should think on these questions. Why should we be prejudiced in favor of one particular class of mine operators whom the Government did not owe a penny? Why should we give out of the people's money so many millions of dollars to this special class of business men?

The Supreme Court of the United States says that "the payment of money to this class of mine operators is nothing more than a gift or donation." Why should we not give and donate to all farmers, business men, and other mine operators to recompense them for their losses sustained in aiding the World War cause?

To pass this bill means that ten or twelve hundred claims may find their way into the Court of Claims, there to be investigated, 10 years after the war, to determine the amount of net losses; and no one to represent the Government. It means, of course, that the Government continues to lose millions on top of millions of money.

I respectfully ask each Member of the House to carefully read the report of the Secretary of the Interior to Senator ODDIE. For your benefit, please read it carefully; when you do, I am satisfied you will talk against and vote against the passage of this meritless bill.

Section (2), body of H. R. 11411:

SEC. 2. In cases where final decisions of the Secretary of the Interior have been heretofore rendered, appeal to the Court of Claims shall be made within six months after the passage of this act; and in all cases where final decisions of the Secretary of the Interior have not heretofore been rendered, appeals from such decisions to the Court of Claims shall be made within 90 days after such decisions shall have been rendered by said Secretary: Provided, That no acceptance or acquittance by any claimant of or for any settlement made heretofore by the said Secretary shall prevent or estop any appeal to the said Court of Claims, as herein provided for.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 18, 1928.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
Chairman Committee on Mines and Mining,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR ODDIE: Receipt is acknowledged of your request for a report on S. 1347, Seventieth Congress, which bill is now before your committee for consideration.

The bill proposes to strike from the war minerals relief act, approved March 2, 1919, as amended, under which the entire 1,268 claims have, during the past eight years, been investigated and disposed of, the provision which makes the decision of the Secretary of the Interior conclusive and final, and the further provision that the law shall not be construed to confer jurisdiction upon any court to entertain a suit against the United States. It adds a new section, vesting the Court of Claims with jurisdiction to hear and determine any claim which has been, or which may in the future be, disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior, provided only that appeal be taken within 90 days after the passage of the act, or the subsequent decision of the Secretary of the Interior, as the case may be.

The history of war minerals relief legislation and administration leads me to the belief this bill should not be enacted. When Congress passed the war minerals relief act (the Dent Act) it dealt with two classes of claimants. The class having express or implied contracts with the Government was directed to go to the War Department for settlement, with the right of appeal to the Court of Claims. The class having no contracts, express or implied, was directed to be adjudicated by the Secretary of the Interior, with no right of appeal to any court, that official's decisions to be conclusive and final. The distinction between the two classes of claimants, as made by Congress, obviously was for the reason that the claims in one class, having a legal status, because of express or implied contracts, called for a legal court of review, while the claims in the other class, being based wholly upon moral considerations, were to be investigated and paid by an officer of the Government, without intervention by the courts. The Supreme Court of the United States has interpreted the war minerals relief act and set out the reasons why the right of appeal to any court was withheld by Congress. In the case of Work v. Rives the opinion of Chief Justice Taft contained the following:

"The above summary of section 5 clearly shows that Congress was seeking to save the beneficiaries from losses which it would have been under no legal obligation to make good if a private person. It was a gratuity based on equitable and moral considerations. (United States v. Realty Co. 163 U. S. 427, 439; Allen v. Smith, 173 U. S. 389, 402.) Congress did not wish to create a legal claim.

"It was not dealing with vested rights. It did not, as it did with the claims for supplies and services directly furnished the Government under the first and second sections of the act, make the losses recoverable in a court, but expressly provided otherwise. It dealt with the subject with the utmost caution. It hedged the granting of the equitable gratuity with limitations to prevent the use of the statute for the recovery of doubtful or fraudulent claims or merely speculative losses. It vested the Secretary with power to reject all losses except as he was satisfied that they were just and equitable and it made his decision conclusive and final. Final against whom? Against the claimant. He could not resort to court to review the Secretary's decision. This was expressly forbidden. By the fifth proviso, however, the Government was permitted, through any of its agencies or even by a committee of Congress duly authorized to review the settlement by the Secretary and by necessary implication to reverse it. If the Government was defrauded it was authorized to sue to recover any money paid under the award.

"Congress was occupying toward the proposed beneficiaries of section 5 the attitude rather of a benefactor than of a debtor at law. Congress intended the Secretary to act for it, and to construe the meaning of the words used to describe the elements of the net losses to be ascertained and to give effect to his interpretation without the intervention of the courts. This statute presents a case of as wide discretion as was held to have been vested in the Secretary of the Navy in the Decatur case."

S. 1347, before you, proposes now, after the work of administration, covering many years, has been concluded, and when more than seven millions of dollars have been paid to claimants, to create legal claims; to make of the Government a debtor at law rather than a benefactor. Having shared in a gratuity, claimants, given a legal status by this bill, may bring the Government into court and compel the court to review the Government's actions in the bestowing of its own gratuities.

Under S. 1347 the entire 1,268 claims may be taken to the Court of Claims. That practically all will find their way there is more than probable. Claimants will have little or nothing to lose. The bill is, in fact, an invitation to appeal. There is but one requirement and that is that the simple act of filing an appeal be performed within 90 days. It is then incumbent upon the court to duplicate much of the work that has been performed by the Secretary of the Interior in order that a decision may be rendered. If the decision should be adverse to the claimant, the Government and not the claimant would bear the financial cost. Under such conditions, even the claimant who had accepted his award and departed satisfied, would be induced to appeal his claim. The revival of these claims, as proposed by the bill, after years spent in their examination and adjustment, under a remedial act, would heap upon the Court of Claims labor and expense which, in my judgment, can not be justified.

When Congress passed the war minerals relief act the circumstances and events out of which the moral obligation to these claimants grew were fresh in the minds of its Members. If Congress had felt the Government was a debtor at law, the losses undoubtedly would have been made recoverable in a court. Having declared otherwise, and all claims having been examined and disposed of in conformity to the act as passed, I can not now approve a bill which is in direct opposition to the letter and spirit of that act.

I recommend that S. 1347 be not enacted.

I am advised by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget that the proposed legislation is in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Members of the House, our Government can not continue year after year to spend money by the millions without regard to our sincere obligations and without regard as to where the money comes from. It seems to me that we should be very thoughtful about these matters; that we should be sure that we owe the debt before we pay it.

We should not create the debt by legislative enactment and without any consideration. Why should we not treat such claims as those involved in this bill just like such claims would be treated by a municipality, a city, or county, or township? No municipal organization would pay claims of the character as those involved in this bill. It does not merit the support of this body, and I trust it will not receive such.

WARRANT OFFICERS OF THE REGULAR ARMY

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 8314) to amend an act of Congress approved March 4, 1927 (Pub., No. 795, 69th Cong.), to provide for appointment as warrant officers of the Regular Army of such persons as would have been eligible therefor but for the interruption of their status, caused by military service rendered by them as commissioned officers during the World War.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up the bill (H. R. 8314) which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H. R 8314, Seventieth Congress, first session

A bill to amend an act of Congress approved March 4, 1927 (Public, No. 795, 69th Cong.), to provide for appointment as warrant officers of the Regular Army of such persons as would have been eligible therefor but for the interruption of their status, caused by military service rendered by them as commissioned officers during the World War

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to appoint as warrant officers of the Regular Army any person whose service as commissioned officer in the Army during the World War, added to their service as quartermaster clerk, amounted to 12 years or more of service prior to June 4, 1920, and who were not eligible for appointment as field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, under the provisions of the act of August 29, 1916, because of the interruption of their 12 years' requisite service as quartermaster clerks to render commissioned service in the World War: Provided, That in determining length of service for longevity pay and retirement they shall be credited with and entitled to count the same military service as authorized for warrant officers, and all classified service rendered as clerks in the Military Establishment: Provided further, That the limitation in the act of June 30, 1922, on the number of warrant officers, United States Army, shall not apply to the appointees hereunder.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, line 5, strike out the word "person" and insert in lieu thereof the word "persons"; in the same line strike out the words "service as"; and in line 6, strike out the word "officer" and insert the word "service."

On page 2, in line 1, strike out the word "quartermater" and insert the word "quartermaster"; and after the word "War," insert a colon and the following proviso: "Provided, That for the purposes of this act, the period of commissioned service during the World War prior to June 4, 1920, be deemed equivalent to a like period of detached service away from permanent station or duty beyond the continental limits of the United States."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONSTRUCTION OF MILITARY POSTS

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 6480) to authorize appropriations for construction of military posts and for other purposes and ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated $8,600 for the construction and installment in the Canal Zone of a concrete storehouse, with such utilities and appurtenances thereto as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be necessary.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONSTRUCTION AT THE UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY, WEST POINT

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 11623) to authorize the construction at the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not to exceed the sum of $126,334 for completing the construction of the new cadet mess hall, cadet store, dormitories, and drawing academy, including equipment, at the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SUPERINTENDENTS OF NATIONAL CEMETERIES AND NATIONAL PARKS

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 10809) to provide qualifications for the superintendents of national cemeteries and national military parks.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a person to be eligible for appointment to, or eligible to hold, the position of superintendent of a national cemetery or a national military park shall have been an enlisted man or commissioned officer who has been honorably discharged or mustered out of the military or naval service of the United States, and that after the passage of this act no salary shall be paid any such superintendent who does not have these qualifications.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 4, strike out the words "a national cemetery or"; and in line 8, after the word "after," insert "one year from the date of."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. REECE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: Line 3, strike out the words "or eligible to hold"; and in line 8, after the word "State," strike out the comma, insert a period, and strike out the remainder of line 8 and lines 9 and 10"; and amend the title by striking out the "s" in the word "superintendents" and the words "national cemeteries and."

Mr. CHAPMAN. If these amendments are adopted, does it eliminate ripper feature of the bill?

Mr. REECE. Yes.

Mr. BROWNING. As I understand, the bill as amended does not affect anybody holding office at present?

Mr. REECE. No.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Do the superintendents have to be reappointed?

Mr. REECE. They are appointed for indefinite tenure.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. They do not after four years have to be reappointed? Unless removed for cause they hold their position for life?

Mr. REECE. They hold indefinitely.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REECE. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have just come on the floor. As I understand, the bill is so worded that it requires that the superintendents of the national military parks must be former service men?

Mr. REECE. That is correct.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is legislation pending with reference to their administration that proposes to transfer them to the National Park Service. I am not at all sure that legislation of the kind that the gentleman suggests would do in that case. Everyone is in sympathy with the purpose that is named in the bill, but in the actual administration it is quite possible that a good deal of difficulty might be encountered in some specific cases.

For instance, if the National Park Service takes over the administration of these important military parks—and for one I am not anxious that it should—it may be that they may want an experienced park man to take over one of these parks for a period in order to work out some problems, and that appointment could not be made under this inflexible law. I wonder if the bill could not be laid aside. I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. REECE. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is not justified in his apprehensions. The same provisions are now applicable to national cemeteries. There is no question but that ex-service men can be found for any of these superintendencies who are thoroughly qualified to administer the parks.

Mr. CRAMTON. Has the gentleman any question that proper administration would insure such men being secured?

Mr. REECE. That has not been the experience in the past. There are two military parks in Tennessee, and both of them have superintendents who are not ex-service men. Under the amendment that I am offering they are not disturbed.

Mr. CRAMTON. So the gentleman is accepting the situation as to them; but as to uncertain cases that may arise in the future, where great inconvenience might be caused, the gentleman is not prepared to make an exception.

Mr. REECE. If I may be permitted to say so, it seems to me that it is ridiculous to have a national military park which has been made possible by the blood of ex-service men presided over by anyone else except an ex-service man. When there are 4,000,000 ex-service men in the United States, I am sure that one of them can be found who is qualified to properly administer a park.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then why does the gentleman consent that two such parks shall continue to be so administered in his own State?

Mr. REECE. I am accepting that situation in order not to make the bill retroactive and maybe do some one an injustice.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. And is it not a fact that one of these gentlemen who is a superintendent of the park has been in the civil service for 35 years and has been connected with this park for 25 years, and that the other gentleman who is a superintendent is in the civil service and has been there for 13 years?

Mr. REECE. Oh, yes; but one of the gentlemen, I think, was blanketed under the civil service, and an ex-service man was put out when he was put in.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House insist on its amendments to the Senate Joint Resolution 46 and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House insist on its amendments to Senate Joint Resolution 46 and asks for a conference.

Before putting the motion the Chair would like to make this statement: When the gentleman from Pennsylvania offered the motion a little while ago the Chair expressed doubt as to whether the motion was in order. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] submitted that the motion was in order under the precedents of the House. The Chair stated that he had no recollection during his term as a Member of this House of such a motion being offered. The Chair finds as a matter of fact that once during his service in the House this motion was made. It was as far back as 1907. The Chair can find no other precedent except one that occurred in 1891, and in neither case was any opinion given by the occupant of the chair in 1907. The Chair reads from Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, the following:

6294. On February 27, 1891, the House had passed with an amendment the bill of the Senate (No. 3738) to place the American merchant marine engaged in the foreign trade upon an equality with that of other nations.

Mr. John M. Farquhar, of New York, moved that the House request a conference with the Senate on the bill and amendment.

Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, made the point of order that the motion was not in order, the Senate not having disagreed to the amendment.

The Speaker pro tempore overruled the point of order on the ground that under the established practice of the House the same was permissible.

The Chair is unable to find that there was any precedent for that. The Chair again reads from Hinds, volume 5:

6300. On June 25, 1906, the House passed with an amendment the bill (S. 4403) to amend the immigration laws.

After a vote on the passage of the bill Mr. JAMES E. WATSON, of Indiana, moved that the House ask for a conference.

This motion was agreed to.

So the Chair was practically correct in saying that the matter had never come up where it was decided during his service in the House.

The Chair is of the opinion that such a proceeding is contrary to established rules of parliamentary procedure. It is true it has occurred a number of times in another body, the object being to alter the ordinary proceedings in conference; that is, to have one body act where it would not naturally act. The Chair also finds that in both cases, so far as the House was concerned, this procedure was on the last day of the session. The Chair can see some reason why such a motion could be submitted on the last day. The Chair is clearly of the opinion, however, that it is against the rules and the proper practice of parliamentary procedure. The object of a conference is to harmonize disagreements. In this case there is no disagreement. We have no assurance that the Senate is not in agreement.

However, in view of these two precedents, the Chair does not care to assume the responsibility of refusing to recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Chair will give further attention and consideration to this matter and will reserve judgment, the next time such a motion is made, as to whether he will decline to recognize a gentleman making this motion. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, if it is agreeable to the Speaker, I will give him the names of the conferees to-morrow morning.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file a conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill up to midnight to-night. We are in agreement on everything except the matter of fiscal relations. On that we are in disagreement. I would like to call up the conference report to-morrow morning if this consent is granted.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent to file a conference report on the District of Columbia bill until midnight to-night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE

THURSDAY, May 17, 1928

(Legislative day of Thursday, May 3, 1928)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

PROSPERITY RESERVE—PUBLIC WORKS PLANNING

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, before this session of Congress adjourns I hope we are going to be able to pass Senate bill 2475, which is the bill introduced by the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and reported by the Committee on Commerce, proposing the principle of a prosperity reserve. But even after that is passed it is still going to be necessary, as I hope we are going to do, to pass also the resolution submitted by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], which proposes a scientific and deliberative study, during the summer and fall, of the development of means for meeting unemployment crises and general economic depression.

I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution, with a syllabus attached, bearing upon this ultimate situation. I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD with the syllabus and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 233) and syllabus were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas it is sound public policy to stabilize prosperity against periods of unemployment and industrial depression; and

Whereas the long-range planning of essential public works if suitably financed can provide necessary opportunities for employment and for general economic stimulus if these public works, sound in themselves, be increased in periods which specifically disclose unemployment and depression; and

Whereas it is to the economic gain of the Government to take advantage of relatively low costs prevailing at such times and to undertake enhanced public works in such periods, provided such works are useful and advisable regardless of the emergency, and provided further that the works may be financed without an increase in current taxation; and

Whereas the Government has long considered such a program, as evidenced by the so-called Kenyon bill presented to the Senate in the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress and the so-called Jones bill (S. 2475), presented to the present session of the Seventieth Congress and by the President's unemployment conference in 1921 under the chairmanship of Secretary of Commerce Hoover; and

Whereas the serious difficulty heretofore encountered in such a prospectus has been the inadvisability of increasing taxation in times of depression to finance these public works, because increased taxation is a factor which itself negatives the advantages otherwise intended as a means to offset depression; and

Whereas the Government is entitled temporarily to suspend its sinking-fund payments for the retirement of the public debt during these occasional periods of declared emergency and pending the restoration of a normal index, because the average retirement of the public debt at the present legalized annual rate in excess of $300,000,000, plus the proceeds of foreign-debt payments, is ample even though occasionally interrupted as proposed herewith: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor or any special subcommittee therefrom which may be particularly charged with an investigation of means to stabilize employment, is instructed to inquire into the situation herein set forth and to report to the Senate its findings, in connection with any other findings thus reported, upon the long-range planning of public works and the concentration of actual construction, financed by the temporary transfer of funds otherwise allocated by law to the sinking fund, in definitive periods of unemployment and industrial depression.

SYLLABUS ACCOMPANYING SENATE RESOLUTION 233

The fact that there is no contemporary economic depression involving unemployment to a definitive extent warranting special relief is an excellent reason why the present is a time when preparedness for such crises may be deliberately surveyed.

This resolution, addressed to the creation of a safely financed "prosperity reserve," is builded upon the fundamental proposition that the Government can create helpful stimulus in periods of depression and unemployment by concentrating useful public works in such periods, provided the application of this remedy does not itself involve baneful elements which negative the values and advantages sought.

The basic principle is not new. As stated in the resolution, it will be found in part in previous proposals submitted to the Congress. It is discussed at length by witnesses appearing before the Senate Commerce Committee in hearings on S. 2475 and reported in part 1 of the hearings of April 12, 1928.

The danger in the application of the principle is twofold: (1) That unnecessary or illy advised public works may be ordered in these emergencies, thus making an uneconomic orgy out of what purposes to be an economic essentiality; (2) that the financing of these extra public works may create an increased taxation, which, contemporary with depression, may multiply new discouragements while attempting to alleviate old ones.

The first element of danger may be answered by the scientific long-range planning of essential public works which are of sound capital account regardless of a transient economic index. In the face of America's vast needs upon this score it is not impossible to budget these essential public works in diverse fields over long periods of time, thus establishing a validated prospectus which may be drawn upon whenever a given industrial index falls below an established safety line. When these works are thus confined and thus validated, the first of these listed dangers disappears. In this connection it should be noted that the British recourse to so-called relief works for kindred purposes has suffered the weakness of dealing "in makeshift undertakings." (See Monthly Labor Review for April, 1928, of the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the United States Department of Labor at p. 4.) It is impossible to build a sound economic system on this basis of "makeshift undertakings." It invites an hysteria of extravagance and waste. Under such circumstances the cure is worse than the disease. But this element of danger need not be present under long-range planning which contemplates public improvements that are inherently worthy and which would be justified and which would be ultimately constructed even under normal conditions.

The second element of danger, namely, the problem of financing these public works, never has been adequately met in discussions of this problem. It is against this element that this proposal makes its most important suggestion. When "relief works" has been undertaken in Europe, it usually has been on the basis either of loans or outright subsidies through which central government has sought to encourage local authorities in financing schemes of work for the unemployed. This has been tried in England where the central government in 1920–1926 made grants of nearly $400,000,000 for loans, and contributions of $85,000,000 on the basis of a percentage of wage bills, and of $5,000,000 in part payment for collateral projects. It has been tried in Germany also where subsidies and loans to local authorities and even to private employers have been drawn upon. Since the depression which began in the fall of 1925, the various German relief work schemes have involved an expenditure of approximately $60,000,000. (See Labor Review for April, 1928, of the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the United States Department of Labor, pp. 4 to 7.)

The foregoing resolution proposes to avoid all such systems of subsidies and contributions in the operation of an American emergency program. Thus avoiding these dangerous elements, the system can also avoid the serious consequences which sometimes have followed the invocation of "relief work" in the old world.

The United States is in the fortunate position of being able, in periods of definitive depression and unemployment, to finance its long-range planning of public works by a temporary suspension in public debt retirement pending the stimulated return of normal conditions when current sinking fund appropriations may be resumed. It is proposed to suspend statutory payments into the sinking fund simultaneously with and in an extent equal to emergency appropriations on account of public works undertaken to avert unemployment. It is the contention of this resolution that it is economically sound to say that when we are making emergency appropriations for such a course, we are not in shape to indulge in the luxury of debt reduction. Put differently, it is the contention of this resolution that if and when the country faces economic depression which carries us below an established index, it suffices if we pay as we go and temporarily cease payments on debt account. This is particularly true in view of the rapid rate at which we are reducing the public debt—a rate never heretofore equaled in the history of the world.

If public works be thus financed in these periods of depression and unemployment the country can have the benefit of this vast stimulus without the necessity of a penny's increased total in current tax bills.

Debt payments are capital account payments. Permanent public improvements are also capital account payments. In other words, we simply would temporarily embrace a different yet equally valuable form of capital account payment while at the same time we would provide the economic stimulus necessary.

Witnesses who testified before the Senate Commerce Committee in behalf of the general principle of a "prosperity reserve" have discussed this fiscal program in letters printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page 6915 for the present session.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 2148) to fix standards for hampers, round stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) providing for the completion of Dam No. 2 and the steam plant at nitrate plant No. 2 in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals for the manufacture and distribution of fertilizer, and for other purposes, with amendments; that the House insisted upon its amendments to the said joint resolution; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two houses thereon; and that Mr. MORIN, Mr. JAMES, Mr. REECE, Mr. QUIN, and Mr. WRIGHT were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2473) for the relief of Louie June.

MUSCLE SHOALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) providing for the completion of Dam No. 2 and the steam plant at nitrate plant No. 2 in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals for the manufacture and distribution of fertilizer, and for other purposes.

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate disagree to the House amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. McNARY, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. SMITH conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent for a reprint in bill form of the Muscle Shoals joint resolution as it passed the Senate and showing the House amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TAX REDUCTION

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to reduce and equalize taxation, provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I understand it the pending question is the amendment relating to estate taxes. Am I right?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] desires to be here when that amendment is considered. He may be here later in the afternoon. I am going to ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be temporarily laid aside. I do not mean by that, that I am going to hold the bill up, because if all the other amendments are disposed of and the Senator from Connecticut has not returned, I shall then ask that the estate tax amendment be considered. But I do want the Senator from Connecticut to have a chance to be here, as he offered the amendment, and therefore I ask that the amendment be temporarily laid aside. Then we can take up the other amendments.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire will state the inquiry.

Mr. MOSES. We are in the stage of individual amendments now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask the Senator from Utah if there are many of those individual amendments which are controversial?

Mr. SMOOT. There are a few. I think the estate-tax amendment will take the greater part of the time.

Mr. MOSES. I make the inquiry because I would like to have some time during the day for the consideration of the conference report on the postal rates bill. I am entirely willing to wait and ask consent for its consideration later in the day, if it suits the convenience of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish the Senator would do so. I would like to have the day for the tax bill, if I can.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator advise me just what he means by laying aside the estate tax amendment temporarily? Will it be taken up this afternoon?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. If all the other amendments are passed upon, then we will take up the estate tax amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. So that no time will be lost.

Mr. SMOOT. No time will be lost. If all the other amendments are acted upon, then I shall ask that the estate tax amendment be taken up immediately.

Mr. JOHNSON. The desire of the Senator, if I understand him, is simply to transmute the order and proceed with amendments to the bill now, and then during the afternoon, if the other amendments shall have been concluded, to proceed with the estate tax amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. For what purpose?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. For the purpose of allowing me to request the passage of four House bills which are exact duplicates of four bills which have already been passed by the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. They will lead to no discussion?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think not.

Mr. HEFLIN. What are the bills?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before that is done I should like to know something about the arrangement proposed. The pending amendment is the Bingham amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. It is. I ask unanimous consent that that amendment be temporarily laid aside for the reason that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] is out of town, and that we proceed with the consideration of other amendments. Just as soon as they are finished, whether the Senator from Connecticut gets back this afternoon or not, I shall ask that we proceed with the estate tax amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the amendment that is in order if that arrangement be entered into?

Mr. SMOOT. Any individual amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The committee amendments have been disposed of with the exception of the estate tax amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. That means the Senator will lay aside the estate tax amendment indefinitely, because we do not know how long the other amendments will take. Some of them may take a day or two.

Mr. SMOOT. My unanimous-consent request was that, until the Senator from Connecticut returns or until all the other amendments have been acted upon, the estate tax amendment be laid aside. Then we will take up the estate tax amendment at once.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, has the chairman of the committee any assurance that the Senator from Connecticut will be here this afternoon?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have not. If there is the least question about granting my request, I shall not insist upon it; but the Senator from Connecticut having offered the amendment, and as we have other amendments to consider and no time would be lost, I did feel that it would only be the proper thing and a matter of respect shown to that Senator to let his amendment go over until at least we have concluded all the other amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not understand that the Senator is asking for any delay. He is merely asking to proceed out of order with other amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all there is to it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not see any objection to his request.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not ask for a moment's delay in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not object, except that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] makes the statement that he understands the Senator from Connecticut will not be back to-day.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Utah has said that at the conclusion of the consideration of the other amendments, whether the Senator from Connecticut is here or not, he will ask the Senate to proceed immediately with the consideration of the estate tax amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that out of courtesy the action proposed should be taken.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no desire to interfere with any arrangement which may have been made.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no desire to postpone it; I am just as anxious as any other Senator can be for the Senate to consider the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, but it is only common courtesy that we lay the amendment aside for a while, if we do not thereby delay the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is exactly the thought I had.

Mr. NORRIS. When we get through with the other amendments, if the Senator from Connecticut is not then here, we can go ahead and take it up.

Mr. SIMMONS. With that understanding I am content.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I asked.

Mr. SIMMONS. But if it is to be delayed for several days, I can not consent to that.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will say that if the Senator from Connecticut made the request, of course it ought to be granted. The Senator, however, assured me that we might go ahead in his absence. Does the Senator from Utah think he will be back to-day?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know; but if he shall not come back, it will make no difference whatever, because just as soon as the other amendments shall be out of the way then this amendment will be brought before the Senate, whether the Senator from Connecticut is here or whether he is not here.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The four bills of which I have spoken——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let us have this matter settled before we go into something else. Are we going to lay aside this amendment or are we not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the amendment has been temporarily laid aside.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, where is the Senator on whose account the business of the Senate has got to be held up until he arrives?

Mr. SMOOT. The business of the Senate will not be held up.

Mr. HEFLIN. Where is the Senator, if he he is not here?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. He is somewhere else.

Mr. HEFLIN. I understand he is somewhere else. It is 20 minutes after meeting time. The Republicans ought to attend the sessions of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Connecticut is out of the city, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. President, I had yielded to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us settle this question first.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator from Utah only asked that the amendment be laid aside temporarily, and that in the meantime we proceed with other amendments.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut was kind enough the other day to ask that a bill in which I am interested and in which the farmers of the South are vitally interested should go over. I am going to return to him good for evil and permit, so far as I am concerned, this amendment to go over until it is the pleasure of this Republican Senator to return.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], I offer an amendment to the pending revenue bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 196, section 412, in line 9, it is proposed to strike out "$10" and to insert in lieu thereof "$25," and in line 14 to strike out "$10" and to insert in lieu thereof "$25."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, to the amendment just offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] I have no objection; and, so far as I am concerned, I hope that it will be adopted. It simply increases the exemption in the case of dues from $10 to $25 in order to take care of the small clubs throughout the country.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will yield, I understand that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] had an amendment on this subject. Therefore I should like if the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa could go over for a few minutes until I can send for the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island to allow the amendment to be agreed to, with the understanding that if any Senator desires later to reconsider the vote by which it was agreed to, the vote may be so reconsidered.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Kentucky, I think, is detained in connection with the work of a committee.

Mr. SMOOT. He can at any time in the afternoon make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to, if he so desires.

Mr. GERRY. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the amendment shall be agreed to, I wish to make an inquiry. There is so much confusion in the Senate that I am unable to hear what is being said. I understand that there is an amendment, pending offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], and I should like to know what the amendment is.

Mr. BROOKHART. The amendment relates to exemption from taxation of dues of small clubs; it raises the exemption from $10 to $25.

Mr. NORRIS. Is this the same matter we had up the other day when we undertook to cut out the tax and it was suggested that instead of cutting out the taxes we should increase the exemption?

Mr. BROOKHART. I think so. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] is the author of the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; the Senator from North Dakota was talking about it, and so was the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. President, as I understand the amendment I have no objection to it, and I am constrained to favor it. My understanding is that under the bill as the committee have brought it in there is imposed a tax on dues of clubs, particularly golf clubs, wherever the dues or the initiation fee into the club exceeds $10, and exempting everything under $10. We had a vote on the question, as I remember, of cutting down the tax, and that was defeated. Now the Senator from Iowa, in behalf of the Senator from North Dakota, offers an amendment that raises the exemption; in other words, the dues of these country golf clubs where they are $25 or less are not to be taxed.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from North Carolina, I think, made a speech that convinced me that we ought to increase the exemption, because there are a good many country clubs in small towns of which the dues are more than $10 and less than $25, and, as he said, golf is a very healthful pastime.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Why should there be a tax on the right to indulge in this wholesome, healthful entertainment, exercise, or occupation? Why should the golfer be required to pay a tax?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Arkansas that when a former tax bill was before the Senate we made a very earnest effort to reduce the tax, but the Senators on the other side voted us down. As the Senator from Nebraska said, I insisted then that golf had ceased to be a rich man's amusement, and had become the amusement and the exercise of a large number of people in every little town in the country, and was very healthful exercise, and ought not to be taxed out of existence.

I want to say that this amendment meets with my hearty approval. I think it will relieve to a great extent those small clubs. I should like to have the exemption raised a little bit.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I took the floor not for the purpose of opposing the amendment, but mainly to find out what it is. Since I have found out what it is, I want to say that I feel favorably inclined to it, although I do not know anything about the pastime in which these people indulge.

Mr. SIMMONS. Neither do I, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand it is an amendment in behalf of old age, of gray hairs, and of bald heads. It is going to relieve from taxation the old man's game of golf.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator now is entering upon a very comprehensive field of learning, one that absorbs the attention and engages the activities of thousands, not to say millions, of his fellow countrymen. There is not any subject that more promptly invites the exercise of the imagination and more frequently stimulates the faculty of exaggeration than that which the Senator from Nebraska is discussing.

Mr. NORRIS. That accounts, then, for a lot of exaggeration I have heard from golf players. I did not know that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is a subject that provokes discussion around the fireside, where the results obtained are very different from those secured on the links. Many a golfer in that presence can shoot around in par when he reaches what used to be known as the nineteenth hole or assembles with fellow golfers around the fireside who disgraces himself in the actual engagements of the game.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, does the Senator from Arkansas feel that the nineteenth hole has been entirely eliminated?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Arkansas reserves an expression of opinion on that subject. It is too difficult to discuss here; but there is not a reason that appeals to my mind why those who do not play golf should penalize by taxing those gentlemen who think they can play the game.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I hope Senators will not take up my time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is a very violent issue on the horizon between the Senator from Nebraska and myself.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I think there is not any disagreement. In fact, I expected to make what I believed would be an argument in favor of the amendment. Senators are misconstruing my purpose. I have been taught since I was a boy to respect old age, and I do not want to take any action that would interfere with my early training or teaching.

Mr. WATSON. But in that the Senator has no reference to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not said I had reference to anybody.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let me make a confession in the time of the Senator from Nebraska. Every old man who attempts it persists in the effort to learn golf. No old man ever can learn it. Few young men ever master it. It is the exercise par excellence of the middle-aged; it is the consolation of the senile; it is the despair of the ambitious. The Senator from Nebraska, whose experience has been so broad, whose attainments are so comprehensive, has missed something in life, and the time is approaching when he will be old enough to quit indoor games and undertake outdoor sports, including golf.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I believe I have the floor, and I hope Senators will let me proceed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will not the Senator let me say a word?

Mr. NORRIS. Let the Senator get the floor after I am through.

Mr. SIMMONS. I just want to say a word in behalf of two of my colleagues.

Mr. NORRIS. I know the Senator does and I am anxious to hear him; but I am also anxious to finish my argument in favor of this amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not want to worry the Senator, but——

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is going to say it anyway, so he can keep right on in concert with me.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will just allow me to say this, the Senator is putting his argument upon the ground of relief of the poor man. I want to tell him that there are two Senators here whom I happen to know, one of whom spends his afternoons until a late hour playing golf—he is from Arkansas—and the other spends his mornings playing golf. He gets up before sunrise. They are both poor people and they ought to be relieved.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, both of them are liable to injure their health by the loss of sleep.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me, on behalf of the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] and the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], to express my appreciation to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will let me say that my colleague is what I understand is known as a Civil War golfer. He goes out in 61 and comes back in 65. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if Senators will permit me now, I desire to say briefly that I have rather been convinced by what the Senator from Arkansas has said that this game of golf is not as undesirable as I supposed it was from what I heard the Senator from North Carolina say. I believe, from what I have heard, that some time in my life, when I get to be an old man, I will undertake to learn the game myself. At the present time, however, I am only acting because of my sympathy with those who are aged and gray and baldheaded who desire to play golf without paying Uncle Sam any royalty on the game.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I send forward an amendment, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the proper place in the bill it is proposed to insert:

For the purposes of this act officers and employees of any State or political subdivision shall not be discriminated against because their full-time service is given to a publicly owned and operated water-supply system, street railway, or other public utility, and any taxes and penalties heretofore imposed upon such persons shall be abated, credited, or refunded.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] has offered an amendment of the same nature. I am not particular which amendment is adopted. Perhaps the language of his amendment is better than that of this one.

The purpose of this amendment is to release employees of a municipality who are devoting their entire time to a public utility. I have in mind particularly the waterworks. In my city the employees of the city who operate the water plant are taxed, while the other employees of the city—policemen, firemen, and other employees—are not taxed. Of course, the question is whether or not these are municipal employees.

I had a colloquy with the Senator from Utah two or three years ago over the same matter, where penalties were involved, where assessments had been levied against these municipal employees, and penalties imposed upon them. As the result of the debate in the Senate, participated in by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] and the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Butler, who was here then, these penalties were abated; but it is manifestly unfair to discriminate against an employee of a city because he is engaged in a municipal operation in connection with a public utility.

I present the amendment for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the amendment presented by the Senator from New York accomplishes precisely the same result as the amendments that I have introduced and that are pending; and I am quite content to take the issue on the amendment as presented by the Senator from New York.

The issue is a very real one in my State, particularly because of the large number of employees on the municipal street railway and in the municipal waterworks at Detroit.

Up to 1923 it was supposed that all municipal employees were exempt. After 1923, due to a ruling of the Internal Revenue Department, it was undertaken to be said that some municipal functions are governmental and some municipal functions are proprietary. Because some are supposed to be proprietary, under the dictum of the Internal Revenue Department, the employees of those departments are asked to pay a tax. The obvious inconsistency of it is evident at a fire, for instance. where the fireman who holds the hose, according to the Internal Revenue Department, is exempt from taxation, while the man who pumps the water into the hose has to pay a tax. The amendment of the Senator from New York will remove that discrimination.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. DILL. What about the employees of a municipal electric light and power system?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand that they are exempt at the present time.

Mr. DILL. Is not that a proprietary organization also?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should think so, if any are to be proprietary.

I might say to the Senator that one of my objections to this situation is that the Internal Revenue Department is undertaking to say to the cities of America what are or are not correct municipal functions. I think, in the name of home rule, that cities are entitled to decide for themselves what municipal functions they shall operate.

I am heartily in favor of the amendment. I think it is absolutely just. It involves practically no revenue to-day, because most of these employees are in the lower brackets; but in the name of a fair release from discrimination, and in the name of municipal home rule, I think this amendment is entitled to be adopted.

Mr. COPELAND, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. PHIPPS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield first to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I suggest that the Senator from Michigan offer his amendment now in place of mine. I am told that his amendment is in better form than mine, and brings the same issue before us. There is no pride of authorship in it, of course.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then I will offer mine as a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York withdraws his amendment. The Senator from Michigan offers an amendment which will be stated.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There will have to be two amendments under my offer, because the matter has been drawn in that form by the experts of the Finance Committee.

I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 91, it is proposed to strike out lines 24 to 25 and lines 1 to 6 on page 92, inclusive, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

(b) Officers and employees of States and Territories: Amounts received by officers or employees of any State or Territory, or political subdivision thereof, as compensation for personal services in such office or employment, except to the extent that such compensation is paid by the United States Government directly or indirectly. For the purposes of this subsection the terms "officers" and "employees" shall include individuals employed by a corporation at least 95 per cent of the ownership or control of which is directly or indirectly, through voting power or otherwise, vested in a State, Territory, or political subdivision thereof.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask, in the time of the Senator from Michigan, if the Senator from Utah will not permit this amendment to be adopted, and let it go to conference?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not like the inference of the Senator from Mississippi when he suggests that the amendment be allowed to go to conference.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the sentiment of the Senate is for this proposition. I believe it was in the Finance Committee, and I had hoped that, in order to expedite the passage of this measure, we might accept the amendment and let it go to conference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest to the junior Senator from Michigan that we test the matter out here by a vote in order that the conferees may be assured of the fact that a majority of the Senate are in favor of the amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I would like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. If I remember correctly, in 1924 we passed this kind of a provision exempting these employees.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It was passed in the Senate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I think that statement is slightly in error. Congress abated the back tax in the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will yield, that related to penalties imposed.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, there was a question as to whether those employees were taxable or not, and a penalty was imposed upon each of the taxpayers who had not made a return or paid a tax.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is that all we did?

Mr. SMOOT. That is all we did.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Just a word before the Senator speaks. Let me say to the Senator from Minnesota that I think we had a right to understand, however, at that time that with the abatement of these penalties it was to be our policy to recognize that those men were municipal employees, but the action here taken related only to penalties.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I so understood.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will look over the RECORD, he will find in the debate that there was an objection to exempting all of these people from taxation, but the tax not only having been imposed, but the Treasury Department having imposed a penalty, in the act of 1924 we provided that those penalties should not be imposed upon these individuals, as had been done by the Treasury Department. That is as far as we went.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I simply rose to call attention to that very situation. There was great disappointment because the action in 1924 did not clear up the situation entirely. It was generally expected that the employees of water departments would be relieved from the payment of the tax and put on the same basis as other employees of the city. In our case in Denver the waterworks are owned entirely, exclusively, by the city, and it certainly is a discrimination to have those employees subjected to tax when other employees in other departments in the city are not under obligation to pay a tax.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. SACKETT. I would like to say only this, that it seems to me the object is to make a fair bill. The reason why these employees of the water company are taxed is that the cities have found it necessary to form these corporations, owned by the city, in order to do the actual business. It does not change the status of the individual, and if you are going to omit the tax on regular city employees, these should not be penalized simply because it is found necessary to change the form of the organization, I very much hope that this tax will be abandoned.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if we enter upon this field I do not know where we are going to land. Are we going now to exempt the employees of the Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co.? That will be the next step. I do not see any difference between them and these employees.

Mr. COPELAND. Is the Senator disturbed about that?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I am rather disturbed about it. I do not know just how far this thing is going.

Mr. SACKETT. Does the city own that company completely? This amendment provides that there must be 95 per cent ownership, which is practically complete ownership, except for the directors' shares. The employees of such a company are in the same situation as the firemen and policemen.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I wish to say to the Senator from Utah that these cases are not identical. There is private profit in the case of the Philadelphia street railway, and there is no private profit in connection with the organizations covered by the amendment proposed by my colleague. In that kind of utility there is no private profit. In the case of the Philadelphia railways, of which the Senator speaks, there is private profit, the same as there is in the Chicago elevated, where there is a division of earnings between the city and the company.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to have the Senator offer his other amendment, because there must be another amendment to complete this one. The pending amendment is not complete. I would like to hear what the other amendment is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan offers an amendment, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. They both have to go together.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 243, after line 5, insert a new section as follows:

SEC. —. SALARIES OF STATE AND MUNICIPAL OFFICERS—RETROACTIVE

Any taxes imposed by the revenue act of 1926 or prior revenue acts upon any individual in respect of amounts received by him as compensation for personal services as an officer or employee of any State or political subdivision thereof (except to the extent that such compensation is paid by the United States Government directly or indirectly), shall, subject to the statutory period of limitation properly applicable thereto, be abated, credited, or refunded. For the purposes of this paragraph the terms "officer" and "employee" shall include individuals employed by a corporation at least 95 per cent of the ownership or control of which is directly or indirectly, through voting power or otherwise, vested in a State or political subdivision thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the two amendments will be considered together.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; to their being considered together. There is not one scintilla of reason why this latter amendment should be adopted.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I can not quite consent to that statement.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator may not, but if we adopt this amendment, we might as well make the whole bill retroactive in every relief provision.

Mr. VANDENBERG. So far, for instance, as the employees of the city of Detroit are concerned, it was not until February 17 of the present year, 1928, that the issue was finally determined that they could be taxed or would be taxed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when the 1926 act was before us, the same question arose, and was positively agreed with those who appeared before the committee that they never would ask for any retroactive feature. That is what was agreed upon.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, if it was the intention of the legislation in 1926 to exempt these employees, and it is found now that they are not exempt, why should we not have it retroactive?

Mr. SMOOT. There was no such intention, and no such understanding, and no such talk.

Mr. DILL. Was it the intention of the committee in the consideration of the last bill to tax the salaries of the water employees?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly it was, and it does tax them. The only relief we gave them was to make the retroactive feature apply to them.

Mr. DILL. Why did you select water employees as being those whose salaries ought to be taxed, and not the others? What is there about a man working in the water department that he should have his salary taxed?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is mistaken when he says it was just the water employees.

Mr. DILL. I am asking the Senator the question.

Mr. SMOOT. It covers the whole of that class of employees.

Mr. DILL. The ruling of the Revenue Department is that the water employees are not exempt.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the only class that came up to them for a ruling. They would apply the same identical ruling to-day, under the law.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. It is a very easy thing to misunderstand each other, and to misunderstand what was the purpose of the Senate. I am sure the Senator from Minnesota will bear me out in the statement that we understood in whatever legislation we succeeded in passing two or three years ago that these employees were to be exempt.

I think that was the feeling of the Revenue Department, because it is only recently that these men have been assessed taxes, beginning with 1925, and they should not be. We are all agreed—I believe a majority of the Senators agree—that these employees are municipal employees in the true sense and they should not be taxed, and if they have been taxed and if the payments have been made, the money should be returned to them. If any penalties have been imposed, they should be abated.

Mr. SMOOT. It is just the reverse. The statement was made here that they were taxable, and the only reason why the retroactive feature was inserted was because they took it for granted that they were not, and therefore did not pay the tax, and we went so far as to relieve them of any taxes which had accumulated up to that date. I remember it well. I know that is exactly what was said two years ago upon this floor. I am perfectly willing to get the record.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that it resolves itself into a question of justice. Are these employees who are being taxed municipal employees, and as such entitled to the same privileges and rights other employees of the city receive? It seems to be conceded that in the case of waterworks owned by the municipality, the man who is working for the waterworks, who is running the pump, for instance, should not be taxed any more than the policeman in the same city. If he has been, then, if it is our belief that that is wrong, whether it is in the future or whether it was in the past, it is common justice that he should be relieved, it seems to me. If we do not believe that they are municipal employees, then, of course, we should not abate any tax, and we should continue to tax them in the future.

If we are going to exempt one class of employees of a municipality, which we have done, I do not see why we should not exempt all of the employees, and if in the past we have taxed them, contrary to the theory we believe to be the right one, we should not try to collect that tax. As I understand it, they have gone on the theory up until recently that they were city employees, and have made no attempt to return their salaries to the collection officers of the United States on the theory that they were taxable. But recently it has been held, so the Senator from Michigan says, that they are taxable under the law. If we want to relieve that class of municipal employees, it seems to me we ought to relieve those who were taxed last year just the same as we relieve those who are going to be taxed next year.

Mr. SACKETT. Every argument that applies to this year applies to last year.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me they are just the same; and I do not object to it being retroactive. I do not think we ought to make fish out of one class and fowl of another. It seems to me that if if anyone working for a municipality can not under the law be taxed by the Federal Government on his income it should not make any difference in what capacity he is laboring. If I had my way, I would not relieve anybody, whether he were working for the Federal Government or a State or a municipality. I believe all ought to be taxed on their salaries alike. But it seems to be held that under our Constitution we can not tax State officers, and if we can not tax part of them I do not see how we can justly tax any of them.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am in full accord with the statement of the Senator from Nebraska that common justice requires us to tax everybody uniformly. There is no reason in justice why a man who operates a pump for a city should get off tax free while a man who operates a pump for the Senator or myself should have to pay a tax on his income. The trouble is that we bump into the Constitution, under which it has been held there are certain classes of employees of municipalities that we have not the constitutional power to tax. It seems to me that it is a misfortune that we have not, although I do not quarrel with the decision of the Supreme Court.

But why extend that misfortune one inch further than the Constitution compels us to go? It seems to me the moment we begin to add legislative prohibitions, begin to make legislative inequalities on top of those made by the Constitution itself, we are simply making the situation worse and unfair to that great mass of the citizens who can hide behind the Constitution and who have to bear the tax, and we are just making the bill that much more unjust than it is now.

Mr. VANDENBERG. On the other hand, we have certain municipal employees within our jurisdiction and we certainly are charged with the duty of being fair to all of them alike. Two wrongs can not make a right. If the Senator from Pennsylvania is disappointed that part of the employees are exempt, he should not disappoint the other part of the employees by being unfair to them.

Furthermore, I submit this thought to him: Most of the employees in the municipal department are interchangeable under civil service. They are at the mercy of the interchangeable feature of the civil service. Therefore, a man who is in the supply department, we will say, transferred there from the water department, is transferred from a tax exemption to a tax liability, and he is not responsible at all. He is in the same municipality, on the same standard of pay, and yet under different rules. I do not see how that can be defended on the basis of justice and equity.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a difference in this regard as to the salary of those two classes of people. It is true the Constitution prevents the taxation of employees of municipalities, States, and counties, but in this case, where there is an organization virtually owned and controlled and directed by the city, even though they do own only 95 per cent, the employees of the organization have their salaries fixed according to the wages fixed in every other similar class of work.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, no; that is not so.

Mr. SMOOT. It was so testified here in 1926 and in 1924.

Mr. COUZENS. I will say to the Senator that I know personally of definite cases where that is not so, and that is better than testimony.

Mr. SMOOT. All I say is that it was testimony presented to the committee. There was no question about it at the time. That was the difference between the two, and that being the case there should be one exempt and the other should pay a tax. The man who receives the same identical wage upon the same basis is compelled to pay a tax. Why should he not be compelled to pay it?

Mr. COUZENS. Where the water department is wholly municipally owned, and not a private corporation owned by the city, the employees are taxable.

Mr. SACKETT. That is because they have a water company privately owned in effect.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, no.

Mr. SACKETT. But if the city should see fit to change that status and put those employees under the same provisions as the police and firemen, then they would be exempt.

Mr. SMOOT. And they would have to take the same salaries paid by the city.

Mr. SACKETT. And so they do to-day, when a corporation is fully owned by the city. It is just a matter of the city's convenience as to how they handle the water company, and we put the penalty upon the employee, because the city wants to change the status. I do not think it is a fair proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not care to discuss it any further.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let us submit it to a vote.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly hope the Senate is not going to make a wrong retroactive provision covering a wrong.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The first vote is upon the principle of general exemption. Let us have a vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will go as far as anyone to carry out the principle of comity between the States and the Federal Government, but I think that comity should be extended only to such employees of the Federal Government and such employees of the State government and its subdivisions as are necessarily in charge of the ordinary functions of the Government and of the States. If the State should go into private business, such as building railroads, the employees are certainly not entitled to exemption. If the United States shall go into private business, I do not think the employees engaged in that business are entitled to exemption.

The matter of street railways is not a necessary part of the functions of city government. In that case the city enters into business for the purpose of making money or saving money. It is not a part of the necessary functions of a city government. Those employees certainly are not entitled to exemption. When we come to electric light companies, of course they are entitled to it because it is a part of the function of the city to supply the people with light. The same is true of waterworks. There can be no question about it, I think. But I understand this amendment is drawn so broad that the exemption would apply to any enterprise the city might undertake in the nature of street railways and things of that kind for the purpose of making money or saving money.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I admit the line of demarcation is very difficult to draw, but the principle is clear to my mind. In order to entitle a Federal employee or a State employee or an employee of a subdivision of the State to exemption, it is necessary that he should be engaged in work that is ordinarily within the functions of the administration of the affairs committed to the charge of the city or State.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator knows there has been evolution. There was a time when even the lighting of streets was done by private interests at so much per lamp. That evolution has grown so that it is not only nearly every community that furnishes its own lighting for its streets, but nearly every community now furnishes its own water. In some cases it has developed to the point where the city furnishes its own transportation facilities.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it is very questionable whether they are entitled to exemption, but I would be willing to draw the line broad and wide enough to allow that class of employees to be included. But when it comes to street railways I do not agree to that at all. We have had a decision of the supreme court in my State, where the State entered into the business of building and operating railroads. The court held that the State in that particular divested itself of its sovereignty and became subject to the general laws which apply to private citizens.

Mr. FLETCHER. The same thing was held in South Carolina in the liquor case, when the State went into the liquor business.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it is a case where the sovereign, whether State or Nation, has gone outside of the ordinary domain of the jurisdiction which is conferred upon it by its charter and engaged in private business enterprises, then the employees stand upon the same footing with other private citizens and are not entitled to this exemption under the principle of parity.

Mr. VANDENBERG, Mr. BARKLEY, and Mr. COUZENS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield first to the junior Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator know of any municipal function more generally exercised in America to-day than that of municipal waterworks?

Mr. SIMMONS. I had just stated, if the Senator will pardon me, that it is very difficult to draw the line; but with the desire to do full justice in my mind to the State government I have been willing to make it broad enough to include lighting and waterworks, although I do not think that is absolutely one function of a city government.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from North Carolina knows with what great respect I look upon any views he may express on any subject.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is true that in many cities they have publicly owned and operated hospitals, which to some extent invade the domain of privately owned and operated hospitals.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would be liberal enough to take them in.

Mr. BARKLEY. What distinction does the Senator draw between a publicly owned lighting plant, lighting the streets for its citizens, and on the other hand a publicly owned street railway system furnishing transportation for its citizens along the publicly owned streets?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think it is at all within the province of the city to enter into that business except for the purpose of making money.

Mr. SMOOT. In the Metcalf case in the Supreme Court, the court took the position absolutely that the employees were taxable.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to be as liberal as it is possible to be, but if we begin to broaden this thing it will finally have to be extended to every possible activity of a city or town that it may want to enter into, or even a county or State. Whether it be the railroad business or what not, we would have to extend the exemption to the employees engaged in that operation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah maintain his objection to combining the two amendments of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Utah to state, I think, that water employees are now exempt.

Mr. SMOOT. I said municipal employees are exempt, and that is all the amendments are asking for.

Mr. COUZENS. But the waterworks employees are not exempt. The Senator should not make the broad statement that the municipal employees are exempt, because that is not a true statement. They are only partially exempt.

Mr. SMOOT. I will take the decision of the Supreme Court as to what an employee of the Government is. The court said it is where they are engaged in municipal-government functions.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator is referring to the case he mentioned two years ago, where a man was giving part time in the waterworks, and during only a few weeks of the year he was on the pay roll. He asked exemption, and, of course, the court said very properly that he was not entitled to exemption.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator has the decision he will find the rule is applicable in every case.

Mr. COPELAND. It was held that the man was not a municipal employee.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly he was not.

Mr. COPELAND. Because he was only giving a few weeks' time to that particular duty. We had that matter argued out here two or three years ago. It does not relate in any way to the permanent employees who spend all their time at the works. It related only to a man who was doing many other jobs besides this particular one.

Mr. SMOOT. That was the case, but the Supreme Court went further than his case, and stated exactly what the situation is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 91, strike out lines 24 to 25 and lines 1 to 6 on page 92, inclusive, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

(b) Officers and employees of States and Territories: Amounts received by officers or employees of any State or Territory, or political subdivision thereof, as compensation for personal services in such office or employment, except to the extent that such compensation is paid by the United States Government directly or indirectly. For the purposes of this subsection the terms "officers" and "employees" shall include individuals employed by a corporation at least 95 per cent of the ownership or control of which is directly or indirectly, through voting power or otherwise, vested in a State, Territory, or political subdivision thereof.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am not able to support this amendment, because I think the proposal to exempt from taxation the income of officers and employees of a corporation at least 95 per cent of the stock of which is owned or controlled by a municipality involves a principle that we ought never to recognize. I see, however, much force in the general position taken by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. I do not disagree with what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has said. Of course, the amendment is the result of court decisions, and it is recognized as established that, under our system, the General Government can not tax the local governments.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia pardon an interruption?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I call the attention of the Senator to this provision of the amendment.

For the purposes of this subsection the terms "officers" and "employees" shall include individuals employed by a corporation at least 95 per cent of the ownership or control of which is directly or indirectly, through voting power or otherwise, vested in a State, Territory, or political subdivision thereof.

It includes any enterprise they may go into.

Mr. GEORGE. I said that I could never support the amendment with that provision in it, but what I am trying to say is that it is not at all necessary, in view of court decisions, in the framing of a tax act to undertake to run fine distinctions between strictly governmental functions and nongovernmental functions.

There are many exceptions in this proposed tax act and in all tax acts. We arbitrarily exempt from taxation certain amounts and authorize certain exemptions in favor of particular classes. To undertake a fine distinction based upon the decisions of the courts, holding that so long as a political subdivision of a State is performing a strictly governmental function the incomes of its officers and employees are not subject to the Federal income tax, but that its officers and employees engaged in nongovernmental activities are subject to the tax, is to run into trouble and, as I think, work an injustice, as the Senator from Michigan has pointed out. There is no equity in imposing a tax upon one class of municipal employees and at the same time exempting the income received by another class of municipal employees. So it seems to me that it would be very much better in writing the tax act to say that employees of a State, county, or municipality should not be subject to the tax upon income derived solely from the State, county, or municipality for personal service. I would be willing to vote for that kind of amendment, as it is a more reasonable distinction if we are going to make any distinction; and under the Constitution, of course, we must make some distinction in favor of the employee engaged exclusively in the performance of a function of government in a legal sense.

Mr. SMOOT. I should be perfectly willing to accept an amendment of that kind.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Georgia if my original amendment does not cover what he has in mind. That amendment reads:

For the purposes of this act officers and employees of any State or political subdivision shall not be discriminated against because their full-time service is given to a publicly owned and operated water-supply system, street railway, or other public utility, and any taxes and penalties heretofore imposed upon such persons shall be abated, credited, or refunded.

Mr. GEORGE. Without opportunity to study the amendment, I would not say whether it would meet the views that I have tried to express. I would much rather insert in the tax act an exemption of such employees of municipalities as are engaged in strictly municipal business, though some of it may not be governmental in a strict technical sense, than to undertake to draw the distinction between municipal employees.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me say to the Senator from Georgia that we thought two or three years ago that we had reached an understanding on that matter. That is the reason why I am anxious that we should be very specific at this time, because otherwise we shall find that the taxing department will go ahead, as they have since 1925, and tax these employees. I am particularly interested in the water companies. They have been taxing water-company employees; there has been no relief such as we anticipated would be given by the action we took at that time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, does the Senator mean that he wants now specifically to exempt employees employed in electric-lighting plants and waterworks?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator wish to stop there?

Mr. COPELAND. So far as I am personally concerned, my interest has not gone beyond that; but both Senators from Michigan are anxious to have the principle extended.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that is in the twilight zone; but in the interest of the municipality, in the interest of the employee, and in the interest of harmony between the Federal Government and the State governments, I would be willing to treat waterworks and lighting plants as a part of the function of government in connection with city administration. I would be willing to go that far, but I would not go any farther.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I wish the amendment might be adopted and go to conference to be perfected there if there is any such provision in it that is as dangerous as the Senator indicates. If we can establish the principle on the roll call, and then let the conference committee perfect it, that will be perfectly satisfactory to the author of the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator refers to the first amendment?

Mr. VANDENBERG. To the first amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendments offered by the Senators from Michigan and New York. I think that the correct exposition of this question has been made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. I invite the attention of Senators to the possible precedent that may be established if the Federal Government allows too great exemptions and deductions in behalf of persons who may be connected indirectly with State or municipal governments. If we exempt from taxation the incomes of persons employed in business enterprises owned or controlled by States and their political subdivisions, and the Federal Government should enter upon the operation of railroads, as it may, the operation of ships, as it has done, and engages in general business undertakings that come within the category of private endeavor, the States may be denied the right to collect income taxes from the thousands of persons employed in such enterprises upon the theory that they are agents of the Federal Government and so immune from State taxation.

Many Federal employees receive large salaries from the Shipping Board and from other governmental agencies and corporations engaged in business concerns of a nongovernmental character. States imposing income taxes, as they have a right to, may encounter obstacles to the collection of the same if the Federal Government frees all persons from income taxes who receive compensation from States and municipalities engaged in activities of a private or nongovernmental character.

If we establish the principle that the United States will not tax the employees of cities or their agencies and corporations who are engaged in purely private business, running railroads and profit-making plants, then when the States attempt to tax Federal employees engaged in a multitude of proprietary or nongovernmental activities we will find our action here paraded as a precedent, which will come home to vex us and to impair the power of the States to derive revenue from those who should pay.

I favor granting this exemption to those employees who are engaged in purely governmental activities but not those who serve the States or municipalities who are carrying out business activities. If we shall exempt from taxation under the income tax those who are engaged in purely governmental functions for municipalities and the States, we will exempt, of course, from taxation those who are engaged in purely governmental functions who are serving the Federal Government.

Mr. LOCHER. Does the Senator consider the operation of a waterworks a municipal function?

Mr. KING. I would be willing to go that far.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRATTON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. I do not know how he would vote if present. Therefore, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH of Montana (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WHEELER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair on this question with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD], and will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. JONES. I have been requested to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE]; and

So Mr. VANDENBERG'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May we have a vote now on the other amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the second amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. GEORGE. May the amendment be stated?

Mr. SMOOT. So that the Senate may understand it, I will state that this amendment simply makes retroactive the amendment which has just been adopted.

Mr. GEORGE. On that question I wish to be heard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I stated to the Senate that if one provision of the amendment just adopted were stricken out I could very well vote for it, not upon the ground that these employees are necessarily entitled to exemption, but upon the ground that it is difficult to draw the distinction between governmental and nongovernmental functions. I desire, however, to direct the attention of the Senate to the amendment as adopted, because it has a bearing on the pending amendment.

The amendment provides for the exemption of the salaries or incomes of officers and employees of any State or Territory or political subdivision thereof, and then declares:

For the purposes of this subsection the terms "officers" and "employees" shall include individuals employed by a corporation at least 95 per cent of the ownership or control of which is directly or indirectly, through voting power or otherwise, vested in a State, Territory, or political subdivision thereof.

That amendment is wholly indefensible on any just ground, as I think. The head of a corporation drawing $25,000 per year, not one penny of the stock of which is owned by a municipality, may have his entire income exempted from taxation if that corporation, directly or indirectly, is controlled by the municipality by means of a voting-trust agreement, recognized in some States.

I wonder what you are going to say to the farmer who upon his little farm earns a little more than $5,000 when you exact of him an income tax, though his neighbor, who is employed by a corporation at $10,000 per annum, goes free, although the municipality does not own a dollar of the corporation's stock, but merely controls it through a voting-trust agreement.

It can not be said that this amendment is based upon the theory of exempting the small wage earner, because the wage earner, if married, has an exemption of $3,500 arbitrarily fixed in the income tax law.

Mr. VANDENBERG. How much was that exemption in 1925?

Mr. GEORGE. It was $2,500 under the act of 1924; but I am speaking of the act of 1926. Every married man has an exemption of $3,500. He must earn in excess of that amount, and not only in excess of that amount but he must earn a sum which, when reduced by all proper deductible expenses allowed by the act, gives him a net income of more than $3,500 before he is taxable.

So it is not in the interest of the small wage earner. The small wage earner is not affected. But this amendment, it seems to me, goes beyond all possible reason, because it exempts the officer of a corporation, not of a municipal corporation, but any corporation owned or controlled by a municipality through a trust voting or pooling arrangement recognized by the law of the State.

It not only does that, but it exempts from the income tax the income of one, whatever his income may be, employed by a corporation jointly owned by a municipality and individuals or other corporations. Bear in mind, he is not required to be employed by the municipality exclusively, nor paid entirely by the municipal corporation, but if he is employed by a corporation 95 per cent of which is owned by a municipality, or which is controlled by a municipality directly or indirectly, through voting power or otherwise, then his income is wholly exempt from the income tax laws of the United States.

Mr. President, from the earliest time in this country it was, of course, a matter of controversy as to whether the Federal Government could tax an agent or officer of the State, or whether the State could tax an officer or agent of the Federal Government. In an early case it was decided by the Supreme Court that the power to tax, being the power to destroy, could not be exercised by the one sovereignty against the officers or agents of the other. In view of our dual system, it must be conceded that neither sovereign could tax the other sovereign, because if that should be conceded, of course the complete sovereignty of the State or of the Nation, as the case might be, would thereby be limited, and one would be subjected to control by the other.

That has remained in our law. After the ratification of the income-tax amendment it was believed by many eminent jurists, not without reason, that all incomes had been subjected to the Federal income-taxing power because the States had consented to the amendment. The language of the amendment expressly granted the power to tax all incomes from whatever source derived.

Whether that view was right or wrong, we are familiar, of course, with the line of court decisions even since the ratification of the sixteenth amendment. But the whole controversy in this case arises in consequence of decisions which simply hold that an employee of a municipality engaged in a nongovernmental function is subject to be taxed upon his income if his income puts him within brackets where the tax applies, just as the farmer, just as the merchant, just as the lawyer, and just as the man who works for a private corporation.

In writing a tax law it is proper and legitimate, as I think, to attempt no fine distinction between nongovernmental and governmental functions, and say that since the man who is employed strictly in the performance of a governmental function can not be taxed, therefore we will recognize that he is not subject to the tax, but that the man who is engaged in a nongovernmental function should be taxed. Frequently it is impossible to distinguish between the two. The law is a progressive science. When it is admitted that it is not an exact science, it is meant that it is progressive. What is strictly a governmental function to-day may not be so a hundred years hence, and what was not strictly governmental a few years ago might, in the light of our advancing civilization, be classed as a governmental function now.

That being true, I said to the Senator from Michigan that I would be perfectly willing to make a broad distinction in the act and say that all officers and employees of the State or of the county or of the municipality should have their incomes exempt from taxation. But this amendment—and I am speaking to this amendment—goes further than that.

In conclusion, Mr. President, permit me to read the amendment:

For the purposes of this paragraph the terms "officer" and "employee" shall include individuals employed by a corporation at least 95 per cent of the ownership or control of which is directly or indirectly, through voting power or otherwise, vested in a State or political subdivision thereof.

I wish to say to the Senator that I could not answer to the farmer, or to the man who works in the store or factory, or to the man who earns his income in the sweat of his brow as an employee of a private individual or a private corporation, why I voted for this amendment, but insisted upon the payment of an income tax by him. Hence I voted against the amendment offered by the Senator. With that provision out of it, I would have supported it for the reason that I have indicated, but with that provision in it I do not see how the Senate can finally adhere to its action, and particularly how we can now make retroactive this amendment, containing this provision, as it does, as now proposed in the pending amendment.

PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, while we are dealing with the question of taxation, it ought to be the desire of every Senator to do that which is right and just to every taxpayer. The Master laid down a principle by which we should be guided when He demanded more of the man of 5 talents than He did of the man with 2.

I do not like to impose unjust tax burdens on wealth, but wealth ought to bear its fair share of the burdens of government. Those who have most ought to pay most; those who have least should pay least. That is the principle this Government has to follow if it is going to endure.

Mr. President, there is another principle that stands above all of them, and that is the matter of keeping this Government clean and honest, out of the hands of grafters and corruptionists. We are now told about a campaign that has just been concluded in New Jersey, where Republicans high in authority are charging fraud and corruption of the rankest kind. I have helped to drive from the Senate two or three men who purchased their seats here. I dare say that the founders of this Republic never dreamed that the day would come when you could buy a seat in the United States Senate as you can buy a seat on a stock exchange, that the man who is best equipped from a financial standpoint outdistances his opponent and carries away the honors in an election for the Senate.

Now we are confronted with a situation, the most astounding, diabolical, and dangerous that has come to my notice since I have been in public life, an effort to purchase the nomination for President of the United States. Millions are being spent. The tracks of those who are using this money are being covered up to some extent, to a very large extent.

A few days ago a committee appointed by the Senate to investigate contributions made to the candidates for President in both political parties found that Mr. Hoover had spent nearly $250,000. Of course, that is not a drop in the bucket to what he has expended. They found that Governor Smith's committee had expended about $103,000. That is enough to make even the Tammany tiger laugh. In my judgment $10,000,000 would not touch the amount they have expended since 1924 in their campaign to obtain the Democratic nomination through their secret operations and persistent efforts of the Roman Catholic political machine. Ten million dollars, in my judgment, they have spent, and more.

When our committee was in New York they had before them a Mr. Van Namee. Mr. Van Namee, as I have told the Senate before, was appointed by Governor Smith on the public-utilities commission, where he holds the power of life and death over the public utilities of the State of New York. Frank Smith occupied a similar position in Illinois. He held the same power over the public utilities there. Insull, the power king, raised his electric light and power rates upon the people. Frank Smith, sitting in the seat of power, approved them. Insull gathered in the shekels, and he in return contributed to Frank Smith, if my recollection is right, over $400,000. So Governor Smith, learning, no doubt, from Frank Smith how to do this thing, has named this man Van Namee, a man he appointed to office, the man of all men that he appointed, who had immediate and effective contact with big business in New York, and he has brought him down from Albany and put him in the Biltmore Hotel, with headquarters where Governor Smith himself lives, and he is in charge of the Smith campaign.

Mr. President and Senators, when he sends this man Kenny or somebody else up to some one engaged in the public-utilities business, of course they are going to contribute. They are being held up. It is just like a judge on the bench, with a man standing before him with a case in his court, calling on that man to contribute something to his campaign. Of course he will contribute something to it. These people are being held up with this power. And from this source they are going to gather in an immense sum of money. Mr. President, I had an unsigned letter from a citizen who said the way they get the contributions is to call on somebody in the public-utilities business and tell them that they are representing Mr. Van Namee, Governor Smith's campaign manager, and that they want this money for the governor, not to give it to the agent calling, nor to Van Namee, but to send it to somebody else, and they will give it to somebody else; and so no report is being made of it by Van Namee. Do you know where they learned that? In the Newberry case. When we drove Newberry from this Chamber, we found vouchers, check stubs, and receipts showing that they had spent over $200,000, as I remember. They had burned up checks and stubs that we think would have reached at least $500,000. Governor Smith and Van Namee have learned from them, and now this remarkable campaign manager for Governor Smith is giving an account of only $100,000 spent in the presidential campaign, and we are within nearly a month of the national convention. Senators, I do not believe their testimony. I think Kenny comes nearer representing the Tammany idea of politics and government than anybody else who has been before the committee. He appeared before the committee yesterday, as I understand, and refuted the statement of Mr. Van Namee. Van Namee had sworn to the committee that he borrowed $50,000 from Kenny and that Kenny gave $20,000 as a contribution. Kenny says, "It is not so. I did not loan any money at all. I gave it all to them"—$70,000 from one big contractor in New York State! Think of that!

Senators, listen to the astounding thing that developed. "Mr. Kenny, do you intend to give any more?" "I do." "How much?" "All they want." Mr. President, I have never seen that happen before in my life in politics, and I have been in politics more than 30 years, and 24 years of that time at the Capitol. I have never heard of anybody on either side who had the unmitigated gall to come here to the Capitol and tell the Congress in session and the country at large that they are going to buy, if they can, the presidential nomination. I have never seen such a bold and brazen effort in my life to bulldoze the Democrats of Congress and to intimidate the Democrats of the country into surrendering the principles on which this great Government rests and to compel them to adopt and swallow whole the Tammany practices of perversion of public office, of graft and corruption in politics.

If the time ever comes when one can purchase a place in this body and get away with it, if the time comes when one can buy the Presidency, secure the nomination by the corrupt use of money, backed by a selfish, powerful, and dangerous political machine, God help the country. The Roman Catholic political machine is the most powerful machine of its size in the country and dangerous to our free institutions. The American people have got to reckon with it. Senators, this issue has been forced upon us, upon America, and it must and will be met.

I want, I say again, to give these Roman Catholic newspapers a chance to correct the false statements that they have made about me from the time they forced this question upon the country by their un-American stand in 1926 and 1927. I am not attacking the Catholic religion. I want the individual Catholic to worship as he pleases. The Protestant feels that way. The Jew feels that way.

But the Roman Catholic hierarchy does not feel that way toward the Protestant and the Jew or other non-Catholic denominations.

What I am fighting against is the day when the Roman Catholics have planned to deny to the Protestants their religion and to the Jew his religion. The last Roman Catholic book that I know anything about, published by Doctor Ryan, of the Catholic University of America. It is called State and Church and is sent out to the faithful. In that book he points to the day when Roman Catholics are strong enough to set up a Catholic state in the United States and then he says they will proscribe other denominations. If they permit other denominations to carry on at all, the book assures us, it will be only the church members and confined to them until they die out. That is exactly what it means. He says plainly "We can not permit them to carry on general propaganda." That is, you can not have revival meetings and invite outsiders to join the Protestant Church or other non-Catholic denominations. It is strongly intimated that those already members of other denominations may be permitted to remain members until they die out and then that church will be closed.

That is what the intelligent Protestant is fighting against and what the wide-awake Jew does not want to happen. The American citizen who understands what religious liberty means does not want the day to come when a Catholic will have the power to say that the Protestant can not worship God as his father and mother before him worshiped, and that the Jew can not worship as Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and a long line of illustrious Jews have worshiped. We want to keep this country free so that everybody can worship as he or she chooses. But there is a distinct program and deep-laid plan and purpose in the minds of many Roman Catholics to control this country and to make it Catholic. I am against that with all the force that I possess and I dare to fight it in the Senate and on the hustings, and, Senators, the masses of the people are with me. There is no doubt about that. The newspapers in the main are suppressing the truth and you are not hearing from the people like I am. It is impossible for me to read as they come in the letters that I receive. I have thousands of letters in my office that I have not had a chance to read. They are coming in every mail; coming from all over the country, indorsing my position and saying that many Protestants are asleep—lulled to sleep by the deception and hypocrisy of certain Roman Catholics. God help those Protestants to wake up!

Mr. President, Governor Smith is the man selected by the Roman Catholic political machine to be the Roman candidate for President of the United States. He is the man they have picked out and agreed upon to lead their fight for the Presidency. A lady in West Virginia said to me: "Senator, if Governor Smith had been a Protestant he would have been nominated and elected." I said, "If he had been a Protestant he would not have been Governor of New York," and that is true. I repeat that he is the man that the Roman Catholic hierarchy and political machine have rallied around and done all kinds of reprehensible things to hold him in the office of governor until they got ready to make him their candidate for President of the United States.

Such trafficking and such corrupt and scandalous trading nobody has ever engaged in as that Tammany bunch has to push this man along up the ladder. They betrayed and traded off the Democratic Party in 1916 because Wilson would not go to war with Mexico in behalf of the Roman Catholic Church. They traded it off again in 1920 and voted with the Republicans, helping to defeat the Democrats, looking to the time when they could frighten and threaten the Democrats into supporting their candidate—Governor Smith. They deserted the Democratic Party in 1924, and supported the Republican ticket. In Tammany New York City on the day of the election they were so bold and brazen in their political betrayal that they had badges "Al and Cal" worn by so-called Democratic members of Tammany. I got that from an ex-Member of Congress, a Democrat from New York, who saw them himself. They were trading the party off and trying to defeat it then, but now they come with the leader of the Roman Catholic political machine and tell the Democrats of the country that if we will not let them name their candidate to lead the Democratic Party that they will do as they have done before, refuse to vote the Democratic ticket. Governor Smith is riding over the country in the private cars of contractors in New York State. He went to North Carolina in one of them. He has been to White Sulphur Springs in one of them.

It is very evident that the private special interests of the country are tied into this man's candidacy and program, and now they come and tell us real American Democrats, "We have got to nominate him."

The Roman Catholic Irish World, perhaps the biggest Catholic paper in the country, says, "If we do not nominate him we commit suicide." They will not vote the ticket. They will bolt the ticket. Roman Catholic papers throughout the country are serving notice on us in advance that if Smith is not nominated, the Catholics will not vote for the Democratic nominee. Senators, what do you think of that? The great Democratic Party, the party of Jefferson, Jackson, Cleveland, and Wilson is coming to the point where it seems that its designated leadership here has laid down to a very large extent. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] ought to come out in view of the political tactics of Governor Smith and the ugly disclosures in his campaign management for the Presidency and help to purge our party of every cloud of scandal that now hangs above its fair name. He owes that to the party and the country. This able investigating committee of ours has gone out and brought in at the outset these startling and astounding statements and has just begun its work. It is said that witnesses testified that they contributed this money and that they are going to contribute more, that they, in spite of wholesome public opinion and the good of the country, will contribute whatever money is necessary. Is not that a remarkable and astounding statement?

My God, what is the Democratic Party coming to under its present leadership? I will tell you what it looks like, it is about to be driven to the point where, out of love for right principles, devotion to duty, and unadulterated loyalty to American ideals and institutions it will be compelled to reorganize and save the ark of American democracy from the exploitation and dangerous control of those who do not understand or who do not appreciate the great and noble mission of the Democratic Party. The Democratic Party will not turn over the control of this Government to those who would cripple, weaken, or destroy our free institutions. We know enough about the Roman Catholic political machine to make us afraid of Roman Catholic control. I pray God to give the Democratic men and women of this Nation courage to stand up in this serious trouble and say to that arrogant and foreign group: "You shall not pass." This Government is not for sale. The Presidency is not to be put upon the auction block and sold.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] rendered a great service to the country in a speech in Chicago in 1920. He showed how certain Republicans were trying to buy the nomination. He told of the time when old Pertinax bought the emperorship of Rome for a million and a half dollars. Why, Mr. President, this Roman bunch in America have put old Pertinax out of the picture. He is a mere piker compared to the Al Smith money bunds of Rome and Tammany.

Now, they come down to Washington and flaunt the arrogance and impudence of their ill-gotten gain in the face of those chosen to represent the Nation in the Congress and say, "Yes; we gave him money. We are going to give him more." In effect, they say, "we will give all that is necessary to buy the office of President for the leader of the Roman Catholic political machine. How much will it take?" That is what it means. And that seems to be the idea that they meant to convey to the country. Why? Because they think there are enough people in the country who are ready to be sold like a sheep in the market place for their filthy lucre. They are going to find to the contrary.

Mr. President, this morning the Washington Post contained a remarkable editorial. We are being treated to some strange politics, politics of a peculiar brand in this day and time. And let me say I am getting tired of the Republican Party leaders trying to put a nominee on us who is beaten before he starts. You know as well as I know that if Al Smith is nominated by this social-equality ring and Roman crowd at Houston he will run third in the November election. I make the prediction now that it will be 1912 over again. Wilson ran first, Roosevelt ran second, and Taft ran third. This time, if Smith is nominated, the Republican nominee may run first, though I am not sure, but if he does, the Jeffersonian Democracy's ticket will run second, and the Roman Catholic political machine's ticket, offspring of Tammany, will run third. Put that in your pipe and smoke it. [Laughter.] Oh, you smart Republican leaders are doing your best to have Governor Smith nominated at Houston. They know if they put him on us we will be crying like Paul did, "Who will deliver me from the body of this death"—political death to the party. [Laughter.]

The Roman Catholic political machine is using its machinery. They control the party in certain States that never go Democratic. The machinery of our party in those States is largely in the hands of the Roman Catholics there. So they have manipulated and gotten hold of and thrown the delegates to Smith, but he is not carrying Democratic States. The solid South, that has held the ark of the covenant through the years, has never lowered her arms in battle against corruption and the sale of office in Senate, House, or Presidency. Thank God, she is still holding the line. South Carolina on yesterday went against Smith, as Alabama, Georgia, and Texas have already done, and as Mississippi, Virginia, and Florida will do, and as soon as the people vote in North Carolina they will go against him. The Smith people are spending money down there. It will do them no good. North Carolina is not for sale.

It will go heavily against Smith, the people down there say. I have been there three times, and I am going back again. When I got there I found the Smith men saying, "Oh, well, he is nominated, and some of us thought it was just as well to go along." I said, "Nominated for what? He is not going to be nominated for President of the United States at Houston. We have got his number; we have got him blocked; he will not be nominated; he will be defeated at Houston"; and the New York World comes along and tells us if he shall be defeated, then we will face certain defeat. I would rather have defeat and go down with clean colors and honorable flags flying with no act of dishonor charged against my American ship and crew than to sail into this Tammany harbor and all that its graft and corruption mean. The chosen of the Roman Catholic political machine, a wringing wet, a Constitution nullifier, and a man who believes in social equality and permits it in New York City and State. And now the New York World boasts of it.

Mr. President, there are some things dearer to the South than party politics. The sanctity of the home is the same the world over, and the curse of God Almighty will rest upon the man who will not protect and defend it. When Governor Smith comes flaunting his Vatican flag of social equality in the face of the white people of the South, that have had to bear this burden and solve this problem, he will not get any comfort there; they will say, "Get thee behind me, you worker of iniquity; depart from me; I never knew you." Thank God, the South is not for sale. North Carolina, under the leadership of the little giant of that State [Mr. SIMMONS], and his colleague, Senator OVERMAN, will be victorious on the 26th of May, and Governor Smith's trip down there, with his satellites moving through the State, well organized and financed in precinct, county, district, and State, money unlimited, will avail him nothing, because that State is waking up. It is getting on to his game. Its people are ready for battle; they are battling now and they are not to be bartered away by certain strangely influenced Smith advocates down there.

Mr. President, the Republican Roman Catholic Washington Post this morning has an editorial calling on JIM REED to withdraw from the Presidential race and get out of the way of Governor Smith, what they call a Democratic candidate. Did Senators ever see or hear of such pusillanimous politics—a Republican newspaper publishing editorials to get one Democrat out of the way of another candidate, so-called Democrat? Is not that amusing and interesting politics? What do Senators think the people out yonder in the States will think of it—the people who think and the people who are going to act, not for the good of the Roman Catholic machine but for the good of their own Government and for the good of religious freedom in its broadest and profoundest sense, in its American sense?

If the Roman Catholic Church wants to remain in America and pursue its course as the other religious denominations do, all well and good; but if it is the purpose of that group of religionists to control this country, to establish Roman Catholicism to the exclusion of Protestantism and other denominations, above the prostrate and mangled form of Americanism, then they have got trouble coming to them. I never heard of a Protestant wanting to proscribe a Catholic; I never heard of a Jew who cared anything about how a Catholic worshiped; but when the Catholics put it in their books that when they are strong enough they are going to proscribe other religions—listen, they use this language, which I quote to you from Doctor Ryan's book—

> What chance would they have then against a Catholic state?

Senators, are we really asleep or are some of our people just "possuming"? Do Senators know what we mean by "possuming"? That is when the possum just curls up and lies down and grins and closes his eyes, and one thinks he is sleeping, but if he should reach his hand down toward his mouth the possum would bite him. There are many Protestants who are silent now, but they will soon be wide awake when they fully realize that dangerous forces are marching against the stronghold of religious freedom in America.

I would not interfere with the Catholic worshiping as he chooses; I am willing for him to do it; but I do not want him to interfere with me or with any branch of the Protestant church or any other church; that is none of his business. When he sets himself up as ordained of God to pursue and persecute and murder people who do not agree with his form of religious worship, he needs to be taught something. They went that far in France once. They murdered sixty-odd thousand Protestants and Jews; they stabbed to death babies in the arms of their mothers; they murdered old men nearly ready to be translated and the youth kneeling at the altar place praying to the God of his Protestant or Jewish father and mother. They had it in the devilish inquisition.

The history of the old church in the Old World is a history of war, persecution, intolerance, bigotry, and murder, and the overthrowing of powers that opposed Catholicism. Senators, that is wrong; that ought not to be. If they want to stay here in peace, let them treat us as they would like to be treated and say they are not going to bother other religious institutions, and let them repudiate these books that are being written and published by Roman Catholic leaders.

Now, let me submit to you—and I address this to Gov. Alfred Smith to-day, and I am going to continue to address it to him—that one of the fundamental doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church is that the will of the Pope of Rome is the supreme law of all lands. How ridiculous! And that the supreme duty of all Roman Catholics here and elsewhere is to do the will of the Pope. Governor Smith, of New York, do you approve that doctrine?

Here is another: Pope Pius IX says that the State has no right to permit the citizen to have the religion of his choice. Think of that, you American Senators! Governor Smith, do you sanction that doctrine?

Pope Pius IX said, following that, that the Catholic Church has the right to drive out and exclude all other religions and set up the Catholic religion and establish the Catholic state to maintain and sustain it. Governor Smith, do you indorse that? If you do, you stab religious liberty in America to the heart; you are not an American if you indorse that. Every man under our flag, worthy to be called an American, believes in religious freedom. I would not permit anybody to disturb the Catholic kneeling down to worship as he thought he ought to worship. If I should come upon him and want to kill him for doing that I could have no claim to being an American. When they concoct schemes to enable them to do these outrageous things to us when they get strong enough in America it is time for somebody to stand up in this Senate and sound the note of warning.

Mr. President, Cardinal Gibbons, a very able man, lived at Baltimore and died there. He said, you can not find in recorded history a single instance where a doctrine laid down by one Pope was condemned or repudiated by another Pope. The doctrine laid down by one Pope is the doctrine of all, unchangeable and eternal. Then, Senators, they sanction the statement of Pope Pius IX that a citizen has no right to have the religion of his choice; they sanction his statement that the Catholic Church has the right to abolish all other religions and set up its own to the exclusion of all others, and that the will of the Pope is the supreme law in all lands, and it is the duty of every Catholic, his supreme duty, to obey the will of the Pope.

Is it not time for Americans to stop, look, and listen? Is it not time for some Americans here to inquire whither are we drifting? Is it not time for somebody to cry out to the people who can not get the truth from the newspapers, "Watchman, what of the night?"

In the State of Iowa, at Dubuque, the Roman Catholics captured the public-school system. They have trustees on the board. Educated in parochial schools, they send their children to parochial schools to-day, but they run the public schools. Think of that; my God, think of that! A Roman Catholic has no more business at the head of a public school than a Protestant has at the head of a parochial school. Let them run their schools, and let them run them in peace, but they have no right to grab the throat of the public-school system, which is the bulwark of our liberty, the hope of free institutions in the years to come. The Roman Catholic machine is the deadly enemy of the public-school system.

Here is Governor Smith. The Roman hierarchy has ordained it that he must be President; and let me remind you of what they have done already. They have put the cardinal's colors right here in the Presidential room of the Capitol. The green curtains that hung there for years and years, that blended in so beautifully with the other decorations and colors there, have been taken down and the blood-red cardinal velvet curtains have been hung up, and they have taken the green top off of the President's desk and put a red one on that. If you go in there at night, it is so inharmonious with the other colors that it will nearly put your eyes out; but some smooth-fingered Roman employee, I am told, has thought he would take time by the forelock and go ahead and put the cardinal's colors in there from the Vatican before Alfred Smith got in.

If those colors hang there until Alfred the anointed goes in, they will fade away and be gone before he ever sees them. [Laughter.] "Its a long, long way to Tipperary," and its a long, long way from Tammany to the White House; and Alfred won't be there. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, that is not all. They have not only put their colors in the President's Room—and I shall have something to say about that one of these days—they are not only flying the Roman cross above our flag on the battleships, but here is a one dollar bill printed by the Government. It carries without authority of law the Roman cross on it, and it has the Roman Catholic rosary right under the cross on the dollar bill. If they will do that now, what would they do if they had control of the country? What would they do if they had 50 Senators in this body? Do you know, if they had 50 Senators here, they would fix the rules so that I could not make the speech that I am making to-day. There would be trouble around here. They would fix it so that Senators could not talk about a question that they did not want them to talk about.

Here is this dollar bill. There is the cross. Here is the rosary, with the beads of pearls running all around. Here is the guide that a patriot sent with it: "Cross on the back." There it is. "Rosary in the cross." There it is.

All that has been going on. Governor Smith is not going to be nominated; and God is putting it into the hearts of patriots all over the country to send me the news so that I can put it in the RECORD, and it will be preserved there until the day comes, if it ever does, when Catholics control this Government; and then they will expunge it. They will take out the last vestige. They will not permit it to stay there then. They have destroyed every piece of literature they could find that has told the truth about their work against religious freedom and free institutions.

You know, they threatened Tom Watson, of Georgia. They annoyed him down in Georgia. He had written histories on this subject that stirred the Nation. They are being sought now and read more than ever. He is dead and gone; but they used to go around there at night and annoy him. His wife saw a man with a gun out behind a tree near the house one night at 12 o'clock. She went in his library and told him to turn out the lights. He told his neighbors what had occurred. It worried him, of course. It did not frighten him, but it made him mad to think that there was a group of people who would dare to kill him because he called attention to things that he thought were contrary to the genius and interests of American institutions. He told some friends, and they told some priests that if they hurt a hair on Tom Watson's head they had better cross themselves well, for they were going home; and they would have gone home, and they ought to have gone home if they had inspired his murder.

The idea of any religious group, Protestants, Jews, or Catholics, taking it into their own hands to murder a man because his religion differs from theirs. They have written me these threatening letters. I think they have been notified fairly well that some real American neighbors would call on them in the event I was harmed, and I fully indorse that; and I have some writings in various places to that effect if anything should happen to me. I will not permit their threats to silence me when I am trying to warn my country and save it from the dangers that threaten it. I do not intend that they shall carry on in this way without the country knowing it.

Mr. President, I am trying to do my duty to my country. I am getting letters from every State in this Union, and I am filing them away. They are going to be very interesting documents in the campaign this fall, I believe. A man told me just this morning that he had a letter from a friend in his State, who said, "Why do not you help Senator HEFLIN? He is telling some important truths"; and I am. I challenge any of you to dispute what I am saying. I challenge the whole Roman hierarchy to refute the statements that I make regarding their activities and their doctrines. I defy the Roman Catholic press from one end of the country to the other and challenge them to show that what I have said about the activities of the Roman Catholic machine is not true. They do not undertake to deny it. They just say that I am intolerant, and that I am a bigot.

That used to work in the Old World, but it will not work here. What do I care about what they think about me? When Paul was fighting a great battle and leading a great cause, they denounced him for everything they could think of, but it did not deter him in the least. They stoned Stephen and murdered him, but he did not stop his battles until the last breath was gone out of his body. They persecuted old Daniel. He defied the King and told them that he was willing to die for religious freedom, and as a result of these heroic spirits we have "the undying creed of martyred faith." If the truth is to be known, somebody has got to make these fights; and here we are, with some American people apparently asleep, with the Romans tramping all around us; they put their cross above our flag on our battleships and they pull our flag down 2 feet in order to do that; putting their cross and their rosary on the currency of the country without permission of the Government; and now coming up and putting the cardinal's colors in the presidential room. If that is not unmitigated gall, I am no judge of it. Think of it, Mr. President!

Coming back to this editorial for a moment, they are appealing to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to withdraw from the presidential race. They want him to get out of the way for Alfred. Listen to this:

They fail to see how an ardent dry locally and an avowed wet nationally can harmonize Democratic sentiment in the State.

There is where they are fighting nominating a dry man with Smith. They are so wringing wet that they want to put two wets on the ticket; and they are suggesting that if a dry is put on the ticket with Governor Smith the wets will not take him. What do you suppose the American drys are thinking about this wet Tammany program?

Senators, the moral forces of this Nation are stirred to-day as they never have been before. There is a silent army in action in this Nation; a bloodless warfare is on; but they know what they are doing. They are being organized, and they are going to hold this line. It is not in the stars for Governor Smith to be nominated or elected. He is not going to be nominated; but if by any hook or crook they corrupt men and obtain this nomination through the Roman Catholic political machine, reinforced by money, they will find themselves reckoning without their host. They will not be able to put it over. The people of this Nation are not going to have this combination go over now. It is too dangerous.

Nicaragua—Mexico. I ask Governor Smith again, "Would you invade Mexico if the Pope wanted it done, if you were President?" I have asked that question here before. He is as silent as the tomb. "Would you have obeyed the mandate of the Knights of Columbus when in convention in Philadelphia, where the Government was born, they protested against their country's program, denounced it and trampled it under foot, and called on the President to abandon his policy of watchful waiting, and simply served notice in effect that they would not stand for it any longer?" That meant war. "Governor Smith, what would you have done if you had been President?"

I want to quote a Catholic right here. He is the only one anywhere in this country who has indorsed my stand on that question. The others are hanging together just like peanuts on the roots of a peanut vine. Patrick H. Callahan, of Louisville, Ky., a very able and distinguished Catholic, told me, and said, "You can quote me," "When the Knights of Columbus passed that resolution at Philadelphia, they made asses of themselves." Now the Catholic press all over the country has condemned me for helping to defeat their war program.

I stood in my place in the Senate for seven weeks and fought that program. Many of the papers of the country did me the honor—I do not think I was entitled to it—of saying that I had done more than anybody else to defeat it. I said, "Well, I hope I have. I did all I could"; but for doing that I have been marked not only for political defeat but for physical slaughter.

One of Governor Smith's friends right in New York City now, a priest named Belford, wrote in his little periodical that he called "Religion," that they ought to hire thugs to waylay me and mob me as I went away from the Capitol. A priest sat in this gallery when I stood over there fighting that war program and hissed me when I was speaking. My God! If they will do that now, with 19,000,000 people out of one hundred and thirty-odd million, what will they do if they ever get a majority? Why, they would have these Catholics sit in the galleries hissing any Senator who dared to tell the truth about Roman Catholicism and the activities of the Roman Catholic political machine.

It is a God-blessed thing that somebody talks about them now and gets the truth in the RECORD, so that at some time in the future—I may not be here; I may have passed from the stage of action and gone on—somebody can refer to this period and read the RECORD, and tell of their conduct then, in the time when I was here doing my best to arouse our people to the dangers that threatened.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE], who is always ready to become their spokesman in the Senate—I am sorry he is not in here just now; he does not know that I am talking about this matter, or he would be here—he is always ready to jump on the Ku-Klux Klan. I hold no brief for the klan, but some of the finest men and women I ever knew belong to it. My father was a member of it in reconstruction days, and in those days when our negroes, drunk on their new-found freedom, were roaming the country, inspired and led on by scalawags and carpet-baggers, it was dangerous for a white woman to walk from neighbor's house to neighbor's house in the South alone. These ku-kluxers, with their single-barreled guns did picket duty day and night and walked the highways, and protected from insults and outrage our southern women. They preserved our civilization and the integrity of our race.

The Senator from Maryland attacks them every chance he gets, but you can not get him to say anything about the Roman Catholic Knights of Columbus. The Knights of Columbus have it in their oath that "We, as Catholic citizens," do so and so. What right have they to put in the words "Catholic citizens"? If they are Americans, they are American citizens, not Catholic citizens. They could say "As people of the Catholic faith and American citizens." That is the way to put it. But their new oath says "as Catholic citizens."

What would you think if I should draw the distinction and say "As a Methodist citizen"? I am an American citizen. I am an Alabama citizen. I belong to the Commonwealth of Alabama. It is my birthplace and sovereign power locally. Then I am an American citizen. We are bound together by the ties of love and loyalty, and the cling of section to section, one people, one heart, and one flag. But when a man singles out a religion and says "I, as a Catholic citizen," he acknowledges that he is a citizen of the Roman Government first. There is no getting away from that "Catholic citizen"! I am an American citizen.

Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] is not here, because I want to have read in my time a very remarkable statement from him. It purports to be from him and it is circulated by Roman Catholics of St. John's parish calendar, of Clinton, Mass., printed by them, dated May, 1928. I ask the clerk to read the part beginning at the top down to where it is marked with a blue pencil, not with the cardinal's colors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CATHOLIC CHURCH IS BEST FOR SOUTH

Leaving out of sight all other fields of usefulness and points of view, let me say that in one social respect, in my judgment, the Catholic Church, if we may reason from its influence in Maryland, is better qualified to promote the lasting interests of the rural South than any other church.

As we know, in the South there are two races, each very numerous, which are sharply distinguished from each other by salient physical and other characteristics. In an eminent degree the future peace and prosperity of the South depends upon the extent to which amity and a spirit of mutual sympathy and helpfulness shall be maintained between these two races. In the general promotion of these sentiments I know no more powerful influence that could be enlisted than that of the Catholic Church.

The mission that it sets before itself is so high, the voice of its hierarchy is so authoritative, that the relations between the communicants, whites and colored, are naturally enough regulated to a very striking degree by the principle of religious democracy.

I have never seen a negro worshiper in a white Protestant church since I was a boy, when a few former negro slaves would sometimes occupy seats in the galleries of white Protestant churches; but one does not have to go beyond Maryland to see at times white and colored worshipers assembled under the same roof of the same Catholic church. Every afternoon on my way from my office to Calvert Station I observe going in and out of St. Francis Xavier's Colored Church white Catholics who find in that church a convenient place for their afternoon devotions.

The effect of these religious contacts is, in my opinion, altogether good. They make both whites and negroes feel that they have a common interest in the most important of all human concerns, and that the universal fatherhood of God and the universal brotherhood of man are real things and not mere conventional phrases; and they can not but result in kindlier and friendlier relations between the races than would exist. (Senator WILLIAM CABELL BRUCE.)

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, there is the distilled and obnoxious essence of social equality, by a Senator who claims that he was born in Virginia and who is now here from Maryland. I never heard Booker Washington preach a doctrine as dangerous as that. I never expected the time to come when any man born in Dixie would ever reach the point where he would be willing to lower the standard of white supremacy and be willing to mingle on the plane of social equality with the colored race. The intelligent negro, the good negro citizen, does not believe the time will ever come when negroes will have social equality. He knows it is not well to strive for it. He knows the best solution of this problem lies in the separation of the races. There are no two races that God Almighty has marked so distinctly as He has the white race and the Negro race. He intended that each should do his work as best he could in his own particular sphere.

Mr. Lincoln, in his debate with Douglas in Illinois in 1859, said, "I am opposed to permitting negroes to marry white people." He said, "As long as the two races are to remain together, I am in favor of the white race occupying the superior place."

Mr. President, the man who has a white skin who does not acknowledge that doctrine is either ignorant on the subject or he is playing mean and miserable politics, dangerous politics, to get negro votes. He is also the negro's worst enemy.

What is going to be the result of the Senator's attack upon white supremacy? Let us watch Maryland and see. Will the white people of that State submit and yield to this dangerous teaching? Are they ready to throw down the doctrine of Arthur P. Gorman and the other distinguished statesmen of other and better and brighter days for Maryland, who led the white race out of the horrors of reconstruction and carried the banner of the white man, and planted it upon the mountain top of white supremacy, so that it was flying there when Gorman died? Now comes the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] and suggests social equality, the tearing down of separate churches for the two separate and distinct races, made so by God Himself, and having white people and negro people mingle in social equality in the same church.

There is no escape from that conclusion. To have white children and negro children mixing together in their schools, and not separate schools or separate churches. The Senator ties himself to that proposition. There is no escape from it. The South is not ready to accept that doctrine. As a Southerner, as a Democrat, as an American, and as a white man, I repudiate and condemn that doctrine. It is bad for the white race. It is bad for the negro race.

My father owned more slaves, perhaps, than anybody in our section of the State, if not in the State, when the war came on. Many of the old negroes bear the Heflin name, after their master. We have all an affectionate feeling for them, and they have for us. They have known that they are in one sphere, and we are in another in the sense that is best for both. God Almighty placed us there. He had a reason for making these races separate and distinct.

There is the suggestion in the Senator's speech which I had read of social equality and race amalgamation. He is willing to have negroes and whites thrown together in the same church to worship together. He sees, he tells us, white Catholics, men and women, going into negro Catholic churches in Baltimore to worship, and he approves it.

From what he has seen, he recommends that system to the South. He says the poor whites in the South—that is the inference—and the negroes need to be drawn closer together. My God! Some of the purest Anglo-Saxon blood in the world is found amongst the poor white people in the rural districts in the South. They are proud of their blood, of their glorious heritage. The Senator recommends that this new system of social equality, which Governor Smith's church has introduced into Maryland, should be spread all over the South.

God forbid!

What do you think of that, brave, able, and fine upstanding Senators from the South, nine-tenths of you are with me, you who answer to the name of Jeffersonian Democracy in this Chamber? What do you think of that offensive doctrine, dangerous and deadly to all that we hold dear and all that the white race in America holds dear? In the South we have separate waiting rooms at the railroad stations, one for the colored and one for the white, both of them equal in their accommodations. We have separate cars. There is no friction, no fussing and fighting about somebody getting another person's seat, or standing in the way, or a negro keeping a seat while white women have to stand in the aisle, none of that. That is all out of the way with our separate cars.

The negroes like it and the whites like it and approve it. So we are getting along very nicely. We have negro schools, and they are supported with appropriations with the white taxpayers' money. The negro has his church and has his own negro preacher. The negroes prefer to have their own preachers. They have a right to have them. And they are good negro preachers. Over here is a white man's church. Who will deny that the white people of the South have a right to have their own preacher and to have only white people to worship in that church?

The position of the Senator from Maryland is that it is best to mix the races up and let the whites and the negroes worship together as he has found them worshiping in the Roman Catholic church in Baltimore, where white men and women of the Roman Catholic faith and negro men and women all worship in the Roman Catholic Church of Baltimore City, in Maryland.

The Senator from Maryland, strange to say, goes out of his way to compliment and encourage that system. He does not stop there. He holds it up as a system worthy to be adopted elsewhere. The Catholic priests are using it. He recommends it to the South, to the sister States of dear old "Maryland, my Maryland." God knows in other, better, and brighter days patriots loved to sing that song.

> But where are they now who heard in former hours
> The voice of white-man rule in these neglected bowers?

Gone; they nearly all of them seem to be gone.

Is this the Al Smith and Roman doctrine that comes to us just before the Houston convention? The Senator from Maryland would disturb the peaceful relations between the races that now exist in the South. We are getting along better than we have for years. The good negro citizens are working with us. The white people are striving to live at peace with them, and the best negroes are striving to live at peace with us. We are growing in every way and getting along nicely together.

Now when this drive is on to capture America by the Roman Catholics and their anointed of the Pope is put forward as a presidential candidate, the Senator from Maryland, the Roman Catholic mouthpiece, here comes up and recommends social equality, the worship of negroes and whites together, and asks that that system be spread throughout the South. That is what it means. God save the South from such leadership, from such doctrine. The South does not share in the opinion of the Senator from Maryland. There are not more than two Senators on this floor from the South who will arise in their places here and indorse his stand on that subject. The Senator does not speak for the Democrats of Maryland. As a white man and a Democrat I am going to dare to speak for them. Four-fifths of the Democrats of Maryland do not indorse that Roman Catholic social-equality doctrine. The Protéstant people of Maryland, the Jews of Maryland, and I think many Catholics of Maryland, do not indorse it. I believe there are some Catholics in Baltimore and Maryland who would not be willing to throw the doors open and mix the congregations indiscriminately, negroes and whites. Let them tell me if I am wrong on that.

Let me say to the Senator, the way to solve this problem is—

> Nigger school and nigger teacher;
> Nigger church and nigger preacher.

Separate cars, separate waiting rooms; treat them right, give them justice, but keep the flag of the white man forever flying supreme. We do not have to tell him to do that. He will do it at the cost of every drop of his blood. This mongrel mixing that the Senator from Maryland suggests would destroy the white civilization in America if carried out. It would produce here what Roman Catholic rule produced in many places in Mexico—race amalgamation and degeneracy, to the hurt and injury of the best elements.

The Senator from Maryland has seen fit to attack the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. The able Senators from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON and Mr. GLASS] replied to his recent attack on them in magnificient fashion. On yesterday the Senator from Maryland brought in the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments again in the debate with my able and brilliant colleague from Alabama. He stands in the forefront now, it seems, as the champion of this new Roman Catholic order of things with Governor Smith's approval, to spread through the South the doctrine of social equality through the Catholic Church. Let us see about that. Here is the New York World with an editorial on that subject. It is supporting Governor Smith. Listen to what it says:

> The opposition to Smith has identified him so thoroughly with the principles of religious tolerance, personal liberty, and social equality, that the refusal to nominate him would be accepted by the whole country as a rejection of those principles of social equality that a refusal to nominate him would be accepted as a rejection of those principles.

What do you say about that, Senators, you who love your fireside, you who love her who stood by you at the altar place when you held her hand and before God promised to love, cherish, and protect her? What do you think of that social-equality doctrine, the doctrine of Governor Smith and the Senator from Maryland, you who love your daughters and who want every safeguard thrown about them, where negroes have mistaken ideas put in their heads by such speeches as that and the doctrine of Governor Smith? I mean not only the doctrine I have read but the doctrine of the dance halls that exist with his approval in the State of New York, where negro men and white women dance every night, where white men and black women dance, and the Manufacturers Record in its statement about it said there were some of the details too shocking to put in print.

That happened on the floor of that dance hall in New York City under the rule and reign of Tammany and under the guiding hand and all-seeing eye of Alfred E. Smith, the governor. Why are these things permitted?

Social equality? What for? To control the negro vote of New York City and State. Why this talk of social equality in the New York World? To appeal to the negro vote in the country. I stated this when the antilynching bill was before the Senate, when they were going to impose a fine of $10,000 upon the taxpayers of a county where they executed a brutal negro who had assaulted a white woman and were going to give that $10,000 to the family of the criminal who committed the crime, who caused the white people to go mad when the daughter or wife of a white man had been assaulted, and the negro was killed. You would have killed him. I would have killed him.

Suppose you came upon a lion devouring your daughter? You would have shot him to death. There is not a white man in the South that is worth his salt who would not kill a man if he caught him assaulting his wife or daughter or his neighbor's wife or daughter.

The way to stop lynching, I repeat, is to stop the crime that causes lynching. When you put a premium on the crime of rape you are inciting and encouraging the negro to attack lonely, helpless white women when their husbands and sons are away working in the field or elsewhere to make a living. When that bill was up in the House and southern Democrats called on Governor Smith's friends in New York, they did not give them a single vote. Now, they are coming with their black banner of social equality and recommending that to the South. I hope that every man and woman in North Carolina will know about this thing. I want them to know what the strange and dangerous doctrine is. It is not only being put into effect in New York City and New York State, but it is being preached here and in Maryland. Choose ye this day whom ye will serve, the God of white supremacy or the false god of Roman social equality.

MOTOR MINE YAWLS FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the four bills to which I have referred are little bills from the Committee on Military Affairs which the Senate last evening passed, in some cases after explanation. The first bill which I ask to have considered is House bill 10364, to provide for the construction or purchase of two motor mine yawls for the War Department. We passed a similar Senate bill in exactly the same words last evening, the Senate bill being then on the calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the calendar number?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The bill which was passed last evening is no longer on the calendar. It was Senate bill 2947. It authorizes the purchase of two motor yawls at a total cost of not more than $10,000 for the purpose of mine laying.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What does the Senator propose now to do?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I propose to ask unanimous consent to consider the House bill which is an exact duplicate of the Senate bill which we passed last night. The House bill is now on the clerk's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 10364) to provide for the construction or purchase of two motor mine yawls for the War Department, which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $10,000 to be expended by the Secretary of War for the construction or purchase of two motor mine yawls for replacement purposes, at a cost not to exceed $5,000 each.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the House bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senate bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, we have passed the Senate bill and can now ignore it.

L BOATS FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the next bill which I would like to have considered is House bill 10363, to provide for the construction or purchase of two L boats. They are short, 60-foot boats, and are used in mine planting.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 10363) to provide for the construction or purchase of two L boats for the War Department, which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $50,000 to be expended by the Secretary of War for the construction or purchase of two L boats, for replacing boats of a similar type destroyed, at a cost not to exceed $25,000 each.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand the Senator to say that last night we passed a duplicate Senate bill?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes, being Senate bill 2951.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SEAGOING RETRIEVER FOR THE AIR CORPS

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The next bill for which I desire consideration is House bill 10365. Last evening we passed a Senate bill, being the bill (S. 2952), on the same subject. It proposes to authorize an appropriation of $40,000 for the building of a retriever for the aircraft which may strike the water in Panama.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 10365) to provide for the construction or purchase of one heavy seagoing Air Corps retriever for the War Department, which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $40,000 to be expended by the Secretary of War for the construction or purchase of one heavy seagoing Air Corps retriever for use at France Field, Canal Zone.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

APPOINTMENT OF WARRANT OFFICERS IN THE ARMY

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The next bill for which I desire consideration is House bill 8314 providing for the appointment of warrant officers of the Regular Army.

It refers to persons who would be eligible but for the interruption of their status by their being commissioned during the World War. The Senate passed a bill in exactly the same words sometime last month. The House passed the House bill which is a perfect duplicate of the Senate bill, but it did not act on the Senate bill. There is no use of our standing on our dignity, and we might as well pass the House bill now, because the two Houses are in agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 8314) to amend an act of Congress approved March 4, 1927 (Public, No. 795, 69th Cong.), to provide for appointment as warrant officers of the Regular Army of such persons as would have been eligible therefor but for the interruption of their status, caused by military service rendered by them as commissioned officers during the World War, which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to appoint as warrant officers of the Regular Army any persons whose commissioned service in the Army during the World War, added to their service as quartermaster clerk, amounted to 12 years or more of service prior to June 4, 1920, and who were not eligible for appointment as field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, under the provisions of the act of August 29, 1916, because of the interruption of their 12 years' requisite service as quartermaster clerks to render commissioned service in the World War: Provided, That for the purposes of this act the period of commissioned service during the World War prior to June 4, 1920, be deemed equivalent to a like period of detached service away from permanent station or duty beyond the continental limits of the United States: Provided further, That in determining length of service for longevity pay and retirement they shall be credited with and entitled to count the same military service as authorized for warrant officers, and all classified service rendered as clerks in the Military Establishment: Provided further, That the limitation in the act of June 30, 1922, on the number of warrant officers, United States Army, shall not apply to the appointees hereunder.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Pennsylvania leaves, I wish to suggest to him that he ought to ask that the Senate bills which we passed last night be recalled from the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the votes by which Senate bills 2947, 2951, and 2952 were passed last night will be reconsidered and, without objection, the bills will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. NORRIS. That will be all right.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4235) to amend section 12 of the act entitled "An act to provide more effectively for the national defense by increasing the efficiency of the Air Corps of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1926, which were on page 1, after line 12, to insert:

SEC. 2. That the first paragraph of section 127a of the national defense act, as amended and approved June 4, 1920, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 127a. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS: Hereafter no detail, rating, or assignment of an officer shall carry advanced rank, except as otherwise specifically provided herein: Provided, That in lieu of the 50 per cent increase of pay provided for in this act any officer who has heretofore been announced in War Department orders as having qualified on or before December 31, 1913, as a military aviator or any officer upon whom the rating of military aviator has heretofore been conferred for having specially distinguished himself in time of war in active operations against the enemy, shall, while on duty which requires him to participate regularly and frequently in serial flights, receive the pay, allowances, and additional pay as provided by the act of June 3, 1916, and the act of July 24, 1917, for the rating of military aviator. At any time after the passage of this act any officer who has heretofore been announced in War Department orders as having qualified as a military aviator on or before December 31, 1913, shall, if he make application therefor to the President, be retired from active service and be placed upon the retired list. The retired pay of any officer who has heretofore been announced in War Department orders as having qualified as a military aviator on or before December 31, 1913, shall be 75 per cent of all the pay and allowances, including flying pay, of the grade in which he is retired. No extra pay or allowances shall accrue under the provisions of this section for services rendered prior to the passage thereof."

And to amend the title so as to read: "An act for recognizing aviation accomplishments."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, that was a simple Air Corps bill as we passed it, allowing the conferring of decorations on distinguished foreigners who accomplished great feats in aviation, but the House has amended it and put in a paragraph which in no way relates to the subject matter of the bill. Therefore, I ask that the bill amendments of the House be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the bill and amendments will be so referred.

CROMWELL L. BARSLEY

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, I have in my hand several letters relating to the beneficiary of House bill 6152, which was passed unanimously last evening. I assume, however, that, owing to the unexpected notoriety given to Cromwell L. Barsley, I should place these letters in the RECORD. One is from the War Department in reference to his record, one is from his physician, Dr. Willis Walley, one of the most prominent physicians in my State, and one from Representative COLLIER. I ask unanimous consent that these letters may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters referred to are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, May 9, 1928.

Hon. HUBERT D. STEPHENS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR STEPHENS: This is in reply to your personal call at my office to-day for any information of record as to participation in battles, engagements, etc., of Cromwell L. Barsley, who served as a private of Company A, Fifth United States Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain; Company A, Thirty-fourth United States Volunteer Infantry, Philippine insurrection; and Company I, Nineteenth United States Infantry, 1905–1907.

The official records show that Cromwell L. Barsley served in Company D, Fifth United States Volunteer Infantry, in Cuba, from August 12, 1898, to May 3, 1899, but nothing has been found of record to show that he participated in any battles, engagements, skirmishes, etc., while a member of that organization.

While a member of Company A, Thirty-fourth United States Volunteer Infantry, this soldier served in the Philippine Islands from October 14, 1899, to March 1, 1901, and the company participated in engagements near Talavera, P. I., 3.30 a. m. November 7, 1899; Santo Domingo, P. I., 7 a. m. November 7, 1899; two in the mountains near Pozorubio, P. I., November 23, 1899; two in the mountains near Sibul, P. I., December 27, 1899; and in numerous other minor engagements and skirmishes while in the Philippines, during which time the soldier was reported present with his company.

While a member of Company I, Nineteenth United States Infantry, this soldier served in the Philippine Islands from July 24, 1905, to June 28, 1907, but nothing has been found of record to indicate that he participated in any scouts, expeditions, or actions during that period.

Very respectfully,

LUTZ WAHL,
Major General, The Adjutant General.

Dr. WILLIS WALLEY HOSPITAL,
MEDICAL AND SURGICAL CLINIC,
Jackson, Miss., January 31, 1928.

Hon. J. W. COLLIER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: It is very seldom I find it necessary or think I am called upon to write a Senator or Congressman and ask for any favors, since I know from experience in dabbling with State politics the great number of requests for help that must go to you; yet this is a deserving case, and I am writing to urge your active aid in taking care of the case of C. L. (Jack) Barsley, of Vicksburg, Miss.

This case, I know, is worthy and an honest one. The old man is in need. He is old and his wife at present is confined in my hospital in this city, the outlook for her recovery not bright, and I will consider it a great personal favor to me if you will give this case your careful consideration and active help; and let me hear from you in the very near future.

Please do this. I am not writing just as a matter of pleasing the old man.

With high regards and best wishes to you, I am,

Cordially yours,

WILLIS WALLEY, M. D.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 10, 1928.

DEAR SENATOR STEPHENS: This letter in behalf of Barsley comes from Doctor Walley, one of the leading physicians of Jackson, whom of course you know. Henry Mackey, a Spanish-American War veteran and assessor of my county and one whom you also know very well, has especially interested himself in this case and tells me that it is a very deserving one and that the old man is much in need. I have talked with Barsley, and he seemed to me to be very much broken in health and very feeble. He is now living in my town and from all I can learn the case is a very deserving one. He bears a good reputation. I hope you will do your best to get it through the Senate.

With best wishes, I am, sincerely yours,

J. W. COLLIER.

UTILIZATION OF WATERS OF GILA RIVER IN NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA

Mr. ASHURST. I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to submit a report from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation. From that committee I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 10786) authorizing surveys and investigations to determine the best methods and means of utilizing the waters of the Gila River and its tributaries above the San Carlos Reservoir in New Mexico and Arizona, and I submit a report (No. 1179) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] to the bill.

Mr. BRATTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I consent, with the understanding that it will not lead to discussion.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to make all necessary surveys and investigations to ascertain the best methods and means of utilizing the waters of the Gila River and its tributaries above the San Carlos Reservoir for irrigation and other purposes in the States of New Mexico and Arizona. The Secretary of the Interior is further authorized and empowered to prepare plans and make estimates of the cost of constructing dams, canals, and other works necessary for the utilization of such waters.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for this purpose a sum of not to exceed $12,500 from any money in the reclamation fund: Provided, however, That the appropriation herein authorized shall not be available unless or until contributions of equal amounts shall have been provided from local sources.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13511) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11133) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes; that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 36 to the said bill and concurred therein; that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 46, 56, and 57, and agreed thereto severally with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; and that the House further insisted on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 1.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10159) granting pensions and increase of pensions to widows and former widows of certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, and for other purposes.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill. It will dispose of all items in the bill except item No. 1.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not going to lead to discussion, is it?

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not think it will.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, there will be no discussion on the question of adopting the report, but there will be some discussion on the question of disposing of amendment No. 1.

Mr. PHIPPS. I think if I make a short statement with reference to amendment No. 1, there will be no discussion. Otherwise I should not ask to present it at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. If it does lead to discussion I shall ask that the report be received only and lie on the table. I have no objection to taking up the report, but I have objection if it is going to lead to discussion.

Mr. CURTIS. It is my intention, if the Senator from Colorado does not make the motion, to move to recede from the Senate amendment and agree to the House provision.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the 60–40 provision?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes. I think it is my privilege, having been in the conference, to make the motion which I consider proper after making a statement as to the real situation. It should not take me to exceed five minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection.

Mr. PHIPPS. My motion is the proper one and I think it should prevail, but if it leads to discussion——

Mr. SMOOT. If it leads to discussion, then I want the report to go over.

Mr. PHIPPS. I am perfectly agreeable to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill will be received.

Mr. PHIPPS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11133) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. That does not dispose of amendment No. 1, does it?

Mr. PHIPPS. No.

The conference report was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House on certain amendments of the Senate, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
May 17, 1928.

Resolved, That the House recede on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 36 to the bill (H. R. 11133) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and concur therein.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 46, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following:

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to sell the property at the corner of Sixteenth and Webster Streets, heretofore acquired for a fire-engine house site, at public or private sale at not less than the purchase price paid therefor by the District of Columbia and pay the proceeds thereof into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia; and the commissioners are hereby authorized and directed to erect a fire-engine house, with furniture and furnishings for a fire-engine company, at the northwest corner of Sixteenth Street and Colorado Avenue, on property belonging to the United States, and there is hereby set aside for such purpose a plot of ground running north from the junction of Sixteenth Street and Colorado Avenue, as now publicly owned, 100 feet on Sixteenth Street, thence west at right angles to the street 160 feet, thence south at right angles to the line of Colorado Avenue. The balance of the appropriations carried in the acts of May 10, 1926, and March 2, 1927, for an engine house in the vicinity of Sixteenth Street and Piney Branch Road NW., is made available for the purpose aforesaid."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the words "for the maintenance, under the jurisdiction of the Board of Public Welfare, of a suitable place," insert the following: "in a building entirely separate and apart from the House of Detention."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment, insert "$25,000."

That the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 1.

Mr. PHIPPS. I move that the Senate agree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 46, 56, and 57.

Mr. McKELLAR. What are they?

Mr. PHIPPS. One is with reference to the use of Government land for the purpose of an engine house. We are all in perfect agreement on the amendments.

Mr. McKELLAR. They have nothing to do with the 60–40 proposition?

Mr. PHIPPS. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, with reference to amendment No. 1, I desire to state that it was the endeavor of the conferees representing the Senate to come to a settlement that would be satisfactory to both the House and the Senate. The conferees have maintained that it should be a proportionate contribution on the part of the Federal Government and on the part of the District, but have not at any time insisted definitely on a 40–60 proposition. On the other hand, the conferees on the part of the House have not at any time showed a disposition to yield from their attitude regarding the $9,000,000 lump-sum proposition. In fact, they refused to carry back to the House the statement that the conferees on the part of the Senate were willing to recommend that the percentages of 33⅓ and 66⅔ be substituted for 40–60, which would have meant a difference in money of less than $1,700,000 as the contribution to be made by the Federal Government.

I believe the conferees can get together. I therefore move that the Senate insist on amendment No. 1 and ask for a further conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have a motion which will take precedence of the motion of the Senator from Colorado. I move that the Senate recede from its amendment and agree to the provision of the House.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. SACKETT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is engaged in the business of the Senate in the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For what purpose does the Senator rise?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask for a vote on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report is before the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I question the right of the Chair to ask a Senator for what purpose he rises. That is a practice of the House of Representatives, but it has never been in vogue in this Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS].

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief statement with reference to the situation as affecting the District of Columbia appropriation bill. As I have already said, the conferees on the part of the Senate have intimated to the conferees on the part of the House that, instead of a lump-sum appropriation of $9,000,000, they would recommend to the Senate the acceptance of a proportionate basis of 33⅓ per cent to 66⅔ per cent, which would mean a contribution on the part of the Federal Government that would be only $1,680,000 in excess of the amount put into the bill by the House, namely, $9,000,000. We did not say that that was an ultimatum, that we would not consider any counterproposition whatever; but we reasoned that a proportionate division would allow the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to operate to better advantage, and that on the lump-sum basis the progress of the District was being crippled.

I do not care to repeat all of the arguments that I advanced on that subject when the bill was under discussion in the Senate, when the 40–60 plan was voted into the bill by a vote of 46 to 20 in this Chamber.

Mr. President, I do not advocate that the Senate stand firmly for 40–60, but I do recommend—and as strongly as I know how—that the Senate support its conferees in standing for a proportionate contribution instead of a lump-sum contribution, which the House has been insisting upon and which would be a departure from the substantive law, which as it stands on the statute books to-day provides for 40–60 plan.

Mr. President, I believe there is a disposition on the part of the House to meet the Senate if the Members of the House are informed as to the real conditions; but this conference report is laid before the House, and authority is asked to disagree to the Senate amendment without informing the Members of the House that there is a disposition here to compromise and meet them in a reasonable manner. Your representatives have been compelled for over a month to sit in a conference where, under instructions from certain House leaders, the conferees on the part of the House are not free to confer, are not free to act on their own judgment, and are not permitted to recommend what in their own minds they think is the right and proper thing. In that regard, I know that the conferees on the part of the House are not unanimous in standing for the $9,000,000 lump-sum proposal.

Mr. President, I believe that my motion should prevail; that the substitute motion made by the majority leader, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], should not be adopted; that it should be voted down; and that then my motion, to the effect that the Senate ask for a further conference, should be adopted.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Seantor from Wyoming?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to ask whether, in view of the statement the Senator from Colorado has made, there is a probability of action on the bill if we should have a further conference with the House?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have been trying for about two weeks to bring the House and the Senate together on this amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I know the Senator has been very diligent, and I am grateful to him for his work.

Mr. CURTIS. I have talked to Members of the House, who have told me that the House will not agree at this session to a percentage basis of any kind, whether is be 60–40, 33⅓–66⅔, 75–25, or any other.

The Senator from Colorado, of course, realizes as do other Members of the Senate, that I handled the District of Columbia appropriation bill during several Congresses. When in that position I insisted on the organic act, which provided for the 50–50 proportion being carried out and lived up to. A few years ago that plan was changed, and the 60–40 proportion was adopted. Subsequently, two or three years ago, that was changed, and the lump sum was adopted. It happened to be my fortune to be on one of the conference committees which struggled with that question. We tried for weeks to get the conferees of the other body to agree with us upon a percentage basis, but they refused to do so, and the Senate at last agreed to recede and accept the House provision. That was done again last year, and if we expect to pass this bill and have it become a law, in my judgment, it is our duty to recede.

I believe the Senate should not resort to the expedient of passing joint resolutions continuing appropriations of the previous year. There is one of two courses open to us: Either we must recede or pass a joint resolution continuing the appropriations for the District of the preceding year.

There has not been such a resolution adopted by this body since it came under the control of the Republican organization in 1919, and I hope we will not go back to the plan of adopting resolutions continuing appropriations. It is not fair to the city of Washington. I see the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] smiling, and I wish to say in justice that probably many of the continuing resolutions which were passed during the Democratic régime were the result of war conditions.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I was just going to suggest that the tenor of the Senator's most recent remarks was not calculated to obtain some votes that he might otherwise count upon.

Mr. CURTIS. I think the Senator himself will agree that the adoption of resolutions continuing appropriations is a bad plan; and, as I said a moment ago, I think that those which were passed when the Democrats had control of the Senate were adopted more because of war-time conditions than otherwise. I do not think Senators on the other side of the Chamber believe in such resolutions any more than we do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Frankly, I had not thought that the Senate would be justified in adhering to its position on this amendment until the bill was defeated. I merely suggested to the Senator from Kansas that if he should choose to rely on the argument that since the Republicans came into control of the Senate they have never followed a bad precedent set by the Democrats, the Democrats might feel disposed to support the former precedent.

Mr. CURTIS. Occasionally we have resorted to joint resolutions continuing appropriations during former Congresses, but we have tried to get rid of such procedure. So I hope the Senator will take the suggestion in the proper spirit. I am sure he is opposed to the plan of resorting to continuing resolutions.

However, Mr. President, a vote was taken in the House on this question, and the vote was 287 to 55. That vote ought to convince the Senate that the other body will not recede and agree to the Senate amendment.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. That vote was had without the conferees on the part of the House giving any information whatever that a compromise had been suggested by the Senate conferees.

Mr. President, it is not supposed——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I did not know the Senator wanted me to yield for a statement.

Mr. PHIPPS. I beg the Senator's pardon, I thought he had concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I will conclude in a moment. I merely wish to say the question is one for the Senate to determine. I am anxious to get this appropriation bill out of the way. I hope the Congress may adjourn a week from next Saturday, and in order to do that the appropriation bills must be gotten out of the way. I hope the Senate will recede from its amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator from Colorado will yield to me for just a moment——

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The last declaration by the Senator from Kansas has made votes for his proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Colorado to yield to me for a minute.

Mr. PHIPPS. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. If this tax bill is to be laid aside for everything that comes up, and we are to adjourn a week from Saturday, then arrangements seem to have been made to have no tax measure.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I shall be only two minutes in concluding what I want to say.

It is not a pleasant task to ask to go back into conference with Members who have had their definite instructions from two or three leaders of the House; but to-day we are in the same situation that we have been in three or four times before. We are nearing the time to adjourn; and the House has deliberately delayed this conference and delayed it so as to get us in the very situation where they had us before, when the Senate, rather than sacrifice the bill, yielded a principle. Now we are asked again to yield a principle, to defer to the House dictum, when we know that the Senate voted 46 to 20, knowing what they were doing, and we know that the House voted for a lump sum appropriation of $9,000,000 without having the information to which it was entitled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the preferential motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS.]

Mr. PHIPPS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, in order that there may be no misunderstanding, I will state that a vote "yea" means that the Senate recedes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Everybody knows that.

Mr. PHIPPS. No; I do not think so.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence, and not being able to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WHEELER (when his name was called). On this matter I have a general pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have a pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BRATTON. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. I am told that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I have been requested to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE];

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS];

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]; and

The Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 21, as follows:

So Mr. CURTIS's motion was agreed to.

TAX REDUCTION

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to reduce and equalize taxation, provide revenue, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], on page 43, after line 5.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the amendment stated, and then I hope a vote will be taken upon it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I join in that hope.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I simply want to say to the Senator from Utah at this time that in the absence of some emergency I hope he will not consent to any further laying aside of the tax bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I know of no further conference reports to be presented. They are about the only things that could justify laying it aside. I heartily agree with what the Senator says. I am going to keep the bill before the Senate now until it is disposed of.

Mr. SIMMONS. We have been nearly three weeks on this bill. We could have disposed of it in less than 10 days—in less than a week, in my judgment—if its consideration had not been interrupted with other matters.

Mr. SMOOT. We can not exclude the speeches that are made for hours and hours upon other topics.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course we can not exclude the speeches, but we can prevent other bills being taken up.

Mr. SMOOT. Not conference reports.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; conference reports, too. It is just as important to pass this tax bill as it is to agree to conference reports.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if Senators will quit quarreling about who is to blame for the delay, we can pass the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator from Utah will adhere to the policy he has announced.

Mr. SMOOT. If Senators will support me in it nothing else will be taken up but the tax bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. SMOOT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRATTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], which I transfer to the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], and vote "nay."

Mr. WHEELER (when his name was called). I have a general pair on this matter with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING], which I transfer to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE];

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS]; and

The Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

Mr. KENDRICK. On this measure I have a general pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH of Montana (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE], and in his asence, not being able to obtain a transfer, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BRATTON. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS—23

So Mr. VANDENBERG's second amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SACKETT in the chair). The clerk will read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 141, line 4, strike out the words "and rents" and insert in lieu thereof the words "rents, and the sale or other disposition of property," so as to read:

SEC. 202. GROSS INCOME OF LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES.

(a) In the case of a life insurance company the term "gross income" means the gross amount of income received during the taxable year from interest, dividends, rents, and the sale or other disposition of property.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I can explain the gist of this amendment in a few words, I think. Several years ago, when this chain of tax laws began to be passed, for reasons then thought sufficient, insurance companies, both life and fire, were singled out for special treatment, in that it was provided in the law precisely what should constitute their gross income. Senators will find that covered in section 202 of the bill now before them. It provides, in substance, that in the case of life or fire insurance companies—the definition for fire insurance company is in a later section, but it is the same as to this—"the term 'gross income' means the gross amount of income received during the taxable year from interest, dividends, and rents."

It will be noticed that there is no mention of that part of the premiums of the companies which constitutes income, and the amount of all premiums is allowed to go in tax free, on the theory that it all ought to be added to the reserve. With that I have no quarrel at this time. But it will be noticed also that it excludes entirely any mention of the profits which these companies may make from transactions in real estate, transactions in bonds, transactions in stocks, and other profits. Never yet, in all the time that this has been under discussion, have I heard any reason advanced why a stock company engaged in the fire insurance business should be able to gamble or speculate in stocks, or bonds, or office buildings, property of that sort, and not pay taxes on the profits that it makes, when every individual in the land, and every business corporation in the land, other than these, is so taxed.

Mr. FLETCHER. This refers to life insurance companies?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. There is a subsequent section relating to fire insurance companies, and my amendment includes changes at several places, so as to take care of both. It includes mutuals, as well as stock companies.

It does not seem to me that there is any reason why American citizens, whether they happen to be owners of a mutual company by being its policyholders, or whether they happen to be the owners of a stock company by owning its stock, should be able to transact that kind of business wholly tax free.

It is objected that the profits they make go into their surplus, and therefore tend to protect their policyholders, but, as a matter of fact, the profits they make go into the surplus available for dividends, either to stockholders, if it is a stock company, or to the policyholders, if it is a mutual company.

Let me show the Senate just how these companies have managed to escape a fair share of the taxation which they ought to pay. If Senators will analyze the sentence which I read, which provides that the gross incomes of these companies shall be interest, dividends, and rents, will realize that the inclusion of the word "dividends" means absolutely nothing, because dividends received by a life insurance company from domestic corporations are wholly tax free.

Dividends of any domestic corporation paid to another corporation of any kind are taxed only in the hands of the paying company, and not in the hands of the receiving company. So that it helps nothing to put the word "dividends" into this list. All that the companies pay on is the interest and the rent they get, and they do not pay on them, because if Senators will look at section 203 they will notice that there is deducted from that gross income each year a sum equal to 4 per cent of the average amount of the company's reserves during the preceding year, and the deduction of that arbitrary percentage practically annihilates the entire revenue from interest.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate be in order. It is absolutely impossible to follow the debate on this tax bill because the Senate is in disorder 90 per cent of the time. I appeal to Senators who desire to hold private conversations to go into the cloakrooms.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. This means a good many million dollars to the United States, and I really believe it is worth listening to for a minute or so.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I want to find out what the Senator proposes to add to this language.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I propose to add the words, in substance, "profits from dealings in capital securities."

Mr. FLETCHER. That is, to add to the words "interest, dividends, and rents"——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I would make it read this way, "interest, dividends, rents, and the sale or other disposition of property," so that from the first part of the sentence it would read:

> In the case of a life insurance company the term "gross income" means the gross amount of income received during the taxable year from interest, dividends, rents, and the sale or other disposition of property.

Mr. COPELAND and Mr. BARKLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield first to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to say to the Senator that this subject is going to lead to long debate. I have in my hand letters from Haley Fiske, the president of the Metropolitan Life Iinsurance Co.; Darwin P. Kingsley, president of the New York Life Insurance Co.; and S. S. Dickinson, of the Security Mutual Life Insurance Co., long letters.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. They will have to be read to the Senate if the Senator persists in pushing this amendment.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does the Senator think that the mention of those mighty names is going to cause me to withdraw the amendment?

Mr. COPELAND. No; but I want to say it in connection with this, which may influence the Senator. This matter, I understand, was before the committee, and the Senator was alone in his position——

Mr. KING. No; he was not, if the Senator will excuse me. The Senator is entirely wrong.

Mr. COPELAND. He was at least in a very small minority.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is not correct. The Senator has been misinformed. A majority of the committee voted against this amendment, and at the time I stated I was going to renew it on the floor, and I am going to renew it, although I think it is correct to say that every insurance company located in the State in which each Senator lives has already telegraphed and written and appealed to each Senator to vote down this "bolshevik" amendment of mine because it is a blow at an established business in America. I am trying to show the Senate, if I can obtain an audience, that it is merely putting these companies on the same basis with all of the other business corporations in the United States.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I have not had a letter from any company in Alabama at all about this, and I am asking, first, for this information: Does the amendment which is now pending refer to fire insurance companies or life insurance companies?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The amendment I had printed covers six changes in the text of the bill. The question is the same in the case of both classes of companies, I take it, but it will require six different corrections in the insurance sections to cover both fire and life companies.

Mr. BLACK. I have in my own mind an idea of a difference in policy which should govern with reference to fire and life insurance companies, and for that reason wanted to suggest to the Senator that he discuss the comparative features as to the reasons why it might be applied upon one and not upon the other.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not know of any reason for any distinction. Each business is wholly praiseworthy and creditable and, so far as I know, a high standard of ethics prevails in both. There is no reason why they should be singled out for adverse treatment or hostile action. Neither do I know of any reason why they should be favorites under the law any more than they are now.

Mr. BLACK. I have in mind this difference, that life insurance should be encouraged.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. So should fire insurance.

Mr. BLACK. It relates more nearly and more closely to the home and to the individual than fire insurance. For that reason, so far as I am personally concerned, I might be willing to vote for a tax on fire insurance companies and not on life insurance companies.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; I have heard that argument before. I can not see any reason why we should exempt life insurance companies, because their relationship is so close to the home, if we are going to accept bakery companies that bake people's bread. We do not exempt the people who make children's clothes and let them deal in securities tax free. We do not exempt the railroads on which they ride or any of the companies that make their necessities. All of those things go to the home and relate to the home.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. May I ask the Senator if his proposed change would affect in any way the status of fire insurance and tornado companies under the last congressional act, so far as being exempt from taxation is concerned?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator means of a purely local character?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. There are certain mutual insurance companies—fire, hail, and farmers' insurance companies—of a local character which are wholly exempt from any kind of income taxation. Those would not be affected at all by the amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Will the Senator insist upon the phrase "of a purely local character"?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I only do that because that is now the law. It has been in the law right along. It was in the acts of 1924 and 1921.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Oh, no.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think the Senator is wrong. This has nothing to do with those companies which are exempt.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I apologize to the Senator because I was called out and I have not been able to follow entirely just the purposes of the amendment. Are we considering the first of the amendments proposed by the Senator; that is, on page 141, line 4?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is what is now being considered?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is the one we are speaking on now.

Mr. JOHNSON. As I understand it, the Senator adds simply to the definition of gross income the words "and the sale or other disposition of property"?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Income derived from that source.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. SHIPSTEAD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I will yield first to the Senator from Minnesota and then to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I want to ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] if the exemption providing that mutual fire and hail and tornado insurance companies is confined to companies of a purely local character?

Mr. SMOOT. There is not a word of change in the proposed law from existing law. I will say to the Senator also that there has been none of those companies that have asked a change.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I know they do not want a change.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not propose any change with reference to them. I now yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if any hearings were held on this particular matter by the committee?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We discussed it at great length within the committee, but we did not hear much of anybody this year in the Finance Committee. No representatives of insurance companies came.

Mr. McKELLAR. Was a vote had in the committee?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the amendment was defeated?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; it was defeated.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Is it not correct that the insurance companies asked to have a hearing and, in fact, had representatives in the city, but that in the meantime the committee considered the amendment and it was voted down by a vote, as I recall, of 7 to 6, and then it was assumed that it would not be necessary to have any hearings and no hearings were held? Is not that a correct statement?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is right.

Mr. EDGE. As a matter of fact, they wanted to be heard, but felt it was not necessary after the amendment was defeated in the committee.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. In order that the Senate may have some picture of the condition I would say that I have not been able to calculate or to learn the gross assets of all the insurance companies in the United States, but I am within the bounds of truth when I say that the 10 leading companies have assets in excess of $10,000,000,000. The Metropolitan alone reports assets of nearly $3,000,000,000. Let us look for a moment to see what share of the burden of Federal taxation this great mass of property is bearing.

All of the insurance companies in the United States last year, both life and fire, paid a total in income taxes to the United States Government of only $16,388,000, although they have, as I said, within their coffers these billions of dollars of the wealth of the country. There in itself is a contrast which challenges examination, so I have obtained, through the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, a composite statement showing the income and the taxes paid by six large companies.

I did not want to take them separately, because it is their private affair and there is no service to be obtained by taking them individually. The companies considered were the Metropolitan, the Prudential, the New York Life, the Equitable Life, the Mutual Life, and the Ætna Life. I do not know that they are the six largest, but they are certainly among the largest in the country.

The total income of these companies under the definition that stands in the present law was $315,000,000. Of that, $308,000,000 was interest; $1,500,000, approximately, was dividends; $5,500,000 was rent. The first deduction they made from that $315,000,000 was of tax-free interest, interest on Liberty bonds, and so forth. That was $20,000,000. The next deduction was this harmless little deduction that we see at the bottom of page 141 of the bill, a deduction amounting to 4 per cent of the average of their reserve during the previous year. That amounted for the six companies to $209,000,000, which again was subtracted from their income and got away from taxation. The next was $1,500,000 of dividends, which was wholly tax free. Next was a small item for reserve for deferred dividends of $500,000,000. Next was called investment expenses, $11,500,000. Next were the taxes that they paid, amounting to $1,900,000. Next were real-estate expenses, $1,340,000. Then there was $500,000 for depreciation and $750,000 for interest on indebtedness.

Their total deductions amounted to $248,000,000, leaving a net income taxable of only $67,000,000. The total tax paid by those six great companies, whose income from interest, dividend, and rents alone was $315,000,000, was only $8,000,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator point out which one of those deductions would be affected by his amendment if they were adopted?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. None of them. I am just trying to paint the present picture and then I will go on and show what it would be if the amendment were adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is the Senator prepared to state the amount of revenue that would be secured by the amendment he proposes?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; as to these companies.

Mr. KING. The same principle would apply to all the other companies?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; of course. The six biggest companies paid half of all the taxes paid by all the insurance companies of the United States, so it is obvious I am not unfair in picking them out; but if they had been any other kind of a corporation with an income of $315,000,000, they would have paid 13 per cent on it and their other income would have been included, besides, to increase that amount, so their tax would have been approximately $40,000,000 on that same income if they had been engaged in the business of baking bread or running a railroad or something of that sort.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Has the Senator the figures to show the total amount of taxes that would be obtained from all companies if his amendments were agreed to?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; I have not; but we can estimate them, I think, because if these companies pay one-half of the present income tax, presumably they would pay half of the tax on profits.

Mr. EDGE. Now that the Senator has answered the question of the Senator from Arkansas, let me ask how can the Senator figure at all on what the capital loss would be to these companies?

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I would like to know.

Mr. EDGE. As a matter of fact, if the Senator's amendment were adopted, is it not reasonable to assume the same policy that seems to exist with corporations of all other characters throughout the country, to secure capital losses in one form or another, would be more or less encouraged?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes, of course; if they were worked out as the Senator suggests, the companies would be urging this instead of opposing it.

Mr. EDGE. I am not so sure of that, and in my own time I shall be glad to discuss that phase of the question. I personally feel that the Government would lose money if the Senator's amendments should prevail.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The experience with our tax on capital gains has been that during the last two years we lost money, because the losses exceeded the gains every year. But in the last two years the picture has changed entirely. In the last year for which we have the figures, 1926, the taxable gains exceed a billion dollars, and the amount brought into the Treasury by the 12½ per cent on capital gain was a very substantial amount.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator was here in 1921 when the act was passed?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; I came in 1922.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will tell the Senator that in 1921, as Senators all know, securities held not only by insurance companies, but by all companies, were very low in amount. The insurance companies held most of them. If the capital gain and loss provisions had applied to insurance companies, at least for a number of years after 1921 they would have paid no taxes at all. Liberty bonds, stocks, and mortgages which were held by insurance companies, were all at a discount.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, let me understand whether the Senator means to contend that the adoption of this amendment would diminish the taxes which are paid by the insurance companies?

Mr. SMOOT. Not to-day, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then, does the Senator concur approximately in the figures presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]?

Mr. SMOOT. As to the gross, yes; there is not any question about that; but there is another side to the question, which we shall discuss when we reach it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, while the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is looking for his notes, if he will yield, following the thought of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], I desire to ask, Is it not true that the income to the Government from these companies has increased year by year since the new method was adopted in 1921, under which, whether the companies make money or lose money, in view of the fact that they must keep up their reserves, the Government is bound to secure an increased amount of taxes every succeeding year? I think we have established that fact.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I now have the figures here as to the gains and losses. The life insurance companies last year reported $12,800,000 of profits and $2,419,000 of losses. The fire and marine insurance companies reported $15,024,000 of profits and $972,000 of losses.

Mr. SMOOT. For what year?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. For the year 1926. So there are $25,000,000 of profits made by these companies that we deliberately exclude from taxation, although every other company—be it a savings bank or any other financial institution—has to pay taxes on such profits.

It may be argued that these companies invest in conservative securities, and if there is a slight gain in their assets they ought to be allowed to keep it in reserve without taxation. Let me read to the Senate some of the kind of securities that they invest in. Then I should like somebody to tell me why their profits should be exempt. Here [exhibiting] is the report of the Sun Insurance Co. of Canada, which conducts a very large business in the United States. I find that they own some $200,000,000 worth of stocks, practically all of them American stocks, such as Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, several tobacco companies, United States Steel, various telephone companies, $7,000,000 of the General Electric Co., $13,000,000 of the American Telephone & Telegraph, and so on. Why a company should be permitted to invest, if it chooses to call it an investment, in stocks whose market value is so highly speculative as those of oil companies, and then retain tax free all the profits that it may make from its dealings in them, is something that is wholly beyond my comprehension.

While it is true that the Finance Committee voted down this amendment by a vote of 10 to 6, it is also true that the experts of the joint congressional committee on internal-revenue taxation have recommended strongly in favor of the amendment. They state in their report that they can see no justification for the special privilege which is given to this class of business. I myself should like very much to hear some reason advanced which can not be said to be equally applicable to any other company that does business with the people of the Nation. It is all very well to say that if we tax them the result will be higher premiums. I venture to say that there is not a word of justification for that, and if there is justification for it, then we ought to exempt the railroads so that the people may have lower fares; we should exempt telephone companies, so that telephone tolls may be less; we should exempt baking companies so that bread may be cheaper; we should exempt Swift and Armour and the other packing companies in Chicago so that meat may be cheaper. That argument can not be applied with one particle greater force to insurance companies than it can be applied to any other company carrying on a legitimate business with the people of the United States.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield the floor.

Mr. EDGE. I desire to ask the Senator this question: Does the Senator see any distinction at all between a mutual company and a stock company?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; they are composed of human beings who are American citizens, and one of them ought to pay a tax as much as the other.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I hesitate to take the time of the Senate at all on this question, but I feel under obligation to do so. I send forward to the desk and ask the clerk to read a letter written to me by Mr. Haley Fiske, president of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., which explains the matter from the standpoint of the insurance companies in perhaps as forceful a way as it could be presented in opposition to the able argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE CO.,
New York City, April 24, 1928.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: I am addressing to you and to Senator WAGNER this letter urging your most careful consideration and I hope your vigorous opposition to the proposal of Senator REED of Pennsylvania, first offered to the Senate Finance Committee and now threatened to be offered on the floor, for an amendment to the pending revenue bill (H. R. 1). Senator REED's proposal would require the inclusion, in the ascertainment of the income of a life insurance company, of gains and losses from the sale of real estate, stocks, and bonds.

On its face and to the casual reader this would seem like a logical amendment to bring the gains and losses of life insurance companies into the same category as the gains and losses of other corporations subject to income tax. However, the fact is that life insurance companies are by sections 242 to 247 of the present revenue law taxed upon an entirely different basis and theory than are other corporations. From the first income tax law down to the revenue act of 1921 Congress and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue had struggled almost fruitlessly to devise some method of assessing the income taxes of life insurance companies in a manner parallel to that applied to other kinds of corporations. The result had been chaotic and there was interminable litigation, unsatisfactory both to the companies and to the Government. The suggestion was made, in connection with the act of 1921, that a simplification of the method to be used in the case of life insurance companies, by basing their tax upon interest, dividends, and rents, should afford a base on which the companies could easily prepare and submit their returns and which would be equally easy of audit and check on the part of the Government, by means of reference to the annual statements filed by the companies in their respective States. With this acceptable base the rate could be determined so as to yield to the Government at least the amount of tax available from life insurance companies under the old system.

This plan was adopted, and the House Committee on Ways and Means in its report at that time pointed out the advantages of the new system and said: "The new tax would yield a larger revenue than the taxes which it is proposed to replace." How true this proved to be is apparent from the fact that in 1921 life insurance companies paid a tax of $8,159,000, while in 1926 they paid a tax of $16,388,000, or more than double the amount at the beginning of such five-year period. The taxes paid by all corporations increased during the same five-year period 68.3 per cent, as against 100.2 per cent in the case of life insurance corporations.

If Senator REED's proposal were to be adopted, the whole tax system as to life insurance would be again thrown into confusion and there would be an unanswerable demand that if gains and losses from real estate, stocks, and bonds, were to be included in taxable income, then profit and loss from the general operations of the business must in all fairness be also included, and the net result would be the return of the old and extremely undesirable system.

As a matter of fact, the investments of life insurance companies in assets whose values fluctuate more or less on the market are less than 1 per cent of the total assets. Forty-three per cent of their assets is in mortgage loans on real estate and 37.5 per cent in bonds, the purpose both of the investment laws and of the investment policy of life insurance companies being to make investments in those classes of securities least subject to fluctuate and most productive of constant income. Nothing is to be gained on the part of a life insurance company by the sale of bonds in a given market when the proceeds must be immediately invested in other securities whose rate of income is determined by precisely the same market conditions.

The theory of the present law, that is, the taxation of what may be called the free net interest income of life insurance companies, had the careful consideration of Congress, the tax department, and the insurance companies and has proven eminently satisfactory. To incorporate the proposal of Senator REED into the pending revenue bill would throw out of gear the whole plan of the present law, would inevitably require other complicating amendments, and would destroy a system well calculated to secure from the life insurance business, a very great majority of which is carried on on the mutual plan, a fair proportion of the taxes sought by the Government, which should be borne by life insurance.

I most earnestly solicit your careful consideration of the views which I have expressed and I hope that, in the interest of the great institution of life insurance, the principal companies being domiciled in New York, you will conclude to oppose whatever proposal is made along the lines of the proposal made to the Finance Committee by Senator REED as above described.

Very truly yours,

HALEY FISKE, President.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I understand the Senator is about to leave the Chamber, and I yield to him.

Mr. EDGE. Unfortunately, I have an engagement which I must keep.

Mr. COPELAND. Is the Senator going to speak at some length?

Mr. EDGE. No; I shall speak rather briefly, as I usually do.

Mr. COPELAND. I yield the floor to the Senator from New Jersey, and will get it in my own right later on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, it certainly is a contradiction to provide what is termed a "tax reduction bill" and at the same time, as to one particular class of citizens, trying, if possible, to evolve some plan by which their taxes will be made higher. I might say before passing that point that the amendment, if adopted, would affect in this particular one-half of the population of the country.

I asked the question a few moments ago whether the inclusion of this amendment in the bill would, in the judgment of the Senator offering it, increase the revenue. His reply was that he felt that it would. Although he undoubtedly believes he is right, at the same time I understand Mr. Adams, one of the experts, in computing the possible income as compared to the income under the system prevailing previous to 1921, was very much in doubt whether it really would increase the income. That is the reason I make the statement that it is perhaps a contradiction, because we could assume that the life insurance companies would not be opposed to the inclusion of this amendment if it were correct that they would pay less taxes to the Government. So far as that point is concerned, it must be left open to speculation.

Prior to 1921, however, the life insurance companies, I am informed, were on the same basis as all other corporations, computing their capital losses and their capital gains as against their profits and income, and paying according to the schedules of those days.

I have here the report of one large mutual life insurance company, the Prudential of New Jersey, of the taxes they paid under the old system—the system which it is now proposed again to put into effect—from the year 1914 to the year 1921, when this new plan was worked out by the Internal Revenue Bureau, believed by them to be not only a more equitable plan, but, as I believe, a more remunerative plan to the Government.

In 1914 the Prudential paid on their net profits, under the higher schedules, of course, which were in effect $112,181.48.

In 1915 they paid—I will not read the odd figures—$82,000.

In 1916 they paid $104,000.

In 1917 they paid $182,000.

In 1918 and 1919, the years of the war, they did not pay anything. The losses offset the gains.

In 1920 they paid $630,000.

In 1921 they paid $462,000.

Then the new plan of taxing on the reserve was put into effect.

Their first tax under that new plan—the 1921 tax, paid in 1922—was $907,000, as against $462,000 the year before.

The 1923 tax was $1,135,000.

The 1924 tax was $1,341,000.

The 1925 tax was $1,595,000.

The 1926 tax was $1,688,000.

The 1927 tax—the last tax—was $1,897,000.

You will see from those figures that each year they paid approximately $200,000 more in taxes to the Government than the previous year.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. EDGE. Yes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Did I understand the Senator aright as saying that that great company did not pay 1 cent in taxation during the two war years?

Mr. EDGE. That is the report of the company, no doubt entirely accurate. Their losses during those years undoubtedly placed them in the position of owing the Government nothing. Their statement is sent as an argument which I am free to use, so apparently they are entirely prepared to defend it.

As I have already stated under this new plan—which is rather an involved one, and I will not attempt to go into details—the tax is paid upon the reserve. Under the law they are compelled to increase their reserve every year; so that automatically, whatever their losses may be from investments, the Government must receive an increased amount year by year. Even though they had a bad year, as they did in 1918 and 1919, and did not pay the Government anything, they would be compelled to pay in this same increasing ratio.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. EDGE. I do.

Mr. COPELAND. I think I am right in saying that in the years 1918, 1919, and 1920 these companies suffered losses.

Mr. EDGE. In 1920, in the case of the Prudential, they paid $638,000.

Mr. COPELAND. I am reading from the figures of the Security Mutual.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator from Pennsylvania very effectively, as he always does, pointed out the small amount of taxes paid by eight companies as compared to the assets that they have. He is entirely correct in the figures that he used. The figures that I have are tabulated from the legal reserve life insurance companies of the United States having, in the various years, from 85 to 90 per cent of the total assets of all the companies of the United States. They show that the revenue paid to the Government by those companies increased from $8,159,000 in 1921, the year this change was made in the system of computing taxation, to $16,388,000—the figures that were used by the Senator from Pennsylvania—in 1926, or a gain in revenue to the Government from 90 per cent of the insurance companies of the country in five years of over 100 per cent.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry of the Senator? This proposal does not mean to change the system that was adopted in 1921 at all, does it? As I understand, it merely adds certain sources of income that are not embraced in the present law.

Mr. EDGE. Oh, yes, Mr. President; it changes the system entirely, because it goes actually and absolutely back to the old system or reckoning capital losses, which now are not considered at all.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can not see that.

Mr. EDGE. I am quite sure the Senator from Pennsylvania will agree with my statement.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I did not hear the statement.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was expressing the view that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania did not change the present system of taxing these corporations.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Not in the least. It simply adds this additional income, which now escapes inclusion.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator will agree that it does change it to the extent of bringing into the computation the capital losses, which they could not possibly do under the present system.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely. It taxes the net gain; that is all.

Mr. EDGE. Naturally; that is all the discussion is over.

Now, let me finish these figures.

I have already demonstrated that under the new system the insurance companies have paid, without deducting capital losses, an increase of over 100 per cent in five years. I want to compare that with the payments to the Government from all other corporations in the country.

From the figures of the Federal Internal Revenue Department it appears that the total tax received on account of the Federal-income and war-profits tax paid by all corporations for the year 1921—all corporations, including insurance companies—was $757,571,432. The amount of Federal income tax paid by all corporations for the tax year 1926, five years later, was $1,181,005,366, an increase in the five-year period of 68.3 per cent. Remember, the life insurance companies during that time increased their payments to the Government over 100 per cent. By comparison, while the income from all other corporations was increasing in the five-year period 68.3 per cent, the income from life insurance companies was increasing 100.2 per cent, or 46.7 per cent faster than the revenue from all corporations.

In other words, the system under which we are now taxing the life insurance company reserves has brought into the Treasury an income of over 46 per cent more than the income brought into the Treasury from all other types of corporations who could compute and credit their capital losses; and recall that during the time these comparisons are made the taxes were reduced four times; so that, of course, the schedules at the commencement of the comparison would be on the basis of very much higher rates per thousand-dollar profit.

Mr. President, again I can understand that the question will be raised: "If they pay more now, why should they be so anxious to retain the present system?" There are several reasons which appeal to me as very forceful.

The present system secures more money for the Government. Both the companies and the Internal Revenue Bureau are familiar with its operation, and the companies charge against their expense accounts the approximate amount they know they will be compelled to pay; and they are satisfied with it. On the other hand, if capital gains and losses are to be included in income, in all fairness—I might ask the Senator from Pennsylvania why he has not considered this point—underwriting profits and losses should also be included, which they are not in the amendment offered. Again the Government would lose the certainty which it now has of a steady increase every year in the volume of the tax from life insurance companies, as well as throw the computation of the tax on these companies back into the endless confusion which existed prior to 1921. The third reason is because, in a bill which is designed to reduce taxation, Congress should not seek ways and means of imposing additional burdens upon institutions which in the main seek to make provision for the widows and orphans of the land.

A mutual life insurance company, in my judgment—a life insurance company, particularly, and in that respect I agree with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]—is serving a public purpose of an entirely different nature than almost any other corporation we could consider; and if it is a mutual company, as most of these companies are, it is not a question of profit to any individual. We well know what the word "mutual" means. The lower they can keep their expenses, the lower, of course, they can make their premiums, and every one is a stockholder in the company. In other words, they are mutually serving each other.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. EDGE. I do.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It has been called to my attention that mutual companies other than life and fire are not exempt from this kind of taxation. A mutual casualty company or a mutual marine insurance company is subject to the sort of taxation that I suggest these other companies should be.

Mr. EDGE. I believe that is correct.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I again state that I can not but speculate as to whether the Government will receive more money or less. My personal opinion is that with the encouragement to consider wash-off losses, and so forth, which we well know exist all over the country, and are taken advantage of, the Government would not secure more money; but if they did secure more money, it does seem to me a contradiction, after four successful efforts to reduce taxation, to concentrate on what would affect directly half the population of the country, especially if they are in mutual companies, as most of them are, and raise their taxes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. EDGE. I do.

Mr. BLACK. As I understand, most of the companies that would be affected in the life-insurance world are mutual companies, I believe the Senator said.

Mr. EDGE. I understand so.

Mr. BLACK. If this tax is imposed, would it not in reality, so far as those companies are concerned, simply be raising the amount of premium paid by every policyholder in the United States?

Mr. EDGE. If the result of this action should be to increase taxation, it could not have any other effect.

Mr. BLACK. Then it would simply amount to taxing every clerk or mechanic or carpenter or mill owner or anyone else who has insurance in a mutual company?

Mr. EDGE. Precisely. It is computed that half of the population of the country have some type of policy in life-insurance companies.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I noticed particularly that the Senator from New Jersey, just before the Senator from Pennsylvania gave up the floor, asked him a question about mutual companies and stock companies. I am referring now both to life and fire companies and to every other kind of insurance. I judged from the Senator's question that he was under the impression that we ought to treat those companies differently; and I should like to hear the Senator on that point. I note what the Senator from Pennsylvania says, that they ought to be treated exactly the same.

I have always labored under the impression that a mutual company perhaps was entitled to different treatment from a stock company, because a mutual company has no profit; it is not organized for profit; there is not anyone making any profit out of its transactions; whereas in the case of a stock company, although it is perfectly legitimate and perfectly honorable, one of the main objects of the incorporators is to make money.

Mr. EDGE. There is that distinction. The Senator is entirely correct. I asked the question with the thought that a mutual company had somewhat a more appealing and stronger argument; but I do believe that both mutual and stock companies should be treated alike on this basis of taxation; and, as I have tried to develop, my own conviction is that the Government is better off to have this assured increasing income, whether they are stock or mutual companies, than it is to put them back in what might be termed the semitax-dodging class.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the Senator another question; and I am only seeking light on this. I have not as definite ideas as some of those who have studied the question more. The profits to be taxed, or which this amendment would tax, which are not now taxed, as I understand it, come from the investments of the companies?

Mr. EDGE. Stocks, bonds, rents, real estate, and that sort of investment.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, in taxing those profits I assume it would be net profits, because I can easily see how, especially in years of declining markets, when the value of their investments might very materially be decreased, there might be a loss instead of a gain.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that mutual companies other than mutual life insurance companies are treated differently?

Mr. NORRIS. That means mutual fire insurance companies?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, a mutual fire insurance company now pays a tax on its capital gains. A mutual life insurance company is now exempt. Mutual companies other than life, as the Senator will see by looking at section 208, are taxable in the same manner as other corporations. That is affirmatively provided in the bill. All that we do is to exempt the stock companies doing every kind of insurance and the mutual life companies from capital-gain taxes; but a mutual fire or a mutual marine or a mutual casualty company pays the kind of a tax I am urging that the others should pay.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to Senators that the change in the basis of taxing all kinds of insurance companies was made in 1921. I do not think there is an item in the revenue law to which more time was given than to the effort to arrive at a basis of taxation to which all the companies would agree.

Mr. COPELAND. That was in 1921?

Mr. SMOOT. Nineteen hundred and twenty-one. The basis of it was arrived at at that time and put in that law. I think there were at least three weeks given to the insurance companies before we could get them together. The provision in the law of 1921 relating to the insurance companies was put into form by the unanimous agreement of all of the companies, mutual and otherwise. The only insurance companies, the provisions as to which have been changed since that time, are the mutual companies—that is, I mean the companies insuring against hail and things of that sort.

Mr. NORRIS. We do not tax them?

Mr. SMOOT. We do not tax them at all.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, this much ought to be borne in mind. These companies never did pay any excess-profits taxes. There is not a case on record of any insurance company that ever paid a nickel in excess-profits taxes, while other corporations were doing it. These companies, even the stock companies, were always exempt from capital-stock taxes. They never paid any of those taxes, while the other corporations were paying.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator bears in mind, of course, that at that particular period—1918, 1919, and 1920—we had the largest death rate that we have ever had in the history of our country. In the fall of 1918, in six weeks, 35,000 people died in New York City from influenza.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. But their deaths in the fall of 1918 did not affect the fact that these companies got out of paying taxes in 1917.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator knows, I think, that the Government now has claims for excess-profits taxes against certain insurance companies for the period when excess-profits taxes were in force.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That may be.

Mr. SMOOT. That has not yet been finally decided.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. But the Government has never received a nickel in excess-profits taxes from those corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. And will not, until that question is finally decided; but the claims have been made against them.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. One thing more. I tried two years ago, when we had the 1926 act before us, to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that these companies paid no capital-stock tax at all, and that therefore, when we raised the rate on all corporations to 13½ per cent, there was no reason why their taxes should not go up to 13½; but the Senate would not do that. It left the rate at 12½ per cent, when other corporations were paying 13½ per cent.

I have no brief against insurance companies. The insurance business is a highly praiseworthy one, and, so far as I know, at present it is run in a perfectly honest and aboveboard and proper way, and I am not trying to persecute them, but I can not see why in the world any one business should be singled out to be the pet of the tax law the way this business has been, exempted from paying excess-profits taxes, exempted from the payment of the capital-stock tax, exempted from the raise from 12½ to 13½, exempted from the taxes on capital gain.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to ask the Senator if, while I was out, he gave to the Senate the stock quotations on the stocks of these companies?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No, Mr. President, I did not, because I do not think that affects the justice of it, after all.

Mr. COUZENS. It points out how valuable the stock of these corporations is.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is true.

Mr. COUZENS. And they are made valuable by these exemptions which the Congress gives them.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think that is one reason why the stocks are so high.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the Senator's attention to one other fact.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will not the Senator let me ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question about what he said, before the Senator from Utah gets on to some other subject.

Mr. SMOOT. This is right in line with what has been said. It will take just a moment.

If in 1921 we had not arrived at the agreement as to the taxation of insurance companies, from that year on they would not have paid a single, solitary dollar to the Government, because of the fact that they were holding the securities that they had bought, to the face value of over a billion dollars, and every one of those securities was low; they would have found them almost worthless; they would have unloaded them at a loss, and would never have paid a dollar to the Government. But in the compromise that was taken into consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Why should they pay if they had a loss?

Mr. SMOOT. In the compromise that was made at that time we not only took out the question of losses on capital assets but of gains as well.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I can answer that. Under the tax law of 1918 and under the 1921 law it was a scandal the way the taxpayers registered off losses in order to avoid tax liability. These companies could have done it just as other companies and other individuals did, but the law of 1921 was not the last word in wisdom, and by subsequent legislation, in 1924, we made that kind of washed sales impossible, and we did not allow taxpayers to eliminate their tax liability by that kind of performance. So that while it was a strong argument in 1921 against taking into account capital gains and losses with these companies, it has ceased to be an argument now, because it is no longer possible for them to charge off losses that are not made in good faith. The Senator, I know, will agree with me.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but I want to say to the Senator that the great bulk of the securities they were holding were Liberty bonds, and they were receiving 4¼ per cent on those Liberty bonds. They have been called in, and now they are receiving 3⅛ per cent on short-time certificates, which will show in next year's returns. Their gains will be cut to the extent, at least, of, I should say, 10 or 15 per cent.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I would not touch that anyway, and we could not, because all of that interest is tax free, whether it is 4¼ or 3⅛.

Mr. SMOOT. I am now referring only to the fact that their profits as shown on next year's returns certainly can not be what they were before, because of the fact that they had, I think, over a billion dollars' worth of those bonds, and they have been called, and now in place of the 4¼'s they are getting a short-time certificate bearing 3⅛.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Whatever interest they get on Liberty bonds does not affect their tax, because they are wholly tax free.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the Senator if it is not true that even with Liberty bonds, if they buy and sell and make a profit, they have to pay a tax on the profit?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. They would under the Senator's amendment?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. They would under my amendment; yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The thing I wanted to ask the Senator before the Senator from Utah interrupted was this. The Senator speaks of a tax on capital and a tax on capital gains. How does he apply that to a mutual company, which has not any capital, and necessarily can not have any capital gains?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The phrase "tax on capital gains" is a sort of a technical term that has grown up under these tax laws, and it is defined in the act to mean gains from the purchase and sale of capital assets.

Mr. NORRIS. Does a mutual company have capital assets?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It has capital assets, though it has no capital stock.

Mr. SMOOT. All their reserve is capital.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It has a balance sheet, and on one side it puts its assets, whether bonds or buildings, and on the other its liabilities; but it has no capital stock.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. May I suggest to the Senator that we have a vote on this if he is willing?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am perfectly willing to have a vote on it. Perhaps the Senator will let me finish what I was starting to say.

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, it is true that this system of taxation of insurance companies was worked out after long hearings in 1921. I think it is equally true that the decisions that were made in 1921 can be improved upon now. Otherwise there would have been no reason for passing tax reduction bills in 1924, 1926, and this year. I think the experience under this has proven that a revision in this regard is necessary, and I think Senators should notice that instead of adopting the philosophy of favoring the mutual companies the present tax law does not give the mutual companies other than life insurance companies any of the benefits that it gives to stock companies.

If I were a very rich man and wanted to form a holding company in which I could put my assets and pay the least possible tax, I would buy up some small-stock fire-insurance company. It makes the finest holding company for a rich man imaginable, because all of its profits from these transactions are wholly tax free, whereas these other companies have to pay taxes on them. That is just a little tip thrown out for people who want to dodge taxes in case the Senate decides to retain the provision of the present law.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I want to ask him a question. If these amendments are divided up, and the Senator will explain to me which amendment refers to fire insurance and which to life, I will be better able to vote as I think I should vote.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes, Mr. President; the first amendment to be voted on is that dealing only with life-insurance companies. The second amendment will deal with section 204, on page 145, really referring to page 146, where it deals with insurance companies other than life or mutual. That means all stock companies in the business of fire and marine insurance.

Mr. BLACK. That is the second.

Mr. SMOOT. It is offered all as one amendment.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I should like to have these amendments voted on separately. There are six in all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the first amendment for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 141, line 4, strike out "and rents" and insert in lieu thereof "rents, and the sale or other disposition of property."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I merely want to say a word. I am going to vote against the amendment. I do not believe that the matter has been sufficiently considered. For weeks the Committee on Finance had very extensive hearings. At the last, when there had been a good deal of delay, as we thought, and we were anxious to pass some kind of a revenue bill, this question was brought up. Along at the end of the proposition when the hearings had all been closed, the matter was suggested for the first time. It was thought that it was a matter of such importance that the insurance people should have a hearing. That was quite true. I think that was the opinion of the committee. A time was fixed, but we saw it was going to delay us and, in order to keep from delay, we reported out the bill without the hearings.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Is it not true the Finance Committee worked first on amendments made by the House to the present law, and that as soon as amendments from the floor, so to speak, were permissible in the committee, I presented this one?

Mr. HARRISON. That is true, but the Senator will agree with me that that was right at the close of the hearings. I do not think we had over two or three meetings after the suggestion was made.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Necessarily it was at the close. I was barred from offering it earlier because the committee was first considering changes made by the House in the present law.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not mean the Senator delayed it in such a way that it was too late to get a hearing, but the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] felt an interest and thought that his people ought to be heard. I think a time was set, but we did not think the bill ought to be delayed on that account.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], which I transfer to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], and vote "nay."

Mr. WHEELER (when his name was called). I have a general pair on this question with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRATTON. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] and vote "nay."

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I ask to be excused from voting, as I am a director and general counsel of a life insurance company.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senate excuse the Senator from Maryland from voting? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE];

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS]; and

The Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—21

Blaine	Gerry	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Borah	Johnson	Phipps	Warren
Broussard	King	Pine	Waterman

So the amendment of Mr. REED of Pennsylvania was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the next amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I see no necessity for a yea-and-nay vote, and I shall not, therefore, ask for one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 144, line 11, strike out "and," and after line 11 insert a new paragraph, to read as follows:

(9) Capital losses: Losses sustained during the taxable year from the sale or other disposition of property; and.

On page 144, line 12, strike out "(9)" and insert in lieu thereof "(10)."

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 146, at the end of line 10, insert "the sum of (A)"; and in line 16, after "Commissioners," insert a comma and the following: "and (B) gain during the taxable year from the sale or other disposition of property."

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 149, line 1, after "incurred," insert "as defined in subsection (b) (6) of this section"; and after line 1 insert a new paragraph, to read as follows:

(5) Losses sustained during the taxable year from the sale or other disposition of property.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. This amendment would subject stock fire insurance companies to the same tax on capital gains. It is the same tax as mutual fire insurance companies now pay. In rejecting the amendment, as the Senate will doubtless do, I want the Senate to know that it is favoring stock companies, to the disadvantage of mutual companies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have two short amendments to offer. I send forward the first one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendment.

SEC. 121. INTERNATIONAL BRIDGES.

In the case of income derived from the operation of a bridge between the United States and a contiguous foreign country, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to enter into an agreement in respect of any taxable year with the proper authorities of such foreign country, making an equitable apportionment as between the United States and such foreign country of the income and deductions allocable to the operation of such bridge. If such agreement is entered into, the tax imposed by this title in respect of such income for such year shall be considered to be the tax based on the net income as computed under such agreement. Any tax computed under the section shall not be reduced by any credit as provided in section 131 (relating to the credit for foreign taxes).

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, so far as I can I would like to accept the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask if this is authorizing an agreement to be made with a foreign country by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. SMOOT. I can state briefly the object of it.

Mr. BORAH. I know what the object is, but if we are going to make an agreement with a foreign country binding upon the respective countries, I should think we would want some one to make the agreement besides the Secretary of the Treasury. It would have to be made in the nature of a treaty.

Mr. SMOOT. This is only a question of taxation.

Mr. BORAH. I know it is only a question of taxation, but it is an agreement with a foreign country. I do not know of any authority by which the Secretary of the Treasury can make an agreement with a foreign country.

Mr. COPELAND. I will let this go over until to-morrow morning. I will withdraw it for the time being.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is temporarily withdrawn.

CONSTRUCTION OF MILITARY POSTS

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Army housing bill, H. R. 11134, may be considered at this time. I understand the Senator from Utah does not plan to take up any further amendments at this time?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. There was no objection whatever to the bill on the call of the calendar last night except from the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DENEEN], who raised a question as to a committee amendment concerning Scott Field. I have talked it over with some members of the committee, and they are all willing that we should recede from the committee amendment. It will lead to no discussion. I ask that it may be passed because it is imperatively necessary in the preparation of the Budget.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. I thought the amendment was a good amendment. I have no objection to the Senate taking a vote on it. I am not going to interpose any objection, but on the showing before the Committee on Military Affairs, I thought the amendment was a good amendment.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ought to say to the Senator that in agreeing to the item I feel it my duty to warn him that the Appropriations Committee is absolutely set against any appropriation for Scott Field, and the insertion of the provision in this bill does not imply any agreement to appropriate any money for it.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is merely authorized, and then the question is left to the Appropriations Committee to make the appropriation or not.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Precisely.

Mr. FLETCHER. With that understanding, I am not disposed to delay the bill at all, but I know that the showing before our committee was that this was a proper amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I thought the Senator from Pennsylvania announced his purpose to ask that the amendment be disagreed to.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The committee struck out the provision regarding Scott Field. Now we restore it in order to get the bill through, but there is no agreement that there shall be any money appropriated for it.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the bill up for consideration?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is.

Mr. SMOOT. I have an amendment which the department has asked me to offer to the bill. The amendment is on line 13, page 2, after the numerals "$180,000," to insert—

Fort Douglas, Utah, officers' quarters, $75,000, noncommissioned officers' qurters, $50,000.

The Senator from Pennsylvania knows about the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11134) to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 4, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$12,964,950" and insert "$12,989,284," so as to read:

That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $12,989,284, to be expended for the construction and installation at military posts of such buildings and utilities and appurtenances thereto as may be necessary, as follows—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 22, after the numerals "$225,000," to strike out the semicolon and insert a comma and the words "noncommissioned officers' quarters," so as to read:

Camp McClellan, Ala., officers' quarters, $225,000, noncommissioned officers' quarters, $48,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 11, after the numerals "$40,000," to strike out "Scott Field, Ill., noncommissioned officers' quarters, $150,000."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask that that amendment be disagreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I agree, with the understanding that there is no appropriation to be made for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 3, at the beginning of line 14, to strike out "$300,000," and insert "$250,000; completion of hospital, $50,000," so as to read:

Selfridge Field, Mich., noncommissioned officers' quarters, $100,000; officers' quarters, $250,000; completion of hospital, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 23, after the word "reservation," to insert "for completing the construction of the new cadet mess hall, cadet store, dormitories, and drawing academy, including equipment, United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., $126,334."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 2, to insert a new section, as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 2, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to cause condemnation proceedings to be instituted for the purpose of acquiring certain tracts of land in the vicinity of Fort Kamehameha Reservation, Territory of Hawaii, hereinafter described, for use as a flying field, and that a sum not exceeding $1,145,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the acquisition of the fee civil title to said land either by purchase or condemnation, to wit: That portion of the Queen Emma and Damon estates lying directly north of and adjoining Fort Kamehameha Reservation, east of the Fort Kamehameha-Puuloa Junction Road, south of the plantation road just north of Loco-Lelepaua and extending to the Rodgers Airport and Keehii Lagoon on the east, consisting approximately of 1,434 acres, at a cost not exceeding $420,000, and also a portion of the Halawa district consisting of about 862 acres and immediately adjoining the Queen Emma and Damon estates at a cost not exceeding $725,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I now offer the amendment to which I referred a few moments ago. On page 2, line 13, after the numerals "$180,000," I move to insert "Fort Douglas, Utah, officers' quarters, $75,000; noncommissioned officers' quarters, $54,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection——

Mr. FLETCHER. There is objection, Mr. President. That matter was before the Military Affairs Committee, and the committee decided against it. It is just a question of whether we are going on spending money on old forts or whether we are going to abandon that policy.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that there were some 21 officers and men removed from Fort Douglas on account of the housing conditions existing there. General Summerall was out there; he saw the conditions, and had the men removed to San Diego, where they are to remain until necessary quarters shall be built at Fort Douglas. The amendment is strongly recommended by the department.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let us have a vote.

Mr. SMOOT. I am ready for the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary may be authorized to correct the totals in the bill just passed so as to make them correspond to any changes made by amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the bill just passed proposes to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts. Among other items the bill carries an authorization for the benefit of Post Field.

Post Field is located on the Fort Sill Military Reservation in Oklahoma, and the air forces stationed at Post Field are used in conjunction with the special schools of artillery fire now located, maintained, and operated on the Fort Sill Reservation. Oklahoma is proud of this military activity conducted within her borders.

Recently there was sent to the Hon. Dwight F. Davis, Secretary of War, a communication relating to and expressing the interest and pride that Oklahomans, and citizens of the central West generally, have in the Fort Sill institution, and I ask unanimous consent that a copy of that letter, which was written by me, may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

APRIL 28, 1928.

Hon. DWIGHT F. DAVIS,

The Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Supplementing the statements made at the time Senator PINE and I called on you relative to the proposal to move the Artillery School of Fire from Fort Sill to Fort Bragg, I respectfully submit the following, in opposition to such proposal and in defense of the Fort Sill location:

A few days ago, my colleague, Senator PINE, and I, accompanied by a representative of the press, visited the Fort Bragg Reservation and made an inspection of the site suggested for the removal of the Artillery School.

Since 1901, or for some 27 years, I have resided immediately adjacent to the Fort Sill Reservation; hence I am familiar with the present location of the school. This statement is based upon personal observation and knowledge of the two reservations, as well as upon records represented to be on file in your department. However, I wish it distinctly understood that in no sense is this communication to be considered an attack upon Fort Bragg, but instead I am making an appeal in behalf of the present location of the School of Fire at Fort Sill.

Fort Sill is not a political fort, and was not located through political effort or influence. As early as 1852 Captain Marcy recommended the vicinity of the Wichita Mountains as the best possible site for a military reservation, from which the Army could best check the depredations of the Indians.

It was so founded by Col. Benjamin H. Grierson, Tenth Cavalry, in 1868, under the command of Gen. P. H. Sheridan. His headquarters in the field were called Camp Wichita.

It was ordered fortified by General Sheridan, and Capt. R. H. Pratt, Tenth Cavalry, was given the detail. Soldiers, under his direction, hewed rough logs from the banks of Medicine Bluff Creek for stockade building.

Though the Government declined an appropriation, construction of permanent buildings began immediately. Troops quarried limestone on the reservation and erected the necessary quarters. The original Pueblo huts, modernized, still stand on the old post.

General Sheridan moved down from Fort Cobb the next year and named the post Fort Sill, in honor of a West Point classmate and one of his brigade commanders killed in action during the Civil War.

The School of Fire was established in 1908. Capt. Dan T. Moore, returning from a European tour of artillery schools of fire, was detailed to Fort Sill to inaugurate our first school of instruction.

The present School of Fire is the result of gradual development. Its initial purpose is to instruct officers and noncommissioned men in firing practices and problems.

Establishment of the school marked a new era. It made technical training compulsory. Officers are given opportunity to demonstrate their ability to conduct fire.

The school is for practical rather than theoretical instruction. This fact is of prime importance in considering the weather or climatic conditions. Fort Sill enjoys all-year outdoor weather.

Fort Sill is located on a Government reservation of 54,000 acres 4 miles north of Lawton, in southwestern Oklahoma, and within 300 miles of the geographical center of the United States.

Climate at Fort Sill permits outdoor training the year around; therefore it is as nearly ideal as may be found in the United States.

Terrain of the country on the military reservation more nearly approximates actual war conditions than any other available spot in the country. It possesses hill country, rolling prairie, open and wooded, and mountains, all traversed by numerous streams.

The post has excellent rail facilities, being served by the Rock Island and Frisco Railroads.

Government officials and private citizens realize the value of a cultural setting of an Army post so that the personnel may enjoy the comforts of civilization. At Fort Sill the Army personnel is fortunate. Life in the open country offers sport of every description, while the city of Lawton provides the culture desired by heads of families for wife and children.

Officers and men enjoy their life at Fort Sill. Many count the days when their tour of duty will return them to the post—calling it their home.

Lawton, 4 miles distant, has a population of 12,000 persons.

The personnel at Fort Sill give every evidence of being satisfied troops. Enlisted men, assigned to batteries, carry a greater reenlistment record than any other post. They are believed to get into less trouble than those stationed elsewhere. All batteries at Fort Sill are composed of first enlistment men, but records show almost twice as many reenlistments and fewer desertions than other posts. Two batteries, furnishing demonstrations for the School of Fire, have completed a year each without any absences without leave or a single desertion.

There has never been an unpleasant episode to mar relations between citizens and troops. The city of Lawton and all of Oklahoma are proud of Fort Sill and of the officers and private soldiers of the post. Indeed, the entire citizenship of the State is extremely jealous of this fine post, and warmly resents any meddling with its usefulness.

Lawton and Fort Sill are jointly served with water from an immense lake formed by a huge dam across a gorge of the Wichita Mountains, 14 miles from the city. At the dam is located the settling basins and clarifying houses. Twenty-four and sixteen inch pipes carry the water to the fort and city by strong gravity pressure. Lateral pipes permit Fort Sill to take water from the main before it reaches the city.

A hard-surface road, built by the city, runs to the post, while transportation service is provided by means of motor cars and busses.

Located on the military reservation to-day are the old Pueblo huts of the original fort, called the Old Post.

New Post, composed of comparatively new buildings, houses the Field Artillery.

The National Guard camp, of permanent construction, is occupied by troops from the several States during encampment periods.

The temporary wooden buildings, erected during the World War period, are now used for the home of the Field Artillery School of Fire.

Targets of natural construction dot the landscape. They are well known, are located on maps, and may be observed from numerous observation points.

Underground conduits and overhead cables carry 800 miles of telephone wire about Fort Sill. Reconstruction of these wires at any other post would be expensive. There are 6 miles of conduits, carrying 10 pairs of underground cables, used in zones where shell fire might cut communication lines. There are seven concrete telephone centrals and two wooden central controls.

Concrete gun positions at the fort number 23 sets. In addition there are 12 concrete dugouts and 23 wooden range guard houses.

Adjoining and annexed to Fort Sill is the Wichita National Forest of 65,000 acres. This Wichita National Forest lies to the west, and could be, and is, used as a shooting ground; thus providing ample range for the most powerful guns.

Its availability caused the Chief of Staff to report in 1905:

"Fort Sill is especially suitable for the station of a full regiment of Field Artillery, owing to its size, its varied terrain, availability of the Wichita National Forest, which can be used for military maneuvers."

The First Field Artillery was sent to Fort Sill and built up here, and the branches coordinating with it are instructed in conjunction with the Artillery regiment.

Military posts to-day are maintained by the Government for a twofold purpose:

First. For defense.

Second. For training.

Of all posts occupied by any branch of the Army, Fort Sill appeals most to the patriotic citizen of the present era. It was built in the memory of many persons now living. It was the chief point in the final quelling of the last important Indian uprisings.

Fort Sill occupies the most practical site for any Army post in the United States for a training ground for every branch of the Artillery. The unique combination of wide prairie and low mountain range makes the site ideal for the school of fire.

Prior to 1919 the chief of Field Artillery formulated plans for training all Field Artillery officers, and this plan is now in operation. As reorganized it includes:

Department of gunnery, firing, computation of firing data.

Department of tactics, maneuvering, handling of Artillery units, and their liaison with air and sister arms.

Department of material, implements of war, disposal, guns, motors, fire-control instruction, study of manufacturing and functioning.

Department of equitation, training of horse and man, draft, driving, and hippology.

Course for National Guard and aerial observers.

Artillerymen have found the Fort Sill terrain contains practically every feature requisite for artillery training.

Officer students begin on easy targets and moderate ranges. Gradually, targets become harder to locate, increasingly difficult to keep spotted with field glasses. They are hidden behind slopes, and officers are compelled to figure proper angles of fall to reach them.

Fire is conducted by flank, lateral, and bilateral observation.

Students maneuver their imaginary commands across papier-mâché hills, and through draws, shown on bas relief maps in the schoolroom, so when he reaches similar terrain in time of battle he can use similar tactics.

Following the period of class instruction, the student puts his organization through a practical demonstration in the field, where his every move may be noted by his instructors. Only at Fort Sill is the terrain believed to be available for such movements.

Present-day instruction principles call for a great percentage of work by visual means. Every item of technical course requires that it be supplemented with a practical demonstration requiring a large number of batteries.

Long periods of painstaking drill must be indulged in before batteries are capable of performing as needed.

A student officer must be able to take command of a battery and have it function in a warlike problem.

One battery requires space larger than a football field to execute a wheel at a walk. As students are not apt in such drill, twice as much ground is necessary.

Eight organizations now execute mounted drill at Fort Sill. Regardless of which direction a battery goes from the stable, a broad, flat, and unincumbered drill field presents itself. Can eight batteries drill at one time at any other post in the United States?

A bird dog must be trained to hunt before he will stand a covey of quail. An artilleryman must be taught to shoot. His confidence must be developed and he must see the result of his shots. Here is the result of the practical visualization of theory.

There is not a range in the Nation more suited to instruction in gunnery than Fort Sill. In gunnery lies the basis for the existence of the school.

Most important in battle is for the artillery to deliver fire at call from its sister-in-arms—usually the infantry. All impediments must be overcome by the artillery in the fury of battle to deliver the fire demanded. From the instructional side, it would be foolish to expect to instruct an officer without permitting him to see gunfire.

Every possible type of instruction that can be given requires a treeless range to accomplish the purpose of the School of Fire. This is found only at Fort Sill.

Gunnery may be properly taught only by having each outburst observed—calling for a treeless range.

Ranges at Fort Sill have been fired on so many times every instructor is aware of every situation that might arise. Any direction away from the post, firing may be done. The post is centrally located. Batteries leaving the stables may be at the firing point selected in less than 30 minutes.

Necessary marches and maneuvers that can not be executed at any other post unless neighboring farmers are trespassed upon are held at Fort Sill. Maneuvering batteries require flat fields for unhampered driving and draft. No range except Fort Sill has these possibilities.

There are thousands of points at Fort Sill where every round of shot can be observed. Tops of hills at Fort Sill afford observation advantages. In the next war artificial elevations can not be erected to see the fire.

Students are taken frequently to Fort Sill points where they can see maneuvers of a whole battalion in the plains below and are able to see the individuals of each organization perform their respective duties. This one fact alone is invaluable in instruction given Artillery officers.

Horses continue to furnish the motive power for most batteries. Horses need forage and grain.

On the prairies of the Fort Sill Reservation grows excellent rich prairie hay. It is harvested at an average cost of $5 per ton. Last year 6,500 tons were produced.

A draft horse is allowed 14 pounds of hay per day, 420 pounds per month. At the Fort Sill figure of $5 per ton, hay for one horse costs $1 for one month.

No other post in the country produces hay in any equal quantity. At any other possible post it is estimated hay would cost the Government $20 per ton, plus the freight, which would place the cost of hay for one horse for one month around $5, as compared to $1 at Fort Sill.

In conducting a school of fire insurmountable difficulties are believed to exist at all other posts. The objections are:

Lack of open areas of sufficient size, adjacent to post, for proper maneuvering. Scrub-oak forests cover other posts. Result of fire can not be as readily observed.

Artificial observation posts have to be built in trees. Artificial targets are usually made by hanging white sheets on tree branches. Even the best artillerymen dread firing over wooded areas where natural observation posts are not available.

Lost rounds are numerous, as obstructions on terrain prevent student from observing what his data and calculation give him. It is officially stated that as many as three salvos of four rounds each are lost in deep-wooded areas before a student can employ enough strategy to find where his fire is being delivered, except at Fort Sill. It is impossible to properly teach an officer under such a condition.

Ammunition is an expensive part of firing instruction.

At some of the suggested posts, it is officially stated, as many as 12 rounds are lost in one problem before the student can determine the line of his fire. In subsequent salvos 1 out of 8 rounds is lost.

Assuming that it costs $4 per round to ship ammunition to Fort Sill there is economy in retaining the school here because rarely is even one round lsot.

The average problem takes 16 rounds to complete. If 12 rounds are lost, the equivalent in money is wasted. A problem of 16 rounds at Fort Sill will cost $64 in freight charges.

Disregard the freight charge on ammunition to other posts. They lose 12 rounds. It costs $16 per round of ammunition. Multiply $16 by the 12 rounds lost, the total cost of wasted ammunition is $192.

The interests of economy is plainly in favor of Fort Sill. Instruction at posts other than Fort Sill would be rendered only partially competent through failure to observe 10 out of 12 rounds fired.

Inclement weather and mud at other posts operates to keep batteries from venturing into the field frequently. No problem had to be called off last year at Fort Sill, and no one experienced actual discomfort because of weather conditions.

Rain dries almost immediately at Fort Sill. In the experience of one Artillery officer no carriage's progress has ever been held up by soil condition on the Fort Sill range.

Wooded areas prevent passage of great bodies of troops. Troops are lost in the existing thickets at other camps.

It is believed that no such terrain is available in our entire country save at Fort Sill. Reconnaissance and selection of position for a battery to deliver fire is important and a student must practice to become an adept. Can he be instructed properly where his troops are hidden from his view by thickets of underbrush?

It is hard for men to make believe. It is not necessary at Fort Sill. The great expanse of the continually traversable reservation thrown open to the student presents a country closely resembling that of France.

The tactics department demands a terrain closely resembling the terrain board, so that every move of students and personnel may be checked. It would be ridiculous to attempt such instruction except on the type of range afforded by Fort Sill.

Orientation may be taught satisfactorily only at one post in the country, Fort Sill. Anywhere on other possible camps, a student would have great difficulty seeing one, or possibly two points—when three are absolutely necessary and five are desired.

The firing school is a school—not a proving ground.

At other camps, less than five points are available where fire may be observed. Fire may be delivered in one direction only, while, at Fort Sill, fire may be directed from any point in any direction, and still be observed.

We believe it would be folly to condemn the Fort Sill range and abandon the existing system. It would be expensive to reconstruct the concrete gun shelters, dugouts, telephone system, and abandon the valuable work of years that has made Fort Sill the ideal range for the school of fire.

The School of Fire at Fort Sill has passed the period of experiment. Fort Sill is a tremendously important cog in the machinery needed to maintain the Army at the highest efficiency. It is a fighting school, and as such it should take high rank in importance to the service at large.

I am advised, unofficially, that at a comparatively recent date the matter of the removal of the school from Fort Sill was considered and a committee of high ranking officials made a survey of the several possible sites for the permanent location of the school. The committee was composed of Gen. Ernest H. Hinds, Field Artillery; General Sladen, United States Military Academy; Colonel Malone, Infantry School; General McGlachlin, War College; General Craig, Cavalry School; and General Ely, of Fort Leavenworth, who recommended the Fort Sill Military Reservation as the best possible location for the School of Fire.

When war was declared against Germany the famous author and publicist, Peter B. Kyne, then in the military service, was sent to the Fort Sill school for instruction, and after his term had expired he prepared an article for the Saturday Evening Post, same having been published on November 9, 1918, in which article he said:

"The School of Fire for Field Artillery * * * was established at Fort Sill, where the gentle rolling country, alternately wooded and open, offers one of the most wonderful target ranges in the world."

More recently, an Army officer instructor at the said school at Fort Sill made the following statement relative to the merits of the present location:

"Officers in the gunnery and tactics departments here, who have been at Bragg, are frankly and unanimously of the opinion that the work of those two major departments of the school will be seriously hampered by the shape of the reservation and the nature of the terrain at Bragg. Fort Sill, with its fine, natural observation points, its varied terrain, its fine facilities for watering large numbers of animals, its camp sites along Cache and Medicine Creeks, the forest reserve area conveniently at hand for use in large scale marches and maneuvers, the normally fine, clear atmosphere which affords excellent visibility over great distances practically always, and the shape of the reservation and location of the post thereon, which permits firing into all target areas from firing points located conveniently near the garrison, and a mild climate which rarely precludes the practicability of outdoor work, fulfills just about every requirement for artillery instruction year in and year out.

"One of the principal arguments advanced by proponents of the move to Bragg, is that Bragg is only a few hours from Washington, New York, etc. This, to my mind, is one of the best reasons why the school should not move. It costs the Government well up into five figures for each student that passes through this school, and every student should consider his year at the school as one during which he may well forget the activities around the big cities and bend all his time and energy toward perfecting his professional equipment for the years that lie ahead. Fort Sill, with its comparative isolation, lends encouragement to the centering of one's interest in the activities of the school during the time he spends here."

The special board of officers above mentioned, in making their report, made some comparisons between Fort Sill and Fort Bragg and, after full consideration, recommended that the Artillery Special Schools be consolidated at Fort Sill. As some of their reasons for such recommendation, they gave the following:

"(A) Economy in overhead in officers and men.

"(D) Economy in mileage, transportation of dependents, freight of student officers of Regular Army under the supposition that Regular officers go to the Fort Sill School from the regiments mainly, and, in proportion to their authorized commanded strength. The average mileage to Fort Sill and return to station is approximately 400 miles less than the round trip to Fort Bragg.

"(F) A greater prestige of combined school. This is desirable not only for its effect upon the morale of officers of Regular Army but particularly for the National Guard and reserve officers. Board convinced that buildings at Post Field and School area are in better shape than at Bragg, and, with reasonable upkeep, would last for many years.

"(H) Fort Sill has a permanent water and sewer installation, cast-iron water mains, and the usual permanent type of sewer pipes and sewage-disposal plants. With the recent increase made in height of Lake Lawtonka Dam there will never be any further question as to either the quantity or the quality of the water supply for Fort Sill. The water mains at Bragg are of wood and are bound to deteriorate.

"Subsistence would be less at Fort Sill. Coal, oil, forage, and ordnance supplies furnished from Rock Island Arsenal cheaper at Sill.

"Approximately 20,000 acres in central area of Fort Bragg Reservation which, under condemnation proceedings, has been fixed at $650,000. It is not owned by the Government and, for the purchase of which, funds are not available. This area is not essential for work of Field Artillery School. Its location at center of reservation detracts considerably from its value for military purposes.

"Comparing the two reservations of Camp Bragg and Fort Sill for school purposes, it may be said that Camp Bragg has the advantage of having a better soil and perhaps a better climate. Fort Sill has a more open terrain and more diversity of terrain on the western part of the reservation than the Bragg reservation. This is advantageous for the battery commander's course, disadvantageous for the advanced course. The board believes that, considering all requirements of the terrain for school purposes, the Fort Sill Reservation is a better one than that at Bragg. The latter is entirely too close a country to fulfill many of the requirements for the school work.

"Camp Bragg is of war-time construction and has an estimated life of not over five years, according to the authorities at that post. Fort Sill has permanent construction, which cost approximately five and one-half million dollars, including concrete barracks and quarters for a regiment, heated from a central hot-water heating plant, concrete stables and gun sheds, and 20 other permanent sets of stone quarters.

"With reference to the cost of transportation of student officers and their families, freight, etc., a rough estimate may be assumed to be two and one-half times that of the mileage involved. No accurate data is available to the board. The mileage for the difference in distance, which is 400 miles per student per year, is $28. The total estimated saving per student at Fort Sill as compared with the transportation to Camp Bragg is therefore $70. There are at present in the Field Artillery School 150 officers. This item totals $10,500."

In the light of the foregoing history and statement of the present status of the going school at Fort Sill any suggested or proposed removal of the institution presents a number of most serious problems for consideration before final action is taken. Some of these problems might be enumerated, as follows:

1. The proposed removal of the said school from Fort Sill to Fort Bragg will bring to issue the policy of our Government in centralizing power in bureaus in Washington, and centralizing Federal institutions adjacent to the National Capital.

2. Such proposed removal will bring to issue the question as to whether or not the reasons for removal outweigh the advantages to be had at the present location.

3. The removal of said school would cause many people and numerous institutions to suffer irreparable loss; hence, such proposed removal will be considered a direct attack upon the vested interests in such institution now claimed by—

a. The adjacent local community.

b. The State of Oklahoma.

c. The Mid-West section of the United States.

d. The railways now serving Fort Sill.

e. The public utilities now serving the reservation.

f. The wholesale and retail institutions now enjoying patronage at Fort Sill.

g. The thousands of graduates of said School of Fire.

The mere suggestion that it has been proposed to remove the said Artillery School of Fire has caused widespread interest and, in the West and in certain sections of the East, such proposal has met general opposition.

Vested and fixed interests will not be content to sit idly by and see their property confiscated and practically destroyed without a protest. That great section of our country, the central and western portions of the United States, furnishes a very large part of the revenues to meet the running expenses of our Government, and, also, such section furnishes its full quota of the man power necessary for the proper defense of our Government, our people, and our property, and, because of such fact, that section of the country deserves a fair share of the Federal institutions and especially is this true when such institutions can be located, operated, and maintained as efficiently in that section as at or adjacent to the National Capitol at Washington.

In conclusion, permit me to say that we do not contend that the said school can not be moved, but rather that it should not be moved; that, under the Constitution, the Congress has the power to provide for the national defense; that we admit that the War Department has the power to recommend the removal of the said institution, but we most respectfully call attention to the fact that the Congress must furnish and provide the funds; that a removal of the said school would be doubly expensive, causing the people to lose the value of the present plant, and, in addition, causing them to be taxed to construct the new plant—a proposal, the consummation of which, is hardly in harmony with the justly popular economy program of the President.

However, since the issue of the removal of the said Artillery School of Fire has been raised, we most respectfully suggest and urge that the matter be settled at the very earliest practicable date. To this end we earnestly hope that you can make your suggested visit of inspection to the Fort Bragg proposed site and then, on behalf of Fort Sill, we respectfully invite and as earnestly urge you to visit the existing school before a recommendation is made. Such a procedure will permit your department to make a recommendation, and then, if removal is asked, the Congress, in the consideration of such recommendation and the reasons therefor, can permit an opportunity for a full investigation of the entire matter, and thus definitely and finally settle and fix the permanent location of the said school.

Again permit me to say that this communication is submitted to you, not in criticism of any other Army post or military reservation, but solely in defense of Fort Sill, and in protest against the removal of the special Schools of Artillery Fire from the Fort Sill Reservation.

Respectfully submitted.

ELMER THOMAS.

SHOOTING OF JACOB D. HANSON

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have in my hand a series of resolutions adopted by various organizations relating to the shooting of Jacob D. Hanson at Niagara Falls. The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The resolutions referred to are as follows:

The following resolution, unanimously adopted by the board of directors of the Niagara Falls Chamber of Commerce at their meeting on May 9, will be presented at the Hanson protest meeting this evening:

"Whereas while peacefully using the public highway Jacob D. Hanson, a member of this chamber of commerce and an esteemed and respected citizen has been very seriously and probably fatally injured, and should he survive will be terribly maimed for life, through the reckless action of members of the Coast Guard Service; and

"Whereas the methods employed by Federal representatives in the stopping and searching of citizens and in the indiscriminate display of firearms constitutes a serious menace to the safety of citizens using the highways in this vicinity: Be it

"Resolved, That the board of directors of the Niagara Falls Chamber of Commerce go on record as strongly condemning the methods of the Coast Guardmen in patrolling this region; and

COPELAND be urged to see that a full and complete congressional investigation is made, not only of the tragedy involving Mr. Hanson, but of the whole policy of Federal agencies whose reckless activities in connection with law enforcement have intimidated the residents of the Niagara frontier; and "That the sincere sympathy of the board of directors of the Niagara Falls Chamber of Commerce be extended to Mr. Hanson and his relatives, and that the services of the chamber of commerce be offered in assisting to make Mr. Hanson as comfortable as possible."

YOUNGSTOWN FIRE HALL,
Youngstown, Niagara Co., N. Y.

At the regular meeting of the Youngstown Fire Co. held in the village fire hall on Monday evening, May 14, resolutions of protest and indignation at the murderous attack on Jacob D. Hanson, of Niagara Falls, on Lewiston Hill by members of the Coast Guard stationed near Fort Niagara were voiced and drawn up by members of the organization. Copies of these resolutions were written for submission to United States Senators COPELAND and WAGNER, Congressman MEAD, and to the Niagara Falls Gazette and to the Buffalo daily newspapers.

They are as follows:

"Whereas the Youngstown Fire Co. embracing a considerable majority of the male adults residing in close proximity to Fort Niagara and are at all times interested in law and order in addition to fire protection that the residential section on the lower Niagara may be a safe abiding place, seek adequate relief from the terrorizing deeds of coast guardsmen under the guise of prohibition enforcement efforts;

"Whereas all of our members engage in almost daily business or social intercourse with residents of Niagara Falls, the murderous attack staged on the tortuous and ordinarily hazardous Lewiston Hill by Guardsmen Jennings and Dow on Jacob D. Hanson, a law-abiding, highly honored, and benevolent citizen of Niagara Falls in the early morning hours, Sunday, May 6, has been brought frightfully close to all firesides in this section of New York State;

"Whereas no sheriff in any county in the Empire State would permit the possession of firearms by any deputy of the apparent mental capacity of many of the coast guardsmen stationed on this frontier, as evidenced by the unjustifiable shooting of Hanson while returning home alone from a fraternal mission, protest is hereby made with the Federal Government against the use of firearms on the public highways by its officers. Be it further

"Resolved, That the officers involved in the dastardly and murderous shooting of J. D. Hanson shall be immediately delivered to the district attorney of Niagara County for speedy trial; and, furthermore, be it

"Resolved, That the men higher up in the Coast Guard Service, who may be apprehended as accessories before the brutal crime may also be acquired at an early date for trial and adequate punishment."

JOHN V. THOMPSON,
Engineer Youngstown Fire Company.
L. J. KELLEY,
Secretary.

At a regular meeting of Lockport Lodge No. 41, Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, held at its lodge rooms Thursday, May 10, 1928, after discussion and consideration, a committee consisting of Charles F. Foley, chairman, Joseph M. Kennedy and A. Bruce Hopkins was appointed for the purpose of drafting suitable resolutions and extending sympathy to our brother Elk, Jacob D. Hanson, of Niagara Falls lodge, of which Mr. Hanson is a brother and officer, and to assure Niagara Falls lodge of our sympathy and cooperation in any action which they decide to take relative to the murderous and unjustifiable assault made upon its beloved brother on the morning of Sunday, May 6, 1928: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Lockport Lodge No. 41, Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, hereby extends its deepest sympathy to our brother Elk, Jacob D. Hanson, with the wish for a speedy recovery, and assures Niagara Falls Lodge of Elks of its hearty cooperation in any plan or effort which they may deem essential to right the wrong inflicted upon Brother Hanson; to adopt such necessary resolutions or put such forces into action to the end that recurrence of such unjustifiable and atrocious assault shall cease; and be it further

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this committee, the mode of enforcement of the prohibition law is not a question of life and death even upon conviction for its violation. A law which leaves the question open to the determination or interpretation of any singular department head as to whether or not the use of firearms is necessary and essential to the enforcement of such law, is, in the opinion of this committee, a defect in the law which should be remedied.

The determination and interpretation of the law which gives any singular department head the right to issue orders to "shoot or not to shoot" and to direct the indiscriminate stopping, searching, and shooting at our citizens on the public highways should cease. Congress itself should assume its rightful burden, that of making the law so plain that not only department heads and all officers shall plainly understand it, but that American citizens may feel safe to travel over the highways.

We heartily protest against the manner and method of enforcement which has resulted in the maiming and wounding of our brother, not alone as Elks, but as American citizens; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Jacob D. Hanson, the President of the United States, United States Senators from this State, Congressman from this district, Niagara Falls Lodge of Elks, and the Grand Lodge of Elks.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTORS AT HOQUIAM, WASH.

Mr. JONES. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 457) to create a board of local inspectors, Steamboat Inspection Service, at Hoquiam, Wash., and I submit a report (No. 1182) thereon. It is a very short bill, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a board of local inspectors, Steamboat Inspection Service, consisting of a local inspector of hulls and a local inspector of boilers, be, and is hereby, created at the port of Hoquiam, Wash. Such inspector of hulls and inspector of boilers shall each be entitled, in addition to his authorized pay and traveling allowances, to his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of Commerce.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Journal be approved for the calendar days May 11, May 12, May 14, and May 15.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.), under the order previously entered, the Senate took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the calendar under Rule VIII, under the special order.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF NEWTON, MASS.

The bill (S. 2447) for the relief of the stockholders of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., was announced as first in order.

Mr. BRATTON Let the bill go over.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. President, this bill has been four times unanimously reported from the Committee on Claims. It has twice passed the Senate. So I feel justified in moving that the Senate give consideration to the bill notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from New Mexico.

On a division, the motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the stockholders of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., interest at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum on the judgment rendered in favor of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., against the United States in the sum of $371,025, from March 1, 1867, to the date of payment.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $249,039.95 is hereby appropriated for the purposes set forth in section 1 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. President, I will not take the time of the Senate in discussion of the bill if the Senate is ready to vote.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to delay the Senate long in discussing the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask a question with reference to the bill. I understand it is the bill relating to the First National Bank of Newton, Mass.?

Mr. GILLETT. It is. I shall be glad to answer the Senator's question later. The Senator from New Mexico has the floor.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the bill involves an expenditure of practically a quarter of a million dollars out of the Treasury of the United States. The claim involved is a stale one, to express it mildly. The transaction occurred in 1867. At that time the cashier of the bank entered into a conspiracy with an official of the Government. The official was short in his accounts in the subtreasury at the city of Boston. The conspiracy involved an agreement to take the property and funds of the bank out of the coffers of the bank and carry them to the subtreasury, to be used for the purpose of concealing the shortage of the officer of the subtreasury during an impending examination. Clearly it constituted a criminal act within itself. It was a conspiracy to conceal a crime which had already been committed by an officer of the Government.

The cashier of the bank was a party to the transaction and aided in its consummation. He was just as culpable as the official of the Government. Their degree of guilt can not be distinguished. The funds were taken from the bank pursuant to the criminal conspiracy, and were carried to the subtreasury for the purpose of concealing the embezzlement which had previously occurred.

I have not had time to reconsider the report this evening, but the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] reported the bill for the Committee on Claims. He sits at my right and I shall ask him to correct me if I go astray in detailing them.

As I now recall, some of the securities were earmarked in order that they might be identified for the purpose of making certain that they would be returned to the bank after they had been used by the official of the Government in concealing his shortage or embezzlement while he was being examined by the examiner who was due in a few days thereafter. A detailed receipt was given for everything thus received in the way of money or securities.

When the examiner came, as I now recall the facts, the embezzling official confessed the shortage, and the whole thing was made known. The Government held to the money and securities for a long period of years. Then the bank made claim against the Government for the recovery of the principal of the securities and money thus acquired by the Government and thus surrendered on the part of the bank. The claim was submitted to the Court of Claims. Judgment was rendered for the principal sum. It has been paid. The bank has recovered the principal sum of all of its money and things of value with which it parted through the consent and connivance of its cashier, representing the bank, on the one hand and the officer of the Treasury, representing the Government, on the other hand.

It is now proposed through this bill to pay the bank practically a quarter of a million dollars for the interest upon the use of the money during the time the Government had it.

Admittedly the transaction was conceived through fraud. It was born of corruption. The bank was as culpable as was the Government. It it a new doctrine when one party to a fraud of that kind can come before the Congress and contend that it has clean hands and accordingly may present a claim that can rest upon no ground except moral ground. There is no legal obligation here.

I venture the assertion that even the author of the bill, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], will not contend that there is a semblance of legal liability on the part of the Government. If not, then what character of obligation is there unless it be said to be a moral one?

I submit to the Senate that the transaction bears close analogy to a proceeding in court where one gambler is attempting to recover from another gambler. Where is the court that will waste its time to hear a dispute between thieves or gamblers with reference to the loot or the fruits of their illegal transactions? But we are asked here to appropriate a quarter of a million dollars of the taxpayers' money to reimburse a corporation that was just as guilty and participated in the illegality of the transaction just as much as did the official of the Government.

It is not my purpose to filibuster against the bill. I am perfectly willing for the Senate to vote upon it. But I am curious to know upon what theory a vote can be justified in favor of the bill, when it is known to the Senate that the obligation, if there is one, emanates from a transaction which sounds in crime—one that is criminal in its nature, filthy from start to finish, had no other purpose in view than to accomplish a crime by concealing one already committed. Yet one of the parties to a transaction of that kind comes before the Senate and asks the Senate to reimburse it with the money earned by the sweat of the brows of the taxpayers of the country who were never parties to a transaction of that kind.

My attention has been called to Section XXIII of the report. I digress to inquire why this liability was not adjusted 40 years or more ago if it had sufficient merit to appeal to the conscience of the Congress? Why has it remained in this unliquidated and unsettled form during these years if it was founded upon merit either legal or moral?

Section XXIII of the report reads as follows:

XXIII. On February 24, 1872, the bank filed its petition in the United States Court of Claims against the United States to recover its funds and securities deposited as aforesaid in the office of the Assistant United States Treasurer in Boston, and on January 24, 1881, judgment was rendered for the full amount, to wit, $371,025. In delivering the judgment of the Court of Claims, Chief Justice Drake thus expressed the opinion of the court regarding the taking of the bank's assets as a "villainous scheme," and the transaction as "simply a case of a bank being robbed and of its stolen assets being put into the hands of the cashier of the subtreasury for a purpose which by no law could be held to effect a transfer of the bank's right of property in them either to him or the United States."

Mr. President, I undertake to say that if the scheme was a villainous one, as the court characterized it, participated in by villains, designed to conceal an existing crime by the commission of another crime typical of villains, there is no justification for the expenditure of a quarter of a million dollars to repay the bank for the use of its money thus acquired by the Government.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

Mr. BRATTON. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I was unable to hear what the Senator said with respect to the time when this transaction occurred. Was it four years ago?

Mr. BRATTON. It occurred in 1867.

Mr. BLAINE. It was not four years ago, then?

Mr. BRATTON. I said 40 years ago.

Mr. BLAINE. I understood the Senator to say four years ago.

Mr. BRATTON. I spoke figuratively when I said more than 40 years ago. The transaction actually occurred in 1867. During all the intervening time the Congress of the United States, with the combined judgment which its Members represented, has failed to see fit to reimburse one party to a transaction which the reviewing court characterized as a villainous one, yet we are called upon to pay interest for the use of money furnished by one villain to another villain, to be used in concealing a crime previously committed, and in doing that another crime was committed.

Mr. President, I can not give my consent to reach into the pockets of the taxpayers of this country, the farmers who earn their livelihood by the sweat of their faces, or the man who earns his wage behind the counter, or the fathers and the mothers of this country who are interested in educating their children at heavy expense in order that they may become useful citizens, for the purpose of reimbursing a bank that participated in an unholy, a criminal transaction, as this bank did.

It is merely my purpose to bring the facts to the attention of the Senate, and then I am willing to abide by the judgment of the majority of the Senate; but I do desire to have Senators understand what is involved and upon what foundation we are asked to appropriate the enormous sum of nearly $250,000. I think I have made a fair statement of what was done; I think I have been fair in my deductions as to how the transaction should be viewed in law or morality. With that explanation, Mr. President, I am content to yield the floor.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I submitted the report on this bill both at this session of Congress and during the last Congress. While it does not appear in the report, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that a bill similar to this bill was introduced in 1885; that a bill carrying the same amount has twice passed the Senate; that a bill in the same amount once passed the House, and that a bill carrying a smaller amount also once passed the House. Therefore, the matter is not unknown to the Congress of the United States. It so happens, however, that in no one Congress was joint action taken by both Houses, either for the whole amount or a smaller amount.

To refer for a moment to what the Senator from New Mexico has said, I do not think that he has taken the proper conception of the facts in this case. He has not misstated them; I think he has given a very fair and concise statement of the facts as they appear in the record; but I think he has unconsciously glossed over a part of the case, and to that I wish to call the attention of the Senate.

This money was stolen by the cashier of the bank from the vaults of the bank, and taken, as the Senator has said, and placed in the hands of the cashier of the United States Subtreasury in Boston; but that taking by the cashier of the bank was in no wise permissible, so far as his duties were concerned; he was a robber and thief when he did it. He did it without authority; he did it without order and without the knowledge of the bank. So, when he took it, he took it as a thief and not as a bank official. As a bank official he had access to it; that was how he could lay his physical hands upon it; but the actual taking was not the legitimate act of a bank official but the act of a thief.

The Senator from New Mexico, as I have said, has glossed over that phase of it. While he tried to make it appear that the cashier of the bank was particeps criminis with the cashier of the subtreasury, nevertheless he holds the bank at fault for not having stopped this man from taking funds out of the bank vaults.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BAYARD. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. The Senator concedes that the cashier was one of the executives and controlling officers of the bank, was he not?

Mr. BAYARD. No. The Senator concedes he was the cashier of the bank and had control of the funds of the bank, to be paid out solely for the purposes of the bank and for no other purposes.

Mr. BRATTON. He was one of the controlling officers of the bank, was he not?

Mr. BAYARD. No; he was subject to the orders of the directors.

Mr. BRATTON. As cashier he had the physical control of the assets of the bank, including these moneys and securities?

Mr. BAYARD. No; I differ from the Senator. I do not like to say it, and I say it with great courtesy, but I dislike his language. The cashier did have the physical control of the moneys of the bank, under the orders of his superiors, to wit, the directors of the bank, for the purpose of not letting that control go loose from him; but he had no orders and no power to let that money or the securities go out except in the regular transactions of the bank, as set forth under the terms of his employment by the directors.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield further to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BAYARD. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. Suppose he had used the money to lend it out at interest and had gained something for the bank. Does the Senator suppose the board of directors would have ratified the transaction and enjoyed the fruits of it?

Mr. BAYARD. Undoubtedly; if he had loaned it out, that would have been within the scope of his duties. That was what he was there for, to supervise the loaning of money.

Mr. BRATTON. In other words, when he gained something for the bank, well and good; but the moment that he loses the bank's property in this way they repudiate the transaction and stand upon the technical ground that he was not authorized to take the money out of the vaults of the bank and pass it over to an official of the Government.

Mr. BAYARD. That is where the Senator and I differ in our conception of the moral quality of this act as compared with the moral quality of the acts which he was authorized to perform by the directors of the bank. The cashier of the bank was authorized by its directors to lend money in the regular course of the banking business, and of course the bank in return would receive interest upon the loans or the discount, or whatever it might be; but in this particular case he did not lend anything. He took the money surreptitiously; he took it without permission; he did not take it for the purpose of lending it to anybody to get any return for the bank, but he took it without the bank's permission for no banking purpose whatever; he took it for the sole criminal purpose of helping another criminal to cover up his tracks in the subtreasury of the United States.

That was the sole purpose, and I can not conceive of how the Senator gets in his mind the idea that this money was in any way taken out of the bank for what, for lack of a better term, I may call a banking purpose, so far as the bank was concerned or those in interest, the stockholders of the bank and the directors. So much for that phase of it.

If Senators will carefully read the report and the findings of the Court of Claims in this case they will find stressed in the opinion of the court this particular point—and I ask the especial attention of the Senate to it—that, as the court found to be a fact, when the cashier, who was the representative of the Federal Government, received that money and put it in the Government vault he knew it was stolen money. That is one phase of it. After he made his confession and it was found that the money was there, and when the cashier of the bank turned up with his receipt—a detailed receipt showing exactly what had been turned over to the defaulting cashier of the Federal Government, the whole Government of the United States then knew, through its own proper examination, through its own proper agencies, that every dollar of that money and all the securities were stolen. In other words, from that time on the Federal Government was knowingly the receiver of stolen goods. That is a fact determined and found in the opinion of the court.

Nevertheless and notwithstanding that fact, the Government kept control of that money from 1867 until 1881, when, after the finding of the Court of Claims, the judgment was finally paid; but during that whole time it kept that money; it used it; it kept the securities from which it cut the coupons. In this connection let me say to the Senate that some of the securities were the Federal Government's own bonds and from those bonds it cut its own coupons, and cashed them and put that cash in its own pocket during that time. That is a fact. It is all in the opinion and in the findings of the Court of Claims.

Having received that money, having kept it from 1867 to 1881, knowing all that time that it was stolen property, and finally having paid it back in 1881, using it for 14 years, the Court of Claims could not under the then law, nor even under the present law without special authorization, allow interest on that claim. However, the Government did use the money during all that time, knowing it did not own the property, that it had no righteous title to it, but it kept it, knowing from the very beginning that it was stolen property. This bill is to reimburse the bank for the use of that money at the average rate of 4½ per cent during that period of 14 years.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes.

Mr. NEELY. Why have the beneficiaries of this bill waited 61 years to ask for relief?

Mr. BAYARD. As I said a moment ago—I do not think the Senator heard the earlier part of my remarks——

Mr. NEELY. I did not hear all the Senator's statement.

Mr. BAYARD. A bill was introduced in 1884 or 1885. I think it first passed the Senate in 1885; I do not recall the exact date. I think it has passed the Senate twice, or perhaps three times, in this exact amount; it has passed the House once in this exact amount and it has passed the House once carrying a smaller amount; but in no one Congress has the same bill passed both Houses. I can not give the exact dates of the various passages. I think the last passage in either House—and the Senator from Massachusetts can correct me about it if I am wrong—was about 10 years ago. I think I am right about that, but I will not vouch for the exact time. Apparently, however, this case has been fairly well prosecuted, if I may use that term. The amount is large, nearly a quarter of a million dollars, and that in itself has been a stumbling block to the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAYARD. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. I notice on page 4 of the report a receipt for $336,000 signed by J. F. Hartwell, cashier. Is that the amount of the securities and moneys that were taken in the first instance?

Mr. BAYARD. I will say to the Senator—and I think his question is a perfectly fair one—that the money was taken, I think, from three separate sources. There were other deposits than the deposits which were in the bank vault; that is, there were some deposits in the city of Boston where the bank had a department or an agency, and some moneys were taken from there, and I think some securities were taken from some other place. They were not all taken from the same place. The one receipt to which the Senator refers is for the definite amount, I think, which was taken from the Newton home bank.

Mr. BRATTON. If I may impose upon the Senator for an additional question, what was the total amount given by the cashier of the bank to the official of the subtreasury?

Mr. BAYARD. It was three hundred and seventy-odd thousand dollars; I do not remember the exact amount. I have not the figures before me.

Mr. BRATTON. Then, Mr. President, the principal amount was only $371,025, as the bill recites, and we are now proposing to pay $249,039 as interest upon that sum. I am correct in stating that the bank has been repaid the full amount of the principal, am I not?

Mr. BAYARD. Whatever was the amount of the principal it has been fully repaid. I have forgotten the exact amount of the principal, but this covers the interest at 4½ per cent, which is the average rate during that whole period that the Government was paying for money, on the whole amount finally paid back by the Government.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware, it seems to me, has so adequately explained the bill that although I had expected to discuss it, yet, as I know the Senate is in haste, I will not occupy time except to say that I think the Senator from West Virginia did not fully understand that while this claim originated in 1867, suit was brought first, and that suit was not settled in the Court of Claims until 1880. Soon after 1880 this claim was begun in Congress, and was prosecuted vigorously in the eighties.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield for a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Obviously, after the Court of Claims had rendered judgment, the matter was presented to Congress for payment. If Congress had believed that more than the judgment rendered in the Court of Claims was due, morally or legally, Congress would have made the appropriation at the time that it made the appropriation to cover the judgment.

Mr. GILLETT. Not at all.

Mr. KING. If Congress did not make the appropriation for anything more than the judgment, are we not entitled to the presumption that Congress felt that the bank had been adequately paid, and that there was no further obligation, either moral or legal?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. President, Congress could not make an appropriation for anything except the judgment.

Mr. KING. Why not?

Mr. GILLETT. It could not make the appropriation until a bill had passed Congress authorizing it; and that bill was started very soon after that—I forget the exact year. It passed the Senate twice, and it has four times had the unanimous report of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit an interruption again, the Senator knows that whenever a judgment has been rendered by the Court of Claims, the matter is then presented to the Appropriations Committee. That judgment undoubtedly was presented to the Appropriations Committee. The Senator knows that in the eighties the Appropriations Committee assumed more jurisdiction in the matter of claims de novo than it does now, in view of the Budget system. If the Appropriations Committee had not been satisfied that the amount which was included in the appropriation bill was all that was due, it would have recommended an additional amount; or, if the claimant believed that the amount of the judgment was inadequate, undoubtedly the claimant would have presented the matter to the Appropriations Committee of the Congress, and sought then an additional appropriation above the amount of the judgment.

Mr. GILLETT. Why, no, Mr. President; the Senator obviously misconceives the situation. The Appropriations Committee could not pay anything more than the judgment of the Court of Claims. It had absolutely no jurisdiction; and until a bill was introduced and passed Congress, there was no authorization for an appropriation.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator pardon me again?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; but I hate to take the time.

Mr. KING. Is the Senator correct in stating that in the eighties and nineties, and indeed until quite recently, the Appropriations Committee did not have full jurisdiction over any claim that might be presented to it, whether the claim was founded upon a judgment of the Court of Claims or otherwise?

The Senator knows that the Appropriations Committee had plenary power to consider claims that were presented; and oftentimes it recommended appropriations in bills which were brought to the House or to the Senate far in excess of any judgment that had been rendered; and, indeed, it recommended, in the bills which were submitted to the Senate and to the House, appropriations for which no judgment had been rendered in the Court of Claims or in any other legal tribunal.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Utah a rather interesting fact in the payment of this particular claim as to principal, and that is that there were two payments. It was not paid in toto at first. It was paid about half, roughly speaking, the first time, and in the next Congress the balance was paid. So it would appear that the practice at that time was, first, that the Court of Claims under the law was unable to do anything more than give a definite judgment for the whole amount of the principal, and could not give a judgment for the interest, if there be interest, on it—and there was interest, of course, under the circumstances I have described, or should have been interest paid—and, on top of that, Congress in those day was very unresponsive so far as speed was concerned, and it took two Congresses to get this claim wholly paid.

So I think it evidences the temper of Congress at that period that it was not in any hurry to pay the claim; and, as I say, it took some time to do it. It may have been that the Treasury was in straits; I do not know; but the record discloses beyond a doubt that it took two bites of the cherry before the claim was finally paid after the rendition of the judgment in the Court of Claims.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAYARD. I yield.

Mr. KING. I ask for information: Why does the Senator state that the Court of Claims could not render judgment for any sum in excess of that which it did render? Why does he make the statement that it could not render a judgment for interest upon a valid claim if there was a valid claim? May we not assume that the Court of Claims, taking into account all of the circumstances and conditions, felt that the amount for which the judgment was rendered was fair and just compensation for all that was due?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAYARD. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the rule of law is that a sovereign is not liable for interest upon any claim presented against it. In order to hold the sovereign liable for such interest it is necessary to secure the passage of a statute recognizing liability for interest.

Mr. BAYARD. I think there is no question about that. The principle involved is very well expressed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is the reason why the Court of Claims could not render a judgment for interest.

Mr. BAYARD. The Court of Claims, in the first place, could not legally give a judgment including the interest, and in the second place, legally could only give a judgment for the principal. The Court of Claims was absolutely circumscribed by the act empowering it to take charge of this case, and could only give thus and such a judgment; and that judgment, whatever it may be, could not include interest.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It therefore becomes somewhat of an equitable question as to whether the Government will recognize liability for interest.

Mr. BAYARD. It is solely a question, as stated by the Senator, as to whether the Federal Government, having knowingly received stolen property, and having used that property for 14 years, is willing or unwilling to pay interest upon the use of that money.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield?

Mr. BAYARD. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. If the Senator will tolerate a further interruption, does the Senator subscribe to the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas that this claim is an equitable one, and that it has sufficient equities to appeal to the Congress to reimburse this bank for the use of its money hypothecated in fraud and corruption and to compound a felony?

Mr. BAYARD. I do not agree with all the Senator's statement; and I may say, very frankly and courteously, that I do not think his presentation of it is quite a fair one.

Mr. BRATTON. I should be glad if the Senator will point out wherein it is unfair.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not mean to be discourteous, but in this way: He says the whole thing was conceived in fraud. All right; admit all that; but the point I am trying to make is that the Government took this money, knowing it to be stolen money; it kept this money knowing it to be stolen money, and for a period of 14 long years it utilized this money, knowing all the time that it was utilizing stolen goods. I quite agree with the Senator from Arkansas and with the Senator from New Mexico that this claim is only a claim founded in equity, and, more than that, I think, in decency. The Government knew what it was doing all this time. It was using stolen money, knowing that it was stolen.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what equity one conspirator in a fraud has against another conspirator therein?

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator's proposition, as I say, is not exactly a fair presentation, for this reason:

The bank was not a party to this conspiracy. Its dishonest cashier was a party; but in being a party to the conspiracy he in no wise represented the bank in his official capacity. He took advantage of his official opportunity to lay his physical hands upon something, and used it, which officially he had no right to use in that way.

Mr. LOCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BAYARD. I yield.

Mr. LOCHER. What interest, if any, did the cashier have in this bank? What part of the bank did this cashier own?

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know that he had any interest in it beyond his official salary.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the merits of this bill have been so well explained by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] that no further explanation is necessary. I want to point out the fact that the Committee on Claims on four occasions have reported this measure, and reported it favorably. That means that the committee intrusted with the responsibility of studying the merits and demerits of this legislation have decided that in equity and in decency, as stated by the Senator from Delaware, it ought to be paid.

We ought to decide this question now once for all and either vote for this measure or vote against it. Twice already the Senate has voted favorably, and the Committee on Claims four times. These litigants ought to have a decision. It seems to me that the equities in the case clearly point to and favor the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Has the Senator examined the bill which was passed by Congress, evidently along in the early eighties, by which the matter was referred to the Court of Claims?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. Does that bill restrict the Court of Claims to a finding for the principal only; or does it not submit the matter to the Court of Claims to render a judgment upon the entire controversy? I feel confident that must have been the bill, because Congress would not have wanted to settle this matter in piecemeal.

Here was a claim presented to Congress. I believe that Congress must have said in the bill, "This whole matter is referred to the Court of Claims for the bank to present its demands and the Court of Claims to hear the testimony and render a judgment for whatever is due to the plaintiffs"; and the judgment then rendered was $371,000, which was paid by the Government. Does the Senator say that the matter is in piecemeal, that it was not fully litigated, that the claim was not fully discharged by the suit?

The Senator is an able lawyer. He knows that the court does not favor piecemeal litigation and the cutting of matters in two, segregating contracts and rendering different judgments growing out of the same transaction.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is a fact that the Court of Claims did not render any judgment for interest.

Mr. KING. How does the Senator know that the bill did not require the court to find the entire amount due, and pronounce judgment accordingly? And if the court failed to give as much as it should have done, it was res adjudicata. That ended it; and why should we take up the matter again?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I answer the Senator from Utah in that connection?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The proceeding was not by bill. It was upon petition in the Court of Claims. The bank filed its petition before the court, alleging the conversion of this fund; and the court found in the full amount of the claim. It did not find interest, because, in all probability, it had no authority under the law authorizing the hearing of such claims. The record is not clear upon that point, but I notice——

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. May I state to the Senator from Utah that the bank went into the Court of Claims to sue the Government as of right under the then statute covering claims of that kind. It did not require any special act of Congress for that purpose. There was at that time a law upon the statute books allowing claimants to come into the Court of Claims, and the bank pursued that right; and, even so, under the then law it could only lay claim to the principal, and could not lay claim to interest.

Mr. KING. Is the Senator sure of that?

Mr. BAYARD. Absolutely sure.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I want to call attention again to the fact that I have never spoken to a member of the Committee on Claims on this matter, and I do not believe my distinguished colleague [Mr. GILLETT] has. This committee, sitting in judgment upon this claim, examining all phases of the subject, have on four previous occasions, and again during this session of Congress, given it unanimous approval.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. Notwithstanding that, has a fair statement of the salient facts involved in the transaction been made here this evening?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I consider that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is entirely impartial, has absolutely no personal interest of any kind or description in the matter, and that he honestly and conscientiously believes this bill a meritorious one, or he would not have advocated it.

Mr. BRATTON. Oh, certainly. I did not mean even to intimate anything to the contrary. The Senator from Massachusetts will not accord the Senator from Delaware any higher compliment in that regard than I will take pleasure in according him.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am sure that is true.

Mr. BRATTON. But the point is this: The Senator from Massachusetts is now laying stress upon the fact that the Committee on Claims has reported favorably on the bill. I ask him if a fair statement of the salient facts involved in the transaction has been made to the full Senate this evening?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I certainly believe a fair statement has been made.

Mr. BRATTON. If so, they are few. They are narrow in scope. What particular significance has the report of the committee, then, when all the facts are presented to the Senate fairly, as the Senator from Massachusetts in his usual frank manner admits?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the difficulty with the reasoning of the Senator from New Mexico is that somehow or other he thinks that the stockholders of this bank are responsible, and ought to assume the blame and losses for which the negligent officials are responsible.

I can not follow his reasoning in claiming that the stockholders are to blame for the neglect or criminality of an official of the bank. They are innocent parties, and they should not be held to lose because of the criminality of an official.

Mr. BRATTON. Then, Mr. President, if the genial Senator from Massachusetts will yield to another question, he undertakes to support the claim on the theory that although the cashier of the bank was a party to the criminality involved, the bank is not bound by his action.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I certainly do adhere to that. It would not be any more bound than I would be bound by an agent of mine who stole my automobile and sold it to somebody else. I would have a right to get my automobile back, and I would have a right to be repaid for any losses I sustained. I am not responsible for the acts of a criminal agent.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Instead of this being the money of the stockholders of the bank, if it had been the money of depositors or others who had placed it there in charge of the bank, and the cashier, acting in his official capacity, had stolen that and converted it to the use of this embezzling Government officer, would the stockholders be liable for the acts of the cashier in that case?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly not.

Mr. BARKLEY. He would not?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is my opinion.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator think there is any greater obligation on the part of the Government to reimburse stockholders for the money that an embezzling cashier stole from them than would be true if it had been other people's property deposited in the bank in the care of these trusted officers?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The stockholders are not so held liable.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the present law with reference to the payment of interest on claims of this sort, if such a claim were submitted to the Court of Claims now? Would there be any authority in law to pay more than the principal involved?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I can not answer.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the Senator from New Mexico answer that question, or will the Senator from Delaware answer it? If this were a new claim being presented under the law which now exists, would the Court of Claims have any right to consider the claim for interest?

Mr. BRATTON. It is my understanding that the Government is not liable for the payment of any interest, that the payment of interest rests upon the moral concept of the Government, or the equities of the situation.

Mr. BARKLEY. It has always been my understanding that in cases of property taken by the Government during war, or under any other conditions, although the owner may be deprived of the benefit of the property for as long a period as is involved here, there is never any interest paid, either on recommendation of the Court of Claims, or by any special act of Congress. Is that correct?

Mr. BRATTON. That is my understanding. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield for another question?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. BRATTON. Suppose the deposits of this bank had been $100,000 and its capital stock had been $50,000, and the $100,000 belonged to 500 depositors, and the cashier had absconded with every bit of that property, money deposited by the depositors. Could the bank have repudiated that and said that it was not liable because its cashier had absconded with money belonging to its depositors?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think not.

Mr. BRATTON. The bank would be liable for the action of its cashier?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is my opinion.

Mr. BRATTON. Then in taking property criminally, as we must concede, that belonged to the Government, how does the bank escape being responsible for the act of the cashier in that respect?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the Senator has omitted one salient fact from the circumstances in this case, that the Government held this money for 14 years, knowing that it was stolen money, and had the use of it and the benefit of it for 14 years, and if anybody connived with the bank officials to hold the money for 14 years, and then use it, they would be responsible to the stockholders.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understood the Senator from Delaware to say this was not all cash, that there were some securities, and that the Government clipped the coupons from these securities and collected them.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Absolutely.

Mr. FLETCHER. So the Government collected the interest on these securities during the time it held the securities.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. For 14 years it used the securities as if they were its own.

Mr. FLETCHER. The question in my mind is whether, in entering this judgment against the Government, that interest was not included, as well as the principal sum.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator from Delaware says it was not. He has examined the legal authorities and the details of the case.

Mr. FLETCHER. It looks to me as if, when they came to sue in the Court of Claims, they would have set up not only the original deposit of the securities to the amount of $370,000, but whatever the Government collected on those securities in the way of interest coupons. It looked as if that would have been included in the judgment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator from Delaware know about that?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. President, the Court of Claims did not have jurisdiction under a special act in this matter. The case was brought under the general jurisdiction, and at that time the Court of Claims was not authorized to award interest, its jurisdiction in the matter of interest being confined to cases of contracts expressly stipulating the paying of interest.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask the senior Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What was the amount originally taken from the bank and deposited in the subtreasury?

Mr. GILLETT. Three hundred and seventy-one thousand twenty-five dollars.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then, if the Government clipped coupons from bonds which composed a part of that amount, and the coupons so clipped were not included in the judgment, the Government had the benefit of the coupons clipped.

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And I think it ought to pay.

Mr. GILLETT. The Government had the use of the money all the time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, evidently the Government used the money, if it was money, because they were not able to pay the judgment when it was rendered. The report says:

> Thereafter, on October 29, 1881, the sum of $260,000 was paid, on account of the judgment, by the Treasurer of the United States, that being the only amount available under the appropriation then existing. The balance of $111,025 was paid August 30, 1882.

It seems as if the Government used the money, if it was in the shape of money. But some one spoke about securities, and I thought perhaps if the Government collected interest on those securities, that would have been included in the judgment.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from New Mexico merely one question. As I understand it, this cashier was in collusion with the Government's agent.

Mr. BRATTON. Admittedly so.

Mr. GEORGE. Then, may I suggest to the Senator from New Mexico that it is not a question of the bank's cashier dealing with an innocent third party, in which event the bank might be liable for its act, but the Government could certainly not take advantage of any wrong which its own agent had participated in in getting these securities. I think that is the principle of law which applies.

Mr. BRATTON. That is the principle of law. On the other hand, the bank can not claim the fruits of a transaction sounding in criminality to which it was a party through its executive officer.

Mr. GEORGE. It was not a party. Its cashier was wholly beyond the scope and acting wholly outside of his powers. Had he been dealing with an innocent third party, your case might be different, but here, where the Government's agent was particeps criminis, then the act of the cashier was his individual act, and in no sense binding on the corporation.

Mr. BRATTON. If the cashier had been dealing with a third party who was innocent in the transaction, I would concede that the case would be different, but in this transaction there were two parties, and one was just as guilty as the other, and one just as culpable as the other. How one party to a transaction that is clothed in fraud and corruption and violation of the criminal laws of the country can come to the Congress and ask for a quarter of a million dollars as interest upon an original sum of $371,000 is almost inconceivable.

I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question, if I may have his attention. I fail to find in the record any statement showing that the Government clipped coupons from these securities and used the money derived in that manner for which it has not accounted. Will the Senator point out where that appears in the record?

Mr. GILLETT. I can not say that it appears in the record, but they had these securities and used them. Of course, they clipped the coupons.

Mr. BRATTON. How does the Senator know that the interest was not included in the $371,000 judgment rendered by the Court of Claims?

Mr. GILLETT. Because that was the exact amount that had been paid; and the Court of Claims had no jurisdiction to give any interest.

Mr. BRATTON. At any rate, the Senator is unable to say that $249,000, or any substantial part of it, being the amount involved in this bill, is money derived from coupons clipped and sold by the Government?

Mr. GILLETT. The Government had those securities with the coupons on them, and, of course, it had the use of all this money for 14 years.

Mr. BRATTON. How much of the money was derived from the sale of coupons clipped and sold?

Mr. GILLETT. That I do not recollect. It seems to me that that does not make much difference. They had the use of the money all the time these 14 years, and whether they cut and sold the coupons or whether they paid the Government debts is immaterial.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if there is anything in the record to show what interest the securities bore during the time the Government held them?

Mr. BAYARD. I think in the report the securities are set out in some detail. But I will state this to the Senator: That the judgment given by the court was for the then face value of all the property taken at that time, and was not for the coupons clipped and put in the Government's pocket during the time the Government had the money. It was for the flat value of the property taken in 1867 and used, but the use of it was never accounted for.

Mr. SACKETT. Is there anything in detail showing the interest the securities bore at the time they were stolen?

Mr. BAYARD. I will say to the Senator that bonds of the Government at that time generally bore 5 to 5½ per cent. That was the average rate of interest paid by the Government upon moneys which it borrowed during that period.

Mr. GILLETT. There are references in the reports to the "7-20" bonds; that is, bonds running 20 years and bearing 7 per cent interest.

Mr. SACKETT. That may be all true, but it seems to me that we have hardly enough information, if we are going to allow a claim for interest, to establish that the securities may have borne that high a rate of interest.

Mr. GILLETT. But they certainly bore at least 4½ per cent.

Mr. SACKETT. How does the Senator know? There is no evidence before the committee that they were interest-bearing securities. They may have been stocks, or something of that kind.

Mr. BAYARD. I think if the Senator reads the report he will find that there were certain Government interest-bearing securities. But if that were not so, let me make this suggestion: Suppose every cent of it was cash. The point is that the Government used it during that period, but during that period the Government itself paid an average of 4½ per cent interest for money it borrowed from other people.

Mr. SACKETT. That is true. It seems to me if it were cash it would be a simple proposition, but when it comes to securities, I think we ought to know more about what those securities were and what they would have paid the bank if the bank had retained them.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator think we ought to increase the claim?

Mr. GILLETT. It must have been at least 4½ per cent.

Mr. SACKETT. It may have been.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. On page 3 of the report, under paragraph XIII, it appears that, without the knowledge of the officials of the Newton National Bank, Dyer placed in the hands of Carter securities of the said bank to the amount of $45,000, pointing out at the time that he had no authority to commit this act. In paragraph XVIII, on the same page, it appears that—

> In the early part of February Dyer had given to Carter, as special agent in Boston of the Newton National Bank, a power of attorney to receive the interest from the Federal Government on March 1, 1867, upon Government bonds belonging to the Newton National Bank. This interest amounted to $6,325, and Carter instead of drawing it out and putting it to the credit of the Newton National Bank simply signed a receipt therefor on Hartwell's books, and Hartwell transferred the amount to his own credit on the Government books. It does not appear that Dyer was party to or had any knowledge of this transaction.

There are other paragraphs in the report that explain the items which go to make up the $371,000 plus.

Mr. SACKETT. But the very statement which the Senator reads shows there was over $6,000 of interest already put into the principal sum, does it not?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; the $6,325 of interest was converted interest on Government bonds.

Mr. SACKETT. But probably that is added to the amount for which judgment was rendered.

Mr. BRATTON. Obviously the $45,000 of bonds referred to in Paragraph XIII, on page 3, was included in the judgment rendered by the Court of Claims.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BRATTON. Then that item is entirely eliminated. The only item left is the one the Senator from Arkansas referred to, the item of $6,000 plus, being interest on the $45,000 of Government bonds.

Mr. SACKETT. May I ask the Senator another question? Is there anything to show that these were all Government securities, and not securities of corporations of some kind?

Mr. BRATTON. I think not.

Mr. SACKETT. The Senator knows and I know that at that period of the country's history there were many railroad bonds that became defaulted, and it is perfectly possible that some of that sort of securities were included. If that is the case, there is no right to pay interest by the Government on defaulted securities. I do not know that there were any such securities, but it is possible there may have been. It seems to me the committee should go further into the question of the securities before the Government authorizes the payment of the claim.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from New Mexico, or some other Senator, if there is any other Senator who knows anything about it, how much of the money originally taken that belonged to the bank was in cash, and how much in securities?

Mr. BRATTON. Perhaps the Senator from Delaware can answer that. I am unable to do it at the moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. On page 4 of the report there appears this receipt:

> Deposited by Mellen, Ward & Co., of Boston, $336,000 in Governments and bills on account of deposit, to be returned on demand in Governments or bills or its equivalent.
> Date, February 28, 1867. J. F. Hartwell, Cashier.

That seems to be the only information available in the report, in answer to the Senator's question.

Mr. BARKLEY. That seems to indicate that a part of the property was in Government bonds and a part of it in bills, presumably cash; but there is no information contained in the report which indicates how much was cash and how much was money, or how much was derived from the clipping of coupons on any bonds they took away, and whether the amount now asked is made up by compound interest on interest collected on the Government-owned bonds. It strikes me it is rather voting in the dark about a quarter of a million dollars. I should like to get the real facts about it before I voted for a bill appropriating so much money to pay interest on a claim.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, in the first place, I am sorry I can not give the detailed information the Senator wants as to the character of the securities and cash, the quantity of the securities and cash, or either or both. However, it makes no difference for the reason that the court found in an amount of the value of the securities in cash as the total taken at the time the theft was committed. The judgment of the court does not take into account anything received by the Government from the use of those securities during the 14 years that it held them. The judgment does not reflect the clipping of coupons or the cashing of any coupons. It is merely a judgment for the flat amount taken by the cashier and turned over to a Government official.

Mr. BARKLEY. How is the total amount arrived at?

Mr. BAYARD. The 4½ per cent interest was the average rate that the Government paid between the years 1867 and 1888, the date the final payment of the judgment given on the principal was asked.

Mr. BARKLEY. I can understand how that is fair to ask if the Government owes any interest on the actual money used.

Mr. BAYARD. That is all it is for.

Mr. BARKLEY. But is there anything in the report to show or does the Senator himself know how much interest these coupons bore which it is claimed the Government clipped?

Mr. BAYARD. The judgment does not include anything collected by the Government on coupons.

Mr. BARKLEY. Therefore it is possible we are paying a higher rate of interest than the securities drew.

Mr. BAYARD. There is no calculation in the interest claim based upon anything but the utilization of the whole amount of money. The utilization of the property by the Government is all that was taken into consideration. It is interest on the value of the property taken when it was taken from the bank by the cashier of the bank and turned over to the cashier of the subtreasury. That is the amount for which the judgment was rendered. I think that answers the Senator's question; I hope it does.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I think $249,000 is too much money to pay on the claim. I move to amend by striking out, in line 10, "$249,039.95," and inserting in lieu thereof "$100,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

On a division the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there are no further amendments to be offered, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BRATTON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN]. Not knowing how he would vote, in his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]. On account of his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I do not know how he would vote on this question. Nevertheless, I transfer my pair to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRATTON. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 2787) providing for the appointment of governors of the non-Christian Provinces in the Philippine Islands by the Governor General without the consent of the Philippine Senate was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLAINE. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting war was announced as next in order, and that it had been reported adversely.

Mr. BRATTON. Let the joint resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1414) for the prevention and removal of obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in cottonseed oil by regulating transactions on future exchanges, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, we have an understanding as to Senate bill 1414, and I therefore ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CLASSIFICATION OF SERVICE POSTMASTERS

The bill (S. 1728) placing service postmasters in the classified service was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

Mr. BRUCE. I move that the bill be taken up for consideration, notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Maryland——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Maryland is not debatable.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent that I may make a suggestion to the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Utah will proceed.

Mr. KING. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] is very much interested in this bill, but was compelled to be out of the city for a day or two, and I trust the Senator from Maryland will let the bill go over until the Senator from South Carolina shall have returned.

Mr. BRUCE. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion having been withdrawn, the bill will go over.

PRISON-MADE GOODS

The bill (S. 1940) to divest goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined by convicts or prisoners of their interstate character in certain cases was announced as next in order.

Mr. STEPHENS. Over.

Mr. HAWES. Notwithstanding the objection, I move that the bill be taken up and put upon its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. KING. Let the bill be read, Mr. President.

Mr. METCALF. Would the Senator be willing not to insist on having the bill considered to-night? I promised the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] that I would ask to have the bill go over until their return, as they wish to speak on it. I hope the Senator will agree to let the bill go over until the next time the calendar shall be called. It is nearly at the head of the calendar and probably can easily be gotten up. It is also on the preferred list of the steering committee; so that it will come up directly after the Boulder Dam bill shall have been disposed of. So, in the absence of the Senators to whom I have referred, I trust the Senator will kindly let the bill go over to-night.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island that I should be very glad to accede to his request if a unanimous-consent agreement could be arrived at to let this bill be disposed of on Saturday next.

Mr. METCALF. I think that would be quite satisfactory. I think both the Senators I have named will be back by that time.

Mr. EDGE. How can we agree to that in the absence of the Senators referred to?

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, may I say that there is a peculiar situation surrounding the consideration of this bill. In 1908 the House passed a bill similar to this one, and the bill was considered by a committee of the Senate. However, in order to save time I ask that the bill be considered by unanimous consent at the conclusion of morning business on Saturday next, and be voted on not later than 2 o'clock on that day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Missouri that if the proposed unanimous-consent agreement fixes a definite hour for a final vote it will be necessary to have a quorum call.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. MOSES. I think I can——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the floor. Does he yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. MOSES. May I suggest to the Senator that he propose the unanimous-consent agreement in this form: That the bill be taken up at the conclusion of routine morning business on Saturday, and in any event not later than 12.30 o'clock on that day——

Mr. HAWES. And that it shall be made the unfinished business.

Mr. MOSES. I do not desire that it shall be made the unfinished business, because that would interfere with the arrangement made with the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] in connection with the Boulder Dam bill. While I am opposed to the bill, I am satisfied that opposition to it will be futile, for there are ample votes to pass the bill, and I think I can assure the Senator that the opponents of the bill have no desire to prolong the discussion upon it. I believe that the Senators who are absent and in whose behalf the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] has made the request for postponement, have no desire unduly to delay a final vote upon the bill, because I think they realize, as I do, that the Senate wishes to vote upon the bill, and is determined to pass it.

Mr. HAWES. Would that arrangement be satisfactory to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CURTIS. Unless the revenue bill shall be disposed of to-morrow, I can not consent to that, unless the Senator from Utah, having charge of the revenue bill, shall agree to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The Senator from Missouri has the floor. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and is open to amendment.

Mr. MOSES. May I suggest to the Senator that if the unanimous-consent agreement could be made to apply to Monday, when the revenue bill will surely be out of the way, and we will have a morning hour——

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, it will be impossible for me to consent to that kind of a unanimous-consent agrement.

Mr. MOSES. Does the Senator mean he would object to taking the bill up at the conclusion of the routine morning business when we have a morning hour?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know when we are going to have a morning hour.

Mr. MOSES. I think without question we shall have one on Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON. Perhaps we will and perhaps we will not.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Even if we should have a morning hour on Monday, we would probably have only one hour in which to discuss the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is the proper time to discuss the bill.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time to substitute the House bill on the same subject for the Senate bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether the House bill is the same as the Senate bill?

Mr. HAWES. It is the same bill with an extension of time of one year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the House bill, the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 7729) to divest goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined by convicts or prisoners of their interstate character in certain cases.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HAWES. I do.

Mr. MOSES. I will make another suggestion to the Senator from Missouri. I am informed by the majority leader that there will be an evening session on Monday.

Mr. CURTIS. We would like to have one. I do not know whether it will be agreed to or not.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the Senator's bill is on the calendar to-night. So far as I am concerned, I should like to accommodate any Senator at any time who may be interested in any bill; but here is a bill now before the Senate. Why do we not proceed with it?

Mr. MOSES. The reason has been stated, I will say to the Senator, by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], who made the request that the bill go over on behalf of two Senators who can not be here to-night.

Mr. JOHNSON. This time was fixed for the hearing of these bills, and while, of course, we would all like to accommodate every Senator, all of us are here under some stress and at some inconvenience, and it is unfortunate that some Senators can not be present. But here is a bill of importance in which the Senator from Missouri is interested. It has been reached on the calendar; it is here to be heard. Why not proceed to hear it?

Mr. MOSES. Because two Senators who want to be heard in opposition to the bill are not here.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate bill 1940 will be indefinitely postponed. House bill 7729 is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment, and the Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, am I to understand that it is impossible to enter into any kind of a unanimous-consent agreement which will accommodate the two absent Senators?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from New Hampshire that it appears so at this time.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Regular order!

Mr. HAWES. Any agreement that I can possibly make which will accommodate Senators and at the same time assure a vote on this bill I will be glad to make.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. STEPHENS. Do I understand that the Chair has submitted the question whether this bill shall be taken up by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator that the bill was taken up on motion.

Mr. STEPHENS. The question on the motion has not been put as yet, has it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question has been put, and the motion decided, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, I am going to say, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me, that I had a conversation with him regarding the pending measure a day or two ago. I have received some letters from my State which indicate that this measure will affect my State very materially and the processes by which it takes care of situations which are involved in this bill. I had understood that, perhaps, some agreement might be reached by which an amendment might be adopted to take care of that situation, or that I could be given assurance that my State would not be injuriously affected. Such an agreement has not as yet been perfected.

I wish to say to the Senator that I am not prepared to state at this time that I shall oppose the bill, but, unless certain amendments shall be agreed to, it is my purpose not to allow the bill to pass to-night if I can prevent its passage.

I hope under the circumstances that the Senator will adopt the suggestion made by certain other Senators that this bill may be taken up at a later date. I think by so doing, perhaps, his bill may have very much less opposition than it will have to-night. I understand the session will only run until 10.30 p. m., which time will be reached in just about an hour from now.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator to ask a question.

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes; and my question is this: Is the Senator willing to let this matter be deferred until a future date within the next two or three days so that certain conferences may be had, and perhaps certain agreements may be reached that will lessen the opposition to his bill? We are going to have other night sessions. We are going to have other opportunities to consider this matter.

Mr. HAWES. I will say to the Senator that there is practically no opposition to this bill. I do not believe there are 12 votes in the Senate that oppose this bill; but it is meeting the same reception that it has met since 1908.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, may I make another effort to get a unanimous-consent agreement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HAWES. I do.

Mr. MOSES. I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be taken up on Saturday at 12.30, and that a final vote be had upon it not later than 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I think the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Rhode Island will agree that I have attempted to show them every possible courtesy.

Mr. MOSES. And I will agree, also, that we have exhausted every expedient.

Mr. McNARY. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, replying to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], not only should the Senate have the facts connected with the situation which relates to this bill, but the public should have them. Three times the lower House of Congress has passed bills similar to this. Three times a committee of the United States Senate has approved bills similar to this.

This identical bill has passed the lower House twice, and it passed the lower House last week by a vote of 304 to 40.

I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STEPHENS. I am listening.

Mr. HAWES. Although during these times this bill has been before the Senate, and approved by committees of the Senate, the Senate never has had an opportunity to vote upon it. It has always died at the end of a session as the result of a filibuster, as the result of congestion, as the result of an opposition which was afraid to stand up and have a vote in the Senate.

This bill was heard by a committee of the Senate in a long, exhaustive session; and then, 10 days later, the prison wardens had a hearing on the same subject. The bill was reported to the Senate on the 23d of February without opposition. The same thing happened in the House; and this is the prison contractors' last stand. We will have a vote, and there is no man who has discussed this bill and understands the philosophy of the bill who will ask for an amendment to the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. The comment which the Senator has just made leads me to make this inquiry:

This bill excepts the paroled convicts or prisoners. Should not that be amended so as to provide for paroled convicts or persons on probation, adding the words "or persons on probatin"? Many of the States have what is known as the probationary system, where sentence is imposed and the sentence suspended and the person put on probation. They are convicts; they are technically and in law prisoners; they occupy a status similar to paroled prisoners, but in fact and in law they are not paroled prisoners; they are persons on probation.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator is sympathetic to this bill and that his inquiry, of course, is made to benefit the bill. I will say that every line of this bill has been given very careful consideration by an organization interested in prison reform, and the phraseology used has been gone over very carefully. It has been passed upon by the House. In the first place, I should not like to have an amendment made to the bill, because it might endanger its final passage; and I do not think the amendment is necessary, because there are no States in the Union where convict sales are regulated that cover that kind of prison employment.

This bill does not write any law. It does not make any regulation. All that this bill does is to provide that when convict-made goods, or goods made by confined prisoners, reach the border of a State, they take on the character of the law of that particular State.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I fear that the Senator has missed the particular point to which I was trying to call attention.

A paroled prisoner is one who is relieved from imprisonment by a parole board, perhaps by a governor; and the products of their toil may be sold in interstate commerce.

Mr. HAWES. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. That is, the products of the toil of men who have been sent to prison and later released on parole may be transported in interstate commerce; but the man who is convicted and is put on probation by the court before imprisonment, is nevertheless a convict, yet he may not serve a single day in prison; still, under this bill, the products of his toil could not be transported in interstate commerce. I submit that even under the statement the Senator has made, a wrong should not be committed with respect to such a person, and a discrimination made in favor of the person who has served a term and is released on parole.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he has read line 5 on page 1, where it says "except paroled convicts or prisoners"?

Mr. BLAINE. I have the Senate bill before me, and have read that; but I am distinguishing between a paroled convict and a convict on probation. They are not in the same class.

Mr. CURTIS. I did not understand the Senator to say "on probation."

Mr. BLAINE. That definition of a paroled convict will exclude a convict placed on probation by the court, or, for instance, by a commission such as has been suggested by the Governor of New York.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, let me plead with the Senator. My time expires at 10.30. This may be the last opportunity of passing a bill that union labor is asking for, the representatives of free capital, and the Federation of Women's Clubs. This same defeat has gone on four different times in the Senate, not by a vote but by a delay, by a filibuster, by confusion at the eleventh hour. I know the Senator is not indulging in that.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAWES. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. I want to say to the Senator that I am in sympathy with the purposes of the bill.

Mr. HAWES. I understand that.

Mr. BLAINE. My suggestion has not been made for the purpose of producing confusion, but rather to perfect the bill. I think it would be extremely unfortunate to have a bill passed that would exclude the products of the labor of the man who has not served a single day in prison, yet he is a convict, but is on probation by the court, and permit goods made by convicts under parole to be transported; and that would not be in the interest of those who are supporting this bill. I suggest that a wrong ought not to be done simply because some one may fear that the bill will not pass. Under the circumstances such as the Senator from Missouri describes—the vote of the House and the feeling of the House—if he will permit the amendment to be inserted, there is no question in my mind but that the House will agree to it.

Mr. LOCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. LOCHER. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin what he understands is the difference between probation and parole.

Mr. BLAINE. There is a very clear distinction.

Mr. LOCHER. What is the distinction?

Mr. BLAINE. A probationary status is that of a person who has not served in prison under a sentence. A paroled status is the status of a person who has served in prison, but is released upon some authority constituted by the State wherein the parole is effected.

Mr. LOCHER. What, then, is a bench parole?

Mr. BLAINE. A bench parole at what time?

Mr. LOCHER. In numerous States the law provides that the court may give a bench parole—that is, a parole without incarcerating the defendant.

Mr. BLAINE. After sentence?

Mr. LOCHER. After sentence. It is exactly the same thing as being on probation.

Mr. BLAINE. By another name; but there are States that provide for a probationary status.

Mr. LOCHER. But it is by law. The law provides that he shall be given a bench parole without ever being incarcerated.

Mr. BLAINE. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in my own State the probationary status and the paroled status are entirely different; and this bill would prevent the transportation in interstate commerce of goods the product of persons on probation, and permit the transportation of goods the production of a paroled convict.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, how many of them are there? Does the Senator know?

Mr. BLAINE. I suggest that in Wisconsin the number on probation is about 2,000.

Mr. WATSON. When they leave prison they go out in the ordinary vocations, do they not?

Mr. BLAINE. On probation, they never go to prison.

Mr. WATSON. They do not go into prison, but they do go into all the industries?

Mr. BLAINE. One of the conditions of the probation may be that they shall work in a particular trade; and perhaps that industry may be engaged in transporting goods in interstate commerce, and under this proposed law it could not be done.

Mr. HAWES. May I say to the Senator that this bill does not affect any transportation except where there is a State regulation; and the United States Government can not write laws for the States that will not interfere in any way unless some State puts that definition upon a paroled prisoner?

May I say to the Senator that this matter has been discussed at great length on the House side and on the Senate side in committees, every word has been weighed very carefully, and the humane end of it has been emphasized? I hope the Senator will not insist upon that amendment now.

Mr. BLAINE. May I ask the Senator whether his position is that his only objection is that the amendment may delay action on the bill?

Mr. HAWES. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator does not maintain that the amendment is not a proper amendment under the circumstances?

Mr. HAWES. I will say to the Senator that I think it is unnecessary, but I do not think that it would vitally affect the bill. I do think that any amendment to this bill threatens its life.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this is the fourth time bills on this subject have passed the House and have been killed in the Senate in the closing hours of the session, and I hope that will not be repeated on this occasion.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to ask whether or not the laws of Wisconsin prevent the sale of prison-made goods within the borders of that State?

Mr. BLAINE. They do not.

Mr. WATSON. Then this bill would not apply to that State. This bill provides only that prison-made goods shall not be transported by interstate commerce into those States which by statutory enactment prevent the sale of prison-made goods within their borders.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me suggest to the Senator that the thing works the other way. The goods manufactured by prisoners on probation in any State can not be shipped in interstate commerce under this proposed law without subjecting the goods to the laws of the States.

Mr. WATSON. What does the Senator want?

Mr. BLAINE. The same privilege for the man who is on probation as is granted to the man who is on parole, and certainly he ought to have the same privilege. He is not of the same degree of criminality as the man who has been sent to prison and then placed on parole. He is a prisoner whom the court regards as one who may rehabilitate himself without being sent to prison, under the supervision of the court and a probationary officer.

Mr. HAWES. The Senator must admit there is a great deal of merit in this bill, and I trust he will not continue this discussion if he wants the bill to pass. We are taking up all the time on a small point of dispute in which we are in disagreement with the Senator. Unless the Senator is opposed to this bill——

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that the number on probation, wherever the probationary system is provided for in the respective States, is no doubt two to three times the number on parole, and yet the Senator proposes to give the specific benefit to men who have actually been incarcerated and take it away from those who have been put on probation, and who never served a single day in prison.

Mr. HAWES. Will not the Senator offer his amendment so that we can dispose of it one way or the other?

Mr. BLAINE. I want to submit the amendment to the Senate. Let this body determine whether the bill should be amended.

Mr. HAWES. Will not the Senator please submit the amendment?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the junior Senator from Missouri yield to his colleague?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not care to prolong the discussion.

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I know that the Senator from Wisconsin is in favor of the principle of this bill, and I would like to have him give me his attention just a moment. This bill does not prohibit anything unless there is a State law of prohibition. This bill is governed by what is in the State law.

The bill provides that "all goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined, wholly or in part, by convicts or prisoners, except paroled convicts or prisoners," and so forth—shall be prohibited? Not at all. But when they are transported into any State or Territory of the United States and remain there for use or consumption they become, upon their arrival, subject to the laws of that State.

Does the Senator know of any State that prohibits the sale of goods manufactured by paroled prisoners of the character he has described, probationary prisoners? I undertake to say there is no State in the Union which provides for leasing convicted prisoners upon probation that makes it illegal to sell goods made by them. If that is true then it follows that no harm can be done by this bill, because there is no State law prohibiting the sale of goods made by persons who have been released on probation. I think it is an absolutely fair analysis of the situation.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I will be very glad——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the junior Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HAWES. Will not the Senator from Wisconsin please submit his amendment?

Mr. BLAINE. The senior Senator from Missouri asked me a question.

Mr. HAWES. I am sure he will forego the pleasure of the answer of the Senator if the Senator will submit his amendment and let us vote upon it.

Mr. BLAINE. I should not be subjected to an inquisition by the senior Senator from Missouri when the junior Senator from Missouri denies me the privilege of answering the question. I submit in all fairness I ought to have the opportunity to answer the question.

Mr. HAWES. Certainly; answer the question, but I hope the Senator will present his amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. I thank the junior Senator from Missouri for extending me the privilege of answering the question submitted by the senior Senator from Missouri.

I do not believe that the senior Senator from Missouri has placed the proper construction upon this bill. If the construction he places upon the bill is correct, then all that any State has to do is to refuse to legislate upon the question, and therefore be entitled to transport prison-made goods between the several States. This is what the bill provides:

That all goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined, wholly or in part, by convicts or prisoners, except paroled convicts or prisoners, or in any penal and/or reformatory institutions, transported into any State or Territory of the United States and remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage, shall upon arrival and delivery in such State or Territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory to the same extent and in the same manner as though such goods, wares, and merchandise had been manufactured, produced, or mined in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced in the original package or otherwise.

By transposing the words "except paroled convicts or prisoners," the construction is made clear that "goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined by paroled convicts or prisoners" shall not come within the prohibition of this proposed act. It excludes prison-made goods, or goods made by convicts or prisoners excepting paroled convicts or prisoners. That is my understanding of the construction that should be placed on this bill. I think it is perfectly clear, and that is why I propose to submit the amendment, after the word "prisoners" to amend by adding the words "and except convicts under probation." I move that amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. One placed on probation is placed there as a result of a suspended sentence. It is an individual who has never served a sentence for the particular offense that is involved. Therefore, unless I am mistaken, he is not in the class of a convict at all, never having served a prison term, so that he is not included in any of the classes mentioned in this bill.

Mr. BLAINE. That depends entirely on the laws of the respective States. In my own State a probationary status may be under a suspended sentence, or under a sentence and on probation, and they are usually under sentence on probation.

Mr. WAGNER. After having served a term in prison?

Mr. BLAINE. No; before serving a term.

Mr. WAGNER. Then the man is not a convict.

Mr. BLAINE. If he is sentenced, he is.

Mr. WAGNER. Not unless he has served in prison.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; he is a convict. He is found guilty, and a man who is found guilty of an offense is a convict. It is not necessary to send a man to prison to classify him as a convict. I think that is so clear that no argument is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, just one minute. While I would not hesitate to vote for the amendment if it would appear that it does fall within the category of the phraseology of the bill, it is quite apparent that at this stage if we amend the bill that will be the end of it, because if there are 40 people in the other body who are opposed to it the opposition of a single Member would prevent its going to conference, and it is a question as to whether it would ever come up for concurrence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I do not understand the statement made by the Senator from Ohio about a single objection preventing a matter going to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has asked for the yeas and nays. Is the demand sufficiently seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Missouri a question. As I understand it, the Senator is trying to stop the leasing of prisoners, contracting labor in prison. Would the Senator have any objection to excepting all goods that are not manufactured under the leasing of prisoners, or contract labor in a prison?

Mr. HAWES. This bill does not do that. All this bill does is to permit a State to protect itself against convict-made goods coming in from some other State. The character of legislation of each State may be different. The States may take different viewpoints. This bill does not regulate anything in any State, or interfere with the management of any prison in any State. All that it does is to protect a State from the dumping into that State of convict-made goods as it will describe them in its own statutes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. HAWES. Certainly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am in sympathy with the general principle of the bill. I have in mind the penitentiary of Minnesota. Eighteen years ago we abolished the contract system. The prisoners work and get a daily wage. They make farm machinery, and the machinery is stamped "prison labor." They make twine and the twine is stamped as "prison goods." The fact that the State of Minnesota in its penitentiary has established that factory has served to break the power of the twine trust and we have no trouble with organized labor over that practice in Minnesota. Of course, to some extent it might come in competition with free labor in other places, but it is necessary to keep the prisoners working under sanitary conditions. We pay them a daily wage. They make from 30 cents a day up to as high as $1.50 a day and their keep. Some prisoners, I am informed, make more money than they could if they were free.

Mr. HAWES. The binding twine from the Senator's State is not prohibited entrance into any other State that I know of. It is properly labeled and the bill will not interfere with the Senator's institution, in my opinion.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am glad to hear that. I am opposed to convict labor competing with free labor, but we must keep prisoners working at something or they go crazy.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, as I stated some moments ago, I do not have any particular objection to the main provisions of the bill, but there are those in my State who feel that if the bill is passed it will have a very hurtful effect upon the State of Mississippi. This is the condition that exists there. The State owns State farms. One farm at least contains several thousand acres of land.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STEPHENS. In just a moment, when I complete this particular statement.

We have in the State of Mississippi, in the Mississippi Valley, several thousand acres of land. That land is utilized by the State as a farm upon which a great majority of the convicts of the State are kept and worked. It is true that those convicts produce corn, feedstuffs, hogs, mules, and so on.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEPHENS. In a moment. But the main product of that State farm is cotton. There are several thousand bales of cotton produced there each year. I am not sure that those in my State who have written me are correct in their statements that the bill will interfere with the convict labor in my State, that the cotton which is produced by those convicts may be prohibited by this bill, if it shall become a law, from entering into the commerce of certain other States. I had a few moments a day or two ago in which to discuss this matter with the Senator from Missouri. We did not reach a conclusion at that time in regard to the proposition. I am not willing that the bill shall pass unless ample protection is given to the people of my State in this regard.

The proceeds from the products of that farm which I have mentioned go into the State treasury. It is true that in a sense the cotton that is produced on the State farm by the convicts goes out and comes in competition with the cotton of the farmers of my State and of the Cotton Belt. But it is also true that the cotton that is produced by those convicts and put upon the market and sold goes in a very large measure to decrease the taxation of the people of my State.

Mr. President, it would not do to say that the convicts, poor unfortunates, those who are feeling the heavy hand of the law, those who are being justly punished for their violations of the law, should be kept, as was the custom in former days, in close confinement, allowed no exercise, refused the right to get out in the sunshine and have some of the pleasures of life, at least those that are conducive to good health.

I say it would not do to say that they shall be so confined that they can not have the opportunity to remain in health as best they can under the circumstances. So my State, as well as many other States, has adopted the policy of providing that these men shall go out and labor and produce something.

As I have already suggested, in the State of Mississippi we produce cotton on the State farms. I want to be absolutely frank about the proposition. I am not sure that the language includes cotton. I am not sure that the fears of certain gentlemen in my State are well founded. What I am anxious to have done is to be given positive assurance that the State of Mississippi shall not be affected by the passage of this bill. As I said, I am not sure that the language employed here affects the State of Mississippi. The bill provides that "all goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined, wholly or in part, by convicts," and so forth. Now, of course, in the strict sense of the word cotton taken from the field by the convict is not manufactured, but it is produced. But even the word "produced" does not cover it. I am not at all certain that cotton produced by convicts is covered or affected by the language of the bill where it says that "all goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined, wholly or in part, by "convicts," and so forth.

But there are in my State men of intelligence, men of legal ability, men who are interested in the proposition, who feel quite fearful that that language is broad enough to affect the cotton produced by convicts in Mississippi. To-night, although I have great sympathy with the main ideas of the bill, I am presenting the views that have come to me from those citizens of my State, and it is not my purpose, if I can prevent it, to allow this bill to pass to-night unless there shall be adopted to it an amendment to the effect that agricultural products shall not be affected by the bill.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] asked me to yield to him a moment ago. I am going to yield to him at this point so that he may state his view. I want him to say whether or not he is willing to accept an amendment of the character I have suggested. If he is unwilling to do that, then, of course, I shall proceed with the discussion of this measure.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, will the Senator please state his amendment so that I may understand it?

Mr. STEPHENS. I will say, Mr. President, while I have not prepared the amendment as yet, my idea is that there shall be an amendment to the effect—it might be in the nature of a proviso—that agricultural products shall be excluded from the operation of the bill.

Mr. HAWES. Will the Senator please write his proviso or amendment so that I may answer his question?

Mr. STEPHENS. I shall be very glad to do that if I shall not lose the floor and let a vote come before I can prepare the amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. STEPHENS. If some other Senator will speak while I am writing my amendment, I shall be glad to proceed to write it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STEPHENS. I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I want to submit a proposition to the Senator from Mississippi. I know he is not opposed to the principle of this bill.

Mr. STEPHENS. I am not, sir.

Mr. REED of Missouri. But I know that such opposition as he is presenting is because he has a fear that the cotton raised by convicts or picked by convicts in his State might be excluded under the terms of the bill. Neither cotton is excluded nor are any other goods, wares, or merchandise, unless the State into which they are finally sent has a law prohibiting within its borders the manufacture by convicts of the particular article shipped in. Does the Senator from Mississippi know of any State where there is a law that provides that cotton picked by convicts or raised by convicts can not be sold in the market? If there is no such case, then there is no harm in the proposed law, because it will have no effect as to cotton. I submit that suggestion to the Senator in good faith.

Mr. STEPHENS. That is very true. I may say also that there is now no law covering this proposition. If so, there would be no necessity for this bill.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Oh, yes; there are plenty of States that prohibit the sale inside their limits of goods made by convicts.

Mr. STEPHENS. That is very true, but those States are not touched by this bill; otherwise there would be no occasion for the bill.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Oh, yes. The Senator is in error and does not understand me, or I do not understand him, or, perhaps, I am in error.

Mr. STEPHENS. Perhaps we are both in error.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes. There are plenty of States that have laws against the products of convict labor inside their own borders.

Mr. STEPHENS. I understand that.

Mr. REED of Missouri. But having such a law, the State ships its convict-made goods which it can not sell within its own borders into another State that does not have such a law.

Mr. WATSON. And they ship them in mislabeled.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is what this bill is aimed at; that is all it is aimed at. It is to allow the law of a State to govern with reference to goods made outside the State and shipped in the same as it covers goods that are manufactured in the State. There being no State which prohibits the sale of cotton within its borders if it is there produced by convict labor, there will be no State to which this law will apply, and no State will ever pass such a law as that, for no State desiring to employ its own convict labor in the raising of cotton would prohibit that useful occupation and, more than that, no State having use for its convicts in raising cotton would be an importer of cotton; at least, it is fair to presume that the importation would be inconsequential.

I beg of the Senator to bear in mind that, if this bill shall be amended, it will go back to the House and nobody will then be able to tell whether or not we will ever see it again.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let me say in answer to the Senator that I heard him make a very interesting statement yesterday to the effect that he is getting very tired of hearing threats that certain bills might be vetoed by the President. I agreed with him. He argued that we should not hesitate to do our full duty in regard to measures coming before us because of a prospective veto. I ask him why we should fail to do what we think is absolutely right to protect the best interests of our respective States because it may happen that somebody in the other House may later on hold this bill up if it shall be amended?

Mr. REED of Missouri. The cases are not parallel.

Mr. STEPHENS. Perhaps not.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The only fear that I have of the bill not passing the House is the lack of time, because we all know that we are going to adjourn in a few days; and in that respect it is a practical question.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will say to the Senator that the amendment I have in mind will be comparatively immaterial, and I can see no good reason why the amendment should not be adopted by the House and go to conference, where it could be worked out by the conferees.

I am going to be very frank. There only remain about 10 or 12 minutes before adjournment time. As the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] said the other day in regard to another measure, "My heart and my backbone are both very strong." I can talk 10 or 12 minutes longer. As the Senator from Missouri very well said, I am not opposed to the main provisions of this bill, to the general idea of it, to the theory that underlies it, and I am going to suggest to those who are interested in it that, while I am on my feet and while I am retaining the floor, if they want to take the time to write out a very brief amendment along the line I have suggested I shall gladly sit down, if such an amendment can be adopted, and let this bill pass.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Suppose that such an amendment is offered and rejected, what will be the Senator's attitude then?

Mr. STEPHENS. Then a different situation would be presented [laughter], because I am going to protect my State if I can.

Mr. REED of Missouri. There is no use in writing the amendment. I should be glad to write it if that would end it.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. STEPHENS. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. NEELY. With due respect to the able Senator from Mississippi, it is perfectly plain that there is a filibuster on against this bill, and in the remaining 10 minutes it is utterly impossible to pass it. Anybody can talk for 10 minutes, and that is going to be done. Therefore, in the interest of economy, and to avoid the unnecessary waste of the next 10 minutes, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield for that purpose?

Mr. STEPHENS. I have not yielded for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. NEELY. I supposed the Senator would not object to the Senate adjourning, as I understand that his purpose is simply to defeat the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is a unanimous-consent agreement to take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. STEPHENS. Suppose the motion is voted down, where would I be? Somebody else would have the floor.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEPHENS. I resent the insinuation that I am filibustering against the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the motion of the Senator from West Virginia is not in order, in view of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CURTIS. There is no doubt about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not entertain the motion.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one concluding statement?

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes; I will yield for a question.

Mr. HAWES. Just for a statement?

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not yield the floor, however, Mr. President.

Mr. HAWES. No; I understand.

Mr. President, the purpose has been accomplished again. This is the fourth time since 1908 that in the closing sessions of the Senate, without permitting a roll call, a bill of this identical form, or somewhat similar to it, has been defeated by just a few men. There are not 15 Senators here who are opposed to this bill.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. HAWES. If the bill is defeated by a filibuster, the public should know it, and the Senate should know it.

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not yield for a speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. STEPHENS. I resent the insinuation that I am filibustering. I am arguing a legal proposition—a proposition that has been suggested to me by very able lawyers and good citizens of my State. I have a right, of course, to present their views, and to ask the judgment of the Senate upon the expression of views that they have given and that they are now giving through me.

The Senator has just suggested that this bill has been killed several times in the past. This is the first time I have ever said anything about it. It occurs to me that if this is a bill of such importance——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. STEPHENS. If I do not lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will not lose the floor.

PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to introduce a resolution broadening and more clearly defining the authority of the Special Committee on the Investigation of Campaign Expenditures, and ask that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be received and so referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 234) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the powers and duties conferred upon the special committee appointed under Senate Resolution 214 and any subcommittees thereof are hereby extended so as to authorize and require the said committee to continue its investigation under said resolution and said committee is hereby authorized in addition to the authority conferred by Senate Resolution 214 to sit and act during adjournment of Congress and to ascertain all facts in relation to the receipts and expenditures of the several political committees and of party organizations and agencies and other persons, including the amounts contributed, pledged, loaned, or otherwise made available for use, either directly or indirectly, and also the methods of expenditure of said sums, and also the use of any other means or influence, including the promise or use of patronage and of governmental favors, and such other matter as will aid Congress in its further consideration of necessary remedial legislation, and to report to the Senate as soon as possible after the convening of the second session of the Seventieth Congress.

That said committee is further authorized to employ stenographic assistance, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings and proceedings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, and such clerical and other assistance as may be deemed necessary by the committee. The cost of such stenographic, clerical, and other assistance shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers properly approved.

That the appropriation authorized by Senate Resolution 214 shall be considered available in the performance of the further additional duties of the committee hereby conferred, and the further sum of $25,000 is authorized to be appropriated out of the contingent fund of the Senate to carry out the additional purposes hereby conferred.

PRISON-MADE GOODS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7729) to divest goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined by convicts or prisoners of their interstate character in certain cases.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri has suggested that a few men have killed this bill. I am not trying to kill the bill. I am entirely willing that the bill shall pass. I have submitted a simple proposition that the bill shall pass, so far as I am concerned——

Mr. HAWES. What is the Senator's proposition?

Mr. STEPHENS. If an amendment is agreed to that this bill shall not affect agricultural products, specifically cotton, that are produced——

Mr. HAWES. I have asked the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STEPHENS. I yield for a question; yes.

Mr. HAWES. I asked the Senator when he made that statement some time ago if he would put his amendment in written form. Has the Senator done so?

Mr. STEPHENS. The Senator knows I have not; and he knows that I stated at the time that if I would not lose the floor and lose the opportunity to speak again upon this bill I would gladly let somebody else talk; and I suggested then that somebody write the amendment while I am talking, along the line I suggested, that this bill shall not relate to agricultural products. We have about three or four minutes left; that can be done in a minute and a half, and this bill can pass, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that I do not think there is a single Senator here who wants to write that amendment but himself.

Mr. STEPHENS. That may be true, but I want it written, and this bill is not going to pass to-night unless it is written.

Mr. HAWES. The Senator has already killed the bill, anyhow; so what is the use——

Mr. STEPHENS. I deny that. It is not the fact that I want to kill the bill.

Mr. HAWES. The Senator has done it.

Mr. STEPHENS. I may have done it, because the Senator from Missouri is unwilling to give the protection to my State that many good people down there think the State deserves. If he is willing to give that protection, then the bill can pass to-night. Otherwise it can not.

Mr. HAWES. The Senator knows perfectly well that the bill can not pass to-night. I can not write an amendment to suit Mississippi. No other man wants to write that amendment but the Senator; and I have asked him to write his amendment and submit it, so that we can understand it.

Mr. STEPHENS. The Senator from Missouri is simply helping to kill time. He is killing more time right now than I am. I said to him that all I wanted was a provision that this bill shall not apply to agricultural products. Put that in the bill in 4, 5, or 6 words, and he can have his bill passed so far as I am concerned.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STEPHENS. I do.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If the Senator will write that amendment himself, I will agree to hold the floor so that no vote will be taken until he gets through writing it, provided he gets through before half past 10.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the Senator speak until half past 10 if I do not get the amendment written?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes; I will speak that long.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then I shall have the floor later so that I can present my amendment? Very well.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I asked a question or two here——

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to introduce a bill?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Oh, certainly. Anybody can interrupt me.

Mr. BRUCE. I suppose the Senator will accord me even more than a moment?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I will.

JENNIE BRUCE GALLAHAN

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I desire to introduce a bill, and I should like to have it referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, because a similar bill has been considered by the Committee on Claims of the Senate, and it was not favored by that committee. Afterward, the same bill was introduced in the House, and has been passed by the House. It has now gotten over here. It is in connection with that that I wish to reintroduce the bill into the Senate, and have it referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, because, obviously, it would not be proper to refer it to the Senate Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so referred.

The bill (S. 4489) for the relief of Jennie Bruce Gallahan was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Has the Senator any other observations he would like to make? If so, I shall be glad to yield to him.

Mr. BRUCE. My fertility of resource is very limited.

PRISON-MADE GOODS

The Senate, as in Commitee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7729) to divest goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined by convicts or prisoners of their interstate character in certain cases.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, seriously, it seems to me we have been caviling here all this evening about an immaterial matter. This bill does nothing in the world but give to each State the right to control goods shipped in from abroad that are made by convicts in the same way that they control goods made in their own States.

It simply gives the States jurisdiction, within their own borders, over goods that are shipped in, the same as they have over the goods there manufactured. That being the case, and there being no State that prohibits the shipping in of cotton of the character referred to by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, there is no danger whatever in this bill to his State, no matter what construction may be put upon the first part or the descriptive clauses of the bill.

I hope the Senator will see the matter in that light, and that by the time we meet here again he will be prepared to let this bill go through without amendment; because, if the bill is amended, while I believe the House of Representatives would accept any reasonable amendment to it if it had time to get action on the bill, the fact remains that Congress will adjourn in a few days, and the bill is liable to be crowded out.

Now, Mr. President, I have kept faith with the Senator. Has the Senator the amendment prepared?

Mr. STEPHENS. I have the amendment; yes, sir.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Very well; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, the Senator was kind enough to say, some moments ago, that I was not opposed to the theory of this bill, and he is correct in that.

It has been argued that an amendment would kill the bill. I do not think so. I have been very busy about a good many other matters, and I have not had an opportunity to investigate——

RECESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 10.30 o'clock having arrived, the Senate, under the order previously entered, will stand in recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Thereupon (at 10.30 o'clock p. m.) the Senate, under the previous order, took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, May 18, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, May 17, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We would say, Still! still! with Thee O Father of mercies! The hand that holds the earth, the sky, and the sea is the same that holds all earthly children in its palm. This new day finds us unafraid, and may we come to it with renewed vigor. Keep before us life's richest vocation and heaven's highest attainment. On the altars of our hearts make steadfast the sacred lights of faith, hope, and charity, and may they burn there with a quenchless flame. O let Thy blessing, so abundant, so free, and so divine, abide with all who are associated with this Chamber. Be with our families and all our earthly loves. In that solemn, silent moment when earth and time yield to heaven and eternity, may the golden light break from behind the everlasting hills. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BATTLE OF KETTLE CREEK

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, last week I obtained consent to extend my remarks on H. R. 9965 in reference to the Kettle Creek battle field, in Wilkes County, Ga. I want to insert some extracts from three or four histories and a part of the report, but I did not get permission to do so. Under the rule recently announced by the Speaker I now ask that permission.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to add to his remarks certain extracts from historical works. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent of the House of Representatives to extend my remarks on House bill 9965, a bill to erect a tablet or marker to mark the site of the Battle of Kettle Creek, in Wilkes County, Ga., where on February 14, 1779, Elijah Clarke, of Georgia, and Colonel Pickens, of South Carolina, overtook the Tories under Colonel Boyd, a British soldier, killing him and many of his followers, thus ending British dominion in Georgia, I submit the following information regarding the Battle of Kettle Creek. This narrative of facts is taken from different histories that have dealt with this Revolutionary battle, viz: The Georgia Historical Quarterly, published by the Georgia Historical Society, volume 10, 1926, Otis Ashemore and Charles H. Olmstead being the authors of the articles on the Kettle Creek Battle; McCall's History of Georgia; History of South Carolina, 1858, by Ramsey; History of North Carolina, 1908, by Ashemore; Story of Georgia, 1900, by Jones.

Messrs. Ashemore and Olmstead, in dealing with the Battles of Kettle Creek and Brier Creek, say:

Many of the battles of the Revolution fought on southern soil are involved in much obscurity, and Time's effacing fingers are rapidly consigning to oblivion the remaining fragments of the past. The South has been far too neglectful in recording and preserving its history.

The special story of the South during the Revolution has been told by several well-known historians. In general they all agree on the important points about the Battle of Kettle Creek.

Colonel Boyd was an Irishman by birth, but lived in South Carolina. He was a bold, notorious, and dishonest Tory, who was bribed by Sir Henry Clinton to raise an insurrection in the back country of South Carolina as soon as the British captured Savannah. His followers were thieves, robbers, and murderers. He tried to make a junction with the notorious McGirth, but was killed at the Battle of Kettle Creek.

From all the reports that come to us from the Revolutionary days we can well understand that the force which had gone raging through South Carolina was worthy of the reputation borne by its leader, Boyd. Lossing, in his Field Book of the Revolution, speaks of them as—bandits and murderers. Wherever they went through the Palmetto State they left a broad track of blood and pillage. No man's life was safe from their murderous weapons, be he soldier or simple farmer citizen. The virtue of no woman could be guarded from their treacherous brutality. No humble cottage escaped their flaming torches.

And now these bandits were coming across the Savannah River into Georgia to continue the nameless horrors begun in Carolina. Wherever a southern soldier breathed there was a fixed resolution that Boyd's band must be wiped out, and that speedily.

Gen. Elijah Clarke was born in North Carolina, and in 1744 he moved to Wilkes County, Ga. He took a prominent part in the skirmishes with the Indians. He commanded the left wing of the American forces at the Battle of Kettle Creek, and contributed largely to the great victory over the Tories under Boyd at that place. He was at the sieges of Savannah and Augusta. He was a brave and patriotic "diamond in the rough," with an interesting career. He died January 15, 1799, and was buried in Lincoln County, Ga. His will is on record at Lincolnton.

In his History of Georgia, Charles C. Jones, jr., gives the following description of the Battle of Kettle Creek:

Retiring from Carrs Fort the Americans recrossed the Savannah River near Fort Charlotte and advanced toward the Long Cane settlement to meet Colonel Boyd. Hearing of his advance, Capt. Robert Anderson, of Colonel Pickens's regiment, summoning to his aid, Capts. Joseph Pickens, William Baskin, and John Miller, with their companies crossed the Savannah River with a view to annoying Boyd when he should attempt the passage of that stream. He was subsequently joined by some Georgians under Capt. James Little. Retreating rapidly, Captain Anderson formed a junction with Colonels Pickens and Dooly and united in the pursuit of the enemy. On the 12th of February, passing the Savannah River at the Cedar shoal, the Americans advanced to the Fish Dam ford, on Broad River. The command had now been reinforced by Colonel Clarke and 100 dragoons. Captain Neal with a part of observation, was detached to hang upon the enemy's rear, and, by frequent couriers, keep the main body well advised of Boyd's movements.

Shaping his course to the westward, and purposing a junction with McGirth at a point agreed upon on Little River, the enemy on the morning of the 13th crossed Broad River, near the fork, at a place subsequently known as Webbs Ferry. Informed of this movement, the Americans passed over Broad River and encamped for the night on Clarkes Creek, within 4 miles of the loyalists. Early on the morning of the 14th the Americans advanced rapidly but cautiously. Wherever the surface of the country permitted, their line of march was the order of battle. A strong vanguard moved 150 paces in front. The right and left wings, consisting each of 100 men, were commanded, respectively, by Colonels Dooly and Clarke. The center, numbering 200 men, was led by Colonel Pickens. Officers and men were eager for the fray and confident of victory. Soon the ground was reached where the enemy had encamped during the preceding night.

Seemingly unconscious of the approach of danger, the loyalist commander had halted at a farm on the north side of Kettle Creek and turned out his horses to forage among the reeds which lined the edge of the swamp. His men, who had been on short allowance for three days, were slaughtering bullocks and parching corn. Colonel Boyd's second officer was Lieutenant Colonel Moore, of North Carolina, who is said to have been deficient both in courage and in military skill. The third in command, Major Spurgen, was brave and competent.

As Colonel Pickens neared the enemy Captain McCall was ordered to reconnoiter his position and, unperceived, to acquire the fullest possible information of the status of affairs. Having completed his observations, that officer reported the encampment formed at the edge of the farm near the creek on an open piece of ground flanked on two sides by a cane swamp, and that the enemy was apparently in utter ignorance of any hostile approach. The Americans then advanced to the attack. As they neared the camp the pickets fired and retreated. Hastily forming his line in rear of his encampment and availing himself of the shelter afforded by a fence and some fallen timber, Boyd prepared to repel the assault. Colonel Pickens, commanding the American center, obliqued a little to the right to take advantage of more commanding ground. The right and left divisions were somewhat embarrassed in forcing their way through the cane, but soon came gallantly into position. Colonel Boyd defended the fence with great bravery but was finally overpowered and driven back upon the main body. While retreating he fell mortally wounded, pierced with three balls, two passing through his body and the third through his thigh.

The conflict now became close, warm, and general. Some of the enemy, sore pressed, fled into the swamp and passed over the creek, leaving their horses, baggage, and arms behind them.

After a contest lasting an hour the Tories retreated through the swamp. Observing a rising ground on the other side of the creek and in rear of the enemy's right, on which he thought the loyalists would attempt to form, Colonel Clarke, ordering the left wing to follow him, prepared to cross the stream. At this moment his horse was killed under him. Mounting another, he followed a path which led to a ford and soon gained the side of the hill, just in time to attack Major Spurgen, who was endeavoring to form his command upon it. He was then accompanied by not more than a fourth of his division, there having been some mistake in extending the order.

The firing, however, soon attracted the attention of the rest of his men, who rushed to his support. Colonels Pickens and Dooly also pressed through the swamp, and the battle was renewed with much vigor on the other side of the creek. Bloody and obstinate was the conflict. For some time the issue seemed doubtful. At length the Americans obtained complete possession of the hill; and the enemy, routed at all points, fled from the scene of action, leaving 70 of their number dead upon the field and 75 wounded and captured. On the part of the Americans 9 were slain and 23 wounded. To Colonel Clarke great praise is due for his foresight and activity in comprehending the checking, at its earliest stage, the movement of the loyalists beyond the swamp. Had they succeeded in effecting a permanent lodgment upon the hill, the fortunes of the day would have proved far otherwise. This engagement lasted for 1 hour and 45 minutes, and during most of that time was hotly contested.

As the guard having charge of the prisoners captured when Boyd crossed the Savannah River heard of the disaster which had overtaken the main body, they voluntarily surrendered themselves, 33 in number, to those whom they held in captivity, promising, if allowed to return in peace to their homes, to take the oath of allegiance to the government of the Confederate States.

The battle ended, Colonel Pickens waited upon Colonel Boyd and tendered him every relief in his power. Thanking him for his civility, the loyalist chief, disabled by mortal wounds and yet brave of heart, inquired particularly with regard to the result of the engagement. When told that the victory rested entirely with the Americans, he asserted that the issue would have been different had he not fallen. During the conversation which ensued he stated that he had set out upon his march with 800 men. In crossing the Savannah River he sustained a loss of 100 in killed, wounded, and missing. In the present action he had 700 men under his command. His expectation was that McGirth with 500 men would form a junction with him on Little River either that very afternoon or on the ensuing morning. The point named for this union of forces was not more than 6 miles distant from the place where this battle had been fought. Alluding to his own condition he remarked that he had but a few hours to live and requested Colonel Pickens to detail two men to furnish him with water and to inter his body after death.

When this Briton was in his last hours he gave his watch and other valuables to General Pickens to be sent to his wife. This the chivalric Irishman did. Years after, when Mrs. Boyd died, she bequeathed that watch to the family of General Pickens, and they have it now.

The Kettle Creek battle field is easily accessible from any point, being located 1 mile from the leading public road of Wilkes County. This road will be put in first-class condition by the commissioner of roads and revenues of Wilkes County. The battle field is 9 miles southwest from Washington, Ga., and 5 miles from Federal route No. 78 at one point and 9 miles at another point. Route 78 is from Augusta to Washington, Athens, Atlanta, all Georgia points, on to the Alabama line.

The Kettle Creek Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, will deed to the Government to carry out this proposition 12 acres of the Kettle Creek battle ground. Part, at least, of this battle field is in the original oak woods that were there the day this battle was fought 149 years ago.

ROBT. G. SIMMONS,
WM. P. HOLADAY,
ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the conference report be agreed to; and, pending that motion, I desire to state to the House that the report we have here, with one exception, will be an agreement with the Senate. It is the result of several conferences. The Senate has receded over one-half million dollars in their amendments, and we are below the Budget by $67,000.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman explain what arrangement was made about the school children, and also the appropriation for the extension of Sixteenth Street of $134,000?

Mr. SIMMONS. I expect to move to concur in the Senate proposal on the school proposition and the paving of Sixteenth Street is to be carried to Kalmia Road this year.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he will yield me five minutes.

Mr. SIMMONS. We are not going to discuss that question. I move the previous question on the conference report, Mr. Speaker.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 1: Page 1, after the enacting clause, strike out all of lines 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 on page 1 and all of lines 1 to 10, inclusive, on page 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That in order to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, 40 per cent of each of the following sums, except those herein directed to be paid otherwise, is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and all of the remainder out of the combined revenues of the District of Columbia, and the tax rate in effect in the fiscal year 1928 on real estate and tangible personal property subject to taxation in the District of Columbia shall be continued for the fiscal year 1929, namely."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, this is the fiscal relations paragraph. The Senate amendment to the House bill substitutes 60–40 in lieu of the $9,000,000 that heretofore the Congress has carried in this bill for a number of years. On this I expect to ask for a roll call. I move now that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1, and on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. On that I ask the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 288, nays 55, not voting 87, as follows:

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I think I shall have to object. The House leaders on both sides are desirous of expediting this matter.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, the vote has been taken, but I assert that the matter was presented to the House in such a way that the Members were not made acquainted with the actual situation. The Senate did not refuse to recede from the 60–40 proposition but made the offer of one-third to two-thirds and desired that proposition be submitted to the House. One of the Senate conferees even agreed to accept as low as 27 per cent as against 73 per cent. The question is not one of mere dollars and cents but rather a struggle to attain some formula of contribution instead of the hard and inflexible flat sum.

Not having time allowed me on the question, I refer to the extension of remarks, which I prepared and printed in the RECORD of April 20.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 36: Page 48, after line 21, insert "The children of officers and men of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and children of other employees of the United States stationed outside the District of Columbia shall be admitted to the public schools without payment of tuition."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment 46: Page 61 of the bill, after line 7, insert:

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to dispose of, by public or private sale in their discretion, the site acquired for an engine house at Sixteenth and Webster Streets NW., and the proceeds thereof shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia, and the said commissioners are authorized to acquire another site in the vicinity of Sixteenth Street and Piney Branch Road NW., and the sum of $35,000 is hereby appropriated for this purpose: Provided, That the commissioners are authorized, in their discretion, to locate the said engine house on land now owned by the District of Columbia, in lieu of purchasing another site therefor: Provided further, That the unexpended balances of appropriations made in previous acts for house, site, furniture and furnishings, etc., for a new engine company in the vicinity of Sixteenth Street and Piney Branch Road NW., are hereby continued and made available for expenditure for such purposes during the fiscal year 1929."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur with an amendment, as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to sell the property at the corner of Sixteenth and Webster Streets, heretofore acquired for a fire-engine house site at public or private sale at not less than the purchase price paid therefor by the District of Columbia and pay the proceeds thereof into the Treasury of the United States, to the credit of the District of Columbia; and the commissioners are hereby authorized and directed to erect a fire-engine house, with furniture and furnishings for a fire-engine company, at the northwest corner of Sixteenth Street and Colorado Avenue, on property belonging to the United States, and there is hereby set aside for such purpose a plot of ground running north from the junction of Sixteenth Street and Colorado Avenue, as now publicly owned, 100 feet on Sixteenth Street; thence west at right angles to the street 160 feet; thence south at right angles to the line of Colorado Avenue. The balance of the appropriations carried in the acts of May 10, 1926, and March 2, 1927, for an engine house in the vicinity of Sixteenth Street and Piney Branch Road NW., is made available for the purpose aforesaid."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 56: Page 74 of the bill, after line 2, insert: "For the maintenance, under the jurisdiction of the Board of Public Welfare, of a suitable place for the reception and detention of children under 17 years of age arrested by the police on charge of offense against any laws in force in the District of Columbia, or committed to the guardianship of the board, or held as witnesses, or held temporarily, or pending hearing, or otherwise, including transportation, purchase of one passenger-carrying motor vehicle at a cost not to exceed $750, operation and maintenance of motor vehicles, food, clothing, medicine and medical supplies, rental and repair and upkeep of buildings, fuel, gas, electricity, ice, supplies and equipment, and other necessary expenses, including personal services in accordance with the classification act of 1923, $25,000, to be immediately available: Provided, That such portion as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may determine of the appropriation of $25,000 for rent, under the heading 'Contingent and miscellaneous expenses, District of Columbia,' contained in the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1928, shall be available for the purposes of this paragraph."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words, "For the maintenance, under the jurisdiction of the Board of Public Welfare, of a suitable place," insert the following: "in a building entirely separate and apart from the House of Detention."

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

Senate amendment No. 57, page 78, after line 12 insert the following:

"Working capital: To provide working capital for industrial enterprises at the workhouse and the reformatory, the commissioners shall transfer to a fund, to be known as the working-capital fund, such amounts appropriated herein for the workhouse and reformatory, not to exceed $50,000, as are available for industrial work at these institutions. The various departments and institutions of the District of Columbia and the Federal Government may purchase, at fair market prices, as determined by the commissioners, such industrial or farm products as meet their requirements. Receipts from the sale of such products shall be deposited to the credit of said working-capital fund, and the said fund, including all receipts credited thereto, may be used as a revolving fund during the fiscal year 1929. This fund shall be available for the purchase and repair of machinery and equipment, for the purchase of raw materials and manufacturing supplies, for personal services in accordance with the classification act of 1923, and for the payment to the inmates or their dependents of such pecuniary earnings as the commissioners may deem proper. The commissioners shall include in their annual report to Congress a detailed report of the receipts and expenditures on account of said working-capital fund."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment, insert "$25,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I call up a conference report on H. R. 10159, an act granting pensions and increase of pensions to widows and former widows of certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the conference report.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10159) entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to widows and former widows of certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 1.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2 and agree to the same.

W. T. FITZGERALD,
R. N. ELLIOTT,
E. M. BEERS,
MELL G. UNDERWOOD,
RALPH F. LOZIER,
Managers on the part of the House.

PETER NORBECK,
PORTER H. DALE,
DANIEL F. STECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 10159) granting pensions and increase of pensions to widows and former widows of certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and embodied in the accompanying conference report as to each such amendments, namely:

On No. 1: The amendment of the Senate provides that widows shall be eligible to receive the pension provided for in said act when they arrive at the age of 72 years instead of 75. The bill as it passed the House would grant increases of pension to approximately 90,000 widows and would entail an additional cost on the Government of $10,800,000 for the first year. The amendment of the Senate would bring in approximately 32,320 more widows at this time, making an additional annual cost of $3,878,400, but inasmuch as the amendment of the Senate was seriously endangering the passage of any bill the conferees unanimously agreed to leave the age limit at 75 years. All of the widows who are now drawing $30 per month under existing general law as fast as they arrive at the age of 75 years will be entitled to the benefits of this act.

On No. 2: The amendment provides that the pensions shall begin on the fourth day of the month next after the approval of this act instead of the fourth day of the next month after the approval of the same.

W. T. FITZGERALD,
R. N. ELLIOTT,
E. M. BEERS,
MELL G. UNDERWOOD,
RALPH F. LOZIER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 13511) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, with Senate amendments, and agree to Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

AIRCRAFT PROCUREMENT BOARD

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill (H. R. 471) relating to the Aircraft Procurement Board.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, during the Sixty-ninth Congress the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] introduced a bill providing for the establishment of an Aircraft Procurement Board, to consist of an Assistant Secretary of War, an Assistant Secretary of the Navy, an Assistant Secretary of Commerce, an Assistant Postmaster General, the Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, and the Chief of the Air Corps. Those officials represent the executive departments of our Government interested in the development of aviation and vitally concerned with the problem of aircraft procurement.

Mr. VINSON'S bill was the result of painstaking and diligent study on his part and was recognized by those best informed on this subject as a valuable and constructive measure, the enactment of which would mean much to the development of Government aeronautics and at the same time make aircraft procurement more economical and efficient.

In the last days of the Congress it passed the House, but, unfortunately for our Government, this important bill did not become a law in the Sixty-ninth Congress. However, on January 16 of this year the House by unanimous consent passed the bill, H. R. 471. It has not yet passed the Senate. Too much valuable time has already been lost. It means a great deal to the Air Service and also to the American taxpayers. It is earnestly hoped that this much-needed legislation will be enacted before the adjournment of the present session.

It has attracted wide attention in circles interested in aircraft development, as is evidenced by an interesting article by Mr. Frank A. Tichenor in the February, 1928, issue of the Aero Digest, published at New York City. That article, laudatory of both Mr. VINSON and his bill, is worthy of quotation, and under the leave granted me I include the following excerpt from it:

A CONSTRUCTIVE BILL

It is an agreeable change to turn from Mr. Wilbur to the Hon. FRED M. VINSON, Member of Congress from the ninth Kentucky district. He does not come to the floor of the House with any demand for millions to be spent on useless steel flotillas that would be transformed into "sunkotillas" by the judicious application of a few small bombs. Instead he appears bearing in his strong right hand House bill 471, to provide for an aircraft procurement board.

That might go a long way toward assuring for the various services the best aircraft that can be built in the United States, and, by coordination, would do away with a lot of useless effort. The board is to be intrusted with the procurement of all aircraft purchased by the Government, naval, military, and commercial. This board will be a good thing for the Government.

In originating and fighting for this bill Congressman VINSON offers the country a plan calculated to eliminate waste and assure suitable planes for every department. By assuring all of the air services the very best equipment his plan will achieve another useful, needful service.

It passed the House on January 16, and doubtless will pass the Senate. Howard Coffin, who was active in aircraft procurement during the war and a member of the President's aircraft board, stated in a letter to Congressman VINSON:

"I have read with much interest your speech on the floor in favor of the proposal for the establishment of an aircraft procurement board to consist of the Assistant Secretaries of the War, Navy, Commerce, and Post Office Departments.

"I should say that one of the greatest difficulties of the past, both during and since the war, has been the fact that there has not previously been lodged in any one place of high authority a definite executive responsibility for the handling of aviation affairs. This has been peculiarly true with regard to the procurement of aeronautical material. This has been one of the main causes of the inability of Congress to obtain dependable information and for the distrust and misunderstandings thereby engendered. * * * These activities have, during the past several years, certainly had a destructive effect upon the progress of the art in this country, and greatly delayed the passage of constructive legislation. The creation of this board of Assistant Secretaries, whose job it is to devote their attention to the subject of aviation, will go a long way to offset these abuses and will provide the Congress with a definite and authoritative point of contact with all phases of aviation, both governmental and civil.

"It's a fine job. Good luck to you."

Mr. VINSON deserves the thanks of the whole aircraft industry for having devised this highly progressive and constructive measure, which will bring into closer cooperation those branches of the Government which purchase in this field, thereby not only assuring economical use of money, but exercising a good influence in various directions.

DEVELOPMENT OF INLAND WATERWAYS

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further discussion of the bill H. R. 13512.

Mr. TILSON. Before that motion is put, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman as to the time that will be required to finish consideration of the bill. Is there any disposition to prolong the consideration of this bill?

Mr. PARKER. I will say that when the House adjourned on Tuesday evening we had this bill under consideration. The bill had been debated at length, it had been read, and the men in charge of the bill were doing everything they could to expedite the passage of the legislation. I will assure the gentleman that everything will be done to take as little time as possible.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On any amendments that are to be offered the gentleman can move to close debate. I have heard no substantial opposition to the bill.

Mr. PARKER. In answer to the gentleman, I will say that that was the very thing that was done, that was the motion I made when a point of no quorum was raised. I was endeavoring to do what the gentleman suggests.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman state if, in his judgment, it may be finished within a half hour?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. If it is not, will the gentleman be willing to have the committee rise at that time?

Mr. PARKER. With the House thoroughly understanding my position I will make that agreement. That is, if it is not finished in half an hour, I agree to move that the committee rise, but I want it thoroughly understood that I am doing this because I have to do it.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Half an hour is too limited a time. Say, 45 minutes.

Mr. TILSON. There is no request or demand for time for debate upon the subject, as I understand.

SPECIAL ORDER—THE "S-4" DISASTER

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] to withhold his motion for 10 minutes in order that he may recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] for 10 minutes, under the special order.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, this is a busy, practical, cold world. The kindlier emotions of mankind may be aroused at times in the face of some great calamity, but after a few days or weeks we forget the tragic happenings and go about our business. We forget the sorrow, the suffering of the bereaved. We forget not only the event but the lessons of the event. I am not complaining about this. It is a truism which all the world admits. Occasionally busy men forget their cares and responsibilities and do give thought to these delicate, kindly sentiments which actuate the human heart. Then they go through certain forms of memorials. They stand demurely and bow their heads in prayer and give all the appearance of interest and sympathy.

Even though the world should forget, I submit it is a violation of our duty to ignore an event such as that which occurred on December 17 last, just five months ago to-day, when the S-4 went down with all hands. Let us go back a moment to those thrilling days when all were hoping and praying for prompt rescue. Everyone said that such an event would never take place again, that there were certain lessons to be learned from the disaster, and that we were going to profit by those lessons.

Even the President of the United States was aroused sufficiently to send a special message to this House on January 7, and a resolution (H. J. Res. 131) was presented by our dear friend and colleague, Mr. BUTLER, of Pennsylvania, in which he called for an investigation of the disaster. This resolution had two features: One directed toward the investigation of safety devices and appliances, and the other covering an investigation of the causes of the disaster. The resolution passed the House on January 7 and went over to the Senate. The Senate was willing to permit an inquiry into the question of safety devices, but felt that the investigation of the causes of the disaster ought to be made by Congress itself.

The resolution therefore was amended so as to provide for the appointment of a joint congressional committee to take up the two phases of the question: The study of safety appliances and the study of the facts. The Senate passed that amended resolution on January 30. The conferees met and disagreed. I ask in all fairness, in the name of the men who are dead, who perished under such horrifying circumstances, are we going to laugh at this tragedy, are we going to ignore their suffering and that of their families?

It is a travesty upon parliamentary procedure that it seems to be possible for conferees to hold up indefinitely a resolution of this character. I know that I would not venture, if I were one of the conferees, to put the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Navy in the awkward situation of being charged with hypocrisy and lack of sincerity when that message was read in all solemnity to this House asking for this commission to be appointed.

The Senate is now proceeding with an investigation of the facts upon its own accord. There is no excuse whatever for the conferees failing to get together. The Senate, I am satisfied, would be willing to recede on the proposal to have the commission or any joint committee study the facts. The Senate is doing that itself. I am satisfied that if the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the conferees on the part of the House, would revive his interest in the matter once again the Senate would recede and that that resolution to study preventive measures could be passed before we adjourn.

The S–4 disaster has aroused the people of the United States as no other tragedy has ever before. I have letters from hundreds of people from all over the United States, and even from Europe and Australia, bearing upon this tragedy; and what a pitiable picture we present to the world if this legislative body fails to do something to recognized the necessity for providing for the safety of the brave men who man our submarines.

In addition to the letters that I have received in protest against the occurrence and even recurrence of these disasters, I have hundreds of suggestions for safety appliances. They are waiting to go before the commission which everyone expects is to be appointed. Captain Filene, of the Navy Department, tells me that he has nearly 2,000 suggestions waiting for study and examination. Some of them may be meritorious and others, of course, will prove to have no merit at all; but they are waiting the action of this House, because the Navy does not want to proceed with an investigation upon their own account and leave it open to the charge of bias. They want to preclude all criticism.

In passing the Butler resolution you will not only assent to the will of the President and the Secretary of the Navy, who, I believe, are sincere, but you will have accomplished something to justify our position before the world.

I am thinking of those unhappy youths tapping out their own requiem in the chambers of the submerged submarine—tap, tap, tap—waiting for relief, waiting with torturing anxiety amidst the fumes which rose from the batteries in the vessel, and which slowly choked them to death. [Applause.]

Under the leave to extend I herewith append the results of a questionnaire I addressed to our naval attachés at Berlin, London, Paris, and Rome.

SUBMARINE SAFETY AND SALVAGE DEVICES USED OR NOT USED IN FOREIGN NAVIES

Shortly after the sinking of the S–4, I prepared a questionnaire for the purpose of ascertaining the extent to which safety and salvage devices were in use in foreign navies.

Through the good offices of our Department of State the questionnaire was forwarded to our naval attachés at Berlin, London, Paris, and Rome.

The questions (nine in number), with the answers, are as follows:

Mr. GRIFFIN, Representative in Congress from New York, desires the following information respecting safety devices and salvage appliances in foreign navies:

(1) Whether grappling rings, eyelets, or shackles are attached to the hulls of submarines to facilitate their prompt raising.

(2) Whether or not a form of telephone signal buoy is in use which may be released in case of accident, and by which communication may be had with the crew.

(3) Whether or not salvage air inlets are provided for each compartment of the submarine, or whether there is one salvage inlet communicating to the receptive compartments (as seems to have been the condition in the S–4 type of vessel).

(4) Whether or not diving chambers by which the crew can escape are provided.

(5) Whether or not submarines are provided with releasable rafts, boats, or chambers by which the crew can escape.

(6) Whether or not a diving helmet, or diving apparatus, known as the Draeger diving-rescuer, or any similar device is adopted.

(7) Whether or not there is at the present time, or in contemplation, salvage vessels of the Catamaran, type by means of which a submarine can be lifted from the bottom.

(8) If such vessels are in commission, please state their tonnage, their length, and their lifting capacity.

(9) It will be appreciated if you will mention any instance when, and the circumstances under which, such vessels were put to use, and whether they proved effective, giving the tonnage and the net lift or weight of the vessels involved.

GERMAN

BERLIN, March 20, 1928.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington.

SIR: Adverting to the department's instruction No. 2047, dated February 28, 1928, I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of a self-explanatory letter, dated March 16, 1928, received from the naval attaché, setting forth answers to the several questions propounded in a questionnaire regarding safety devices and salvage appliances in use in foreign navies, addressed to the department by the Hon. ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

JACOB GOULD SCHURMAN.

(Inclosure: 1. Letter of naval attaché.)

OFFICE OF THE NAVAL ATTACHÉ,
Berlin, Tiergartenstrasse 30, March 16, 1928.

From: The naval attaché, Berlin.
To: The counselor of embassy, Berlin.
Subject: Information requested by the Hon. ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN.
Reference: (a) Embassy letter of March 12, 1928.

Please refer to your letter of March 12, 1928, with two inclosures relative to the salvaging appliances in the German Navy. I will take the questions one at a time in order to avoid confusion.

1. In peace times grappling rings, eyelets, or shackles were attached to the hulls of most of the submarines. During the war they were removed from many on account of the additional weight.

2. Such buoys were employed on the submarines in peace times and were part of the normal installation. During the war they were firmly secured so as to prevent their becoming loose and thus disclosing the position of the submarine to an enemy ship.

3. Air inlets could not be installed for each compartment of the submarine, but on the later submarines there was an air inlet in the forward compartment, the midship compartment, and the after compartment, all well separated. These air inlets had cocks which could be operated both from the interior and the exterior of the hull.

4. An air chamber was provided in the larger submarines, but they were not used in any salvaging operations. The loss of space entailed by the installation of such a diving chamber restricted their number to one for the larger submarines.

5. No.

6. Yes, one for each member of the crew, distributed proportionately in the compartments to the number of men normally in that compartment.

7. Before the war the Vulkan was built and was used during the war. The Cyclops was not completed until 1918. After the war the Vulkan was sunk and the Cyclops was turned over to England. These vessels were especially built for submarine-salvaging work.

8. A description of these vessels can be obtained from Jane's Fighting Ships, 1914 or 1915. The Vulkan was approximately 2,000 tons' displacement, and lifting capacity of about 500 tons. The Cyclops was about 2,800 tons' displacement, with lifting capacity of 1,200 tons. A copy of Jane's Fighting Ships with a description of these vessels may be had from the Navy Department in Washington.

9. During the war the Vulkan salvaged six sunken submarines from varied depths from 11 to 30 meters. In none of the operations were any of the crew saved through the operations of the Vulkan. Most of the installations for attaching salvaging devices had been removed from the submarines in order to save weight, and it was therefore necessary for the divers from the Vulkan to pass slings around the hull. After the submarine was located and operations possible by divers it was possible to lift the submarine in nine hours and less. The success of operations from the Vulkan depended upon the ability of the divers to locate the wreck and to commence salvaging operations. The time lost in locating the wreck and passing the slings was always too long to enable the submarine to be raised in time to save any of the personnel. On December 7, 1917, submarine B–8 was sunk in the Baltic Sea in 30 meters of water under conditions almost identical with those obtaining when the S–4 was sunk. The sea was heavy and wind was force 9. It was impossible for the divers to operate, and no salvaging operations were possible until the weather moderated. By this time all the personnel of the submarine had perished.

LONDON, March 29, 1928.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to refer to the department's instruction No. 1315, February 29, 1928, regarding safety devices and salvage appliances in use in foreign navies, and to state that the questionnaire contained therein was promptly referred by the naval attaché to the appropriate authorities of the admiralty, and a reply, dated March 26, 1928, has been received, of which the pertinent portion is quoted, as follows:

"I beg to inform you that as regards question 3 a salvage air inlet (or, as it is termed, divers' connection) is fitted to each main compartment of the submarine. Each inlet is independent of the rest and supplies air only into the compartment in which it is fitted.

"The answers to all the other questions are in the negative."

I have the honor to be, sir,

Your obedient servant for the ambassador,

RAY ATHERTON,
Counselor of Embassy.

FRENCH

VARIOUS INFORMATION ON THE DEVICES ADOPTED BY THE FRENCH NAVY FOR SUBMARINE SALVAGING

1. The French Navy no longer uses grappling rings, eyelets, or shackles attached to the hull of submarines for lifting purposes.

2. The French Navy uses a telephone buoy which can be released from the interior of the submarine.

3. In each compartment there exists an air inlet.

4. No submarine is provided with a diving chamber.

5. Submarines have folding lifeboats that are placed on the bridge (Berton system).

6. Submarines are provided with an automatic diving apparatus (Boutan type).

7, 8, 9. There exists 3 lifting docks with cables, the characteristics of which are the following:

Length.....meters..	100	70	98
Displacement.....tons..	2,000	1,500	2,300
Lifting capacity.....do....	550	700	1,000

Up to the present time the dock at Cherbourg (700 tons) has been used only once, to lift the Gustave Zedé (850 tons), which had sunk, no crew being on board, in one of the basins of Cherbourg.

The construction of other salvage vessels is not contemplated.

ITALIAN

1. The new submarines will be equipped with grappling rings to which can be applied a lifting force equal to 35 per cent of surface displacement of the submarine.

2. All submarines of new construction will have two telephone signal buoys, one at the bow and the other at the stern. The buoys will be supplied with telephone, an apparatus for luminous signals, and a salvage air inlet.

3. Submarines in construction will have a salvage air inlet with outside connections for use of the divers which can furnish air from the exterior into the internal compartments of the submarine.

4. Submarines now building will have two exit locks for the eventual escape of the crew, one at the bow and the other at the stern; the turret will be so constructed as to serve also as an exit lock.

5. Detachable cabins (Cavallini and Belloni type) were devised several years ago for the escape of the crew and experiments were made; these cabins, however, have never been applied for reasons of encumbrance and of weight.

6. It is not contemplated to assign a diving apparatus to each man for the time being.

7. The Royal Navy does not possess salvage vessels of the double-hull or catamaran type.

8. No salvage vessels have been ordered.

9. The only salvage vessel owned by the Royal Navy is the pontoon Anteo, capable of lifting 400 tons. It was used only during the war for raising at Taranto a sunken Austrian mine-laying submarine. There has been no further occasion of employing it.

As showing the interest in safeguarding the lives of the crews of submarines, I append also the names and addresses of persons who have submitted plans and suggestions:

INLAND WATERWAYS CORPORATION

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13512.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13512. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FROTHINGHAM] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13512, with Mr. FROTHINGHAM in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13512, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13512) to amend the act entitled "An act to create the Inland Waterways Corporation for the purpose of carrying out the mandate and purpose of Congress, as expressed in sections 201 and 500 of the transportation act, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1924.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose the other day an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] was pending. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TREADWAY: Page 3, line 24, strike out all of paragraph (c).

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have been a member of this committee for five years and can not recall of having asked for 10 minutes upon a transportation bill before. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has persistently refused to report any important railroad legislation. We are strong for bridges and lighthouse bills.

Perhaps the committee's policy was announced to me by its former chairman when I first became a member, and I asked him if the committee would not consider bills to correct our transportation laws. The chairman's reply was, "This committee considers only what the President tells us to consider, and if you d——— Democrats were in control you would do the same thing."

I am glad therefore that the committee under its present leader has at last reported a transportation measure, even though it only deals with a minor portion of the Nation's needs in this matter. It promises some slight competition in rates on basic agricultural products which at present are excessive and unfair.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. PARKER. Have we not reported another bill that has to do with transportation?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Not with freight and passenger rates.

The transportation act of 1920 destroyed railroad competition and set up a transportation monopoly in this country. By the provision requiring a certificate of convenience and necessity it stopped railroad building and constituted existing systems a transportation trust.

By fixing both maximum and minimum charges the Interstate Commerce Commission has destroyed all competition in rates.

We hear a great deal of loose talk about Government operation of railroads. We have it in substance now under the act of 1920.

A Federal bureau controls the essentials of railroad business—establishment of lines and systems and all rates and charges. All the railroad managers have to do now is to keep the books and run the trains. Railroad rates can not be reduced even if the managers think it beneficial both for the roads and the public to do so. The Interstate Commerce Commission is now the poobah of transportation.

Competition either by waterways, highways, or the air affords the only chance for relief from the burdens of the transportation trust. The necessity for competition by water was brought out in the hearings on this bill. I have supported this bill in the committee and shall vote for its passage.

My State is interested in this bill. Nebraska ships more outbound agricultural freight by the Inland Waterways Corporation than any other Western State. We also pay enormous tribute to the railroads because of the excessive freight rates authorized by the present law. Water competition brought an offer of freight reduction upon certain merchandise, but the Interstate Commerce Commission would not permit it.

A very large tonnage of canned goods moves eastward from California and the Pacific coast each year. It amounts to 800,000 tons annually. The rate on this freight is $1.05 per hundred in car lots of 60,000 pounds from San Francisco to western Nebraska. But the railroads grant Chicago, Pittsburgh, Boston, or New York the same freight rate they do Grand Island, Nebr., or any other point east of the Rocky Mountains upon this traffic.

If the Boston rate is fair and compensatory, it is evidently very unfair to Nebraska. If the rate is just and reasonable to Nebraska, then the railroads can carry cars of canned goods from Grand Island, Nebr., to Boston, Mass., for nothing. How can they afford to do that, you ask? Because the Interstate Commerce Commission has raised the rate on farm products from Nebraska to the Atlantic coast so tremendously since March 1, 1920, that the loss on the long shipment of canned goods is made up by the overcharge on the agricultural products of the Central West.

In order that the eastern consumer may have a free car-lot rate for 1,500 miles, the rate on corn and wheat from the Central West was enormously increased. Now the people of the Middle West protested to the railroads against the unjust and unreasonable freight charges on canned goods coming from the Pacific coast.

They joined with others in the Mississippi Valley in a request for a reduction in freight rates on the 800,000 tons of canned goods. The railroads offered to cut the rate 15 cents per hundred.

The Interstate Commerce Commission refused to permit the reduction proposed by the railroads. It is claimed that transcontinental railroad freight rates have been reduced because of canal competition. Those who claim this do not know the facts. I thought so myself until I learned the truth. The records show that such freight rates were much lower before there was any Panama Canal than they are to-day. The Panama Canal was officially opened January 1, 1915. At that time the railroad car-lot rate on canned goods from the Pacific coast to Mississippi Valley territory and eastward was only 62½ cents per hundred pounds. In 1920, by order of the Interstate Commerce Commission the rate on the same goods was raised to $1.20½ per hundred. In 1921 the rate was reduced to $1.05 per hundred, where it now stands.

It was claimed by the commission and others that the water carriers who resisted the reduction could not afford the 15-cent cut proposed by the railroads and maintain their competition. The water carriers fix their own freight rates. The Interstate Commerce Commission does not control them. They have at times reduced rates on this same class of freight from California to the Atlantic coast, via the Panama Canal, as much as 25 cents a hundred. It has varied from 30 to 55 cents per hundred pounds.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Has not the Panama Canal been used as a ground for the increasing of freight rates throughout the interior section of the country?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

It would appear therefore that the interests of the carriers and not of the consumers and shippers was the determining factor in the decision of the commission. The public lost and the carriers won. Open competition in public affairs benefits the people. Bureau control is the stronghold of monopoly.

Another instance of favoritism by the commission is the preferential rate granted iron and steel for export as compared to wheat and corn. Iron or steel for domestic use is carried from Chicago to the Pacific coast for $1 per hundred pounds. The export rate on steel from Chicago to the Pacific coast is only 40 cents. The rate on wheat for export from Nebraska to New York or Baltimore is only 6 cents a hundred less than the domestic rate.

A reduction of 60 cents a hundred pounds on steel for export is granted as against a reduction of 6 cents a hundred on wheat or corn. The favor granted to steel is ten times that granted to corn or wheat when seeking a foreign market. Scores of just such gross discriminations could be pointed out under existing conditions if time permitted. As I have already pointed out, the transportation act has created a railroad monopoly, and monopolies are always unjust, unreasonable, and indefensible. Until the present transportation act is repealed or amended, the public must rely upon competition by water or the highways for any relief from the burden of unfair freight rates.

There is one warning that I want to sound to the friends of this bill. Keep water transportation entirely free from control by the Interstate Commerce Commission. That body should remain as it is, a railroad commission only. If the inland waterways ever come under the control of the railroad commission, the rail carriers will begin to dominate it and eventually control and destroy its competitive power, which is its chief source of benefit and usefulness as a public utility.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, the bill under consideration presents the question as to whether we can demonstrate the successful navigation of our inland waterways so that private capital will invest and furnish necessary river transportation.

We began the navigation in 1918 as a war necessity to relieve the freight congestion of the country. This was carried on first under the direction of the Director General of Railroads, who, in July, 1918, appointed a Federal manager to take charge of the service on the Warrior and Mississippi Rivers. Under the transportation act of 1920 the properties were conveyed to the Secretary of War, under whose direction the service was continued until the present time. The act of 1924 created the Inland Waterways Corporation, but made the Secretary of War the incorporator with power to govern and direct the corporation, with the assistance of an advisory board of six members appointed by him.

In 1927 the total assets of the corporation were $17,026,878. It transported 1,200,000 tons of freight during that year.

At the very outset it must be conceded that the experimentation carried on during the last 10 years is not encouraging. The project is not on a paying basis, and if it were not for the substantial prospect of removing the obstacles to a successful demonstration the appropriation of $10,000,000 as provided for in this bill should not be made.

In the first place, the vastness and magnitude of the enterprise has never been fully appreciated. It now involves water channels to the extent of 2,414.9 miles. It is a far greater undertaking than the building of the Panama Canal. It should be approached with that conception.

The inland waterway system is made up as follows:

	Miles
Lower Mississippi division, from St. Louis to New Orleans	1,159.9
Upper Mississippi division, from St. Louis to Minneapolis	692
Warrior division:
(1) From New Orleans to Mobile, Ala	144
(2) From Mobile to Birming Port	419
Total Warrior division	563

In addition, the corporation owns railroad from Birming Port to Ensley, Ala., a distance of 18 miles.

The experiment has not had a fair trial. Unforeseen obstacles have developed. The work of stabilizing a channel has not progressed as rapidly as was expected. As national highways it is the legitimate province of the Government to provide a dependable channel for the commerce of the country. The necessity for modern terminal facilities was not fully appreciated. Cities beginning to awake to the advantages of water transportation are now voting bonds and providing suitable terminal facilities, a modern terminal costing from $100,000 to a million dollars, according to the desired capacity.

The cities will not vote bonds to make such investments unless they have the continued assurance of navigation, and this the bill affords. But the third and greatest obstacle in the progress of this demonstration has been the opposition of the railroads. They have refused a division of joint rates preventing an extension of the benefits of inland-waterway transportation to the interior sections of the country. If such benefits can not be so transferred the demonstration can not succeed and navigation of inland waterways should be abandoned. A port-to-port rate will not sustain it. The cities along the rivers can not do it. The demonstration must reach out into the interior sections of the country where the freight rates are high, and this requires traffic arrangements, joint tariffs, rules, and regulations, and an equitable division of freight rates with the barges being operated by the corporation, and thus far we attribute the failure of the experiment to the opposition of the roads and their refusal to cooperate in such arrangements and division of rates.

In this connection the freight agent of the Mississippi Waterways Service said:

> To-day the upper river has less than 5 per cent of its normal joint rates. The Warrior has about 20 per cent of the joint rates which it should rightfully have, of which less than half are covered by satisfactory divisions. The lower Mississippi service has approximately 10 per cent of the appropriate normal joint rates which it should have, and all the existing joint-rate divisions have been established covering only about half of them. * * * The progress during the past decade is not discouraging, but it is obviously most unbusinesslike that these joint-rate and division matters, so easily adjusted as between privately operated rail carriers, were accomplished by the Government barge lines so slowly and at such an unprecedented cost of money and delay. Ten years' experience has clearly demonstrated that railroad carriers will not voluntarily cooperate in accomplishing appropriate coordination of the barge service with the railroad transportation system as intended by law. It therefore seems fitting that some further legislation be enacted to require quick results at a minimum cost through the Interstate Commerce Commission.

In describing the difficulties with the roads, Mr. Brent, who was for a number of years engaged with the movement of the Mississippi Barge Line, and is now counselor for the waterways divisions for the State of Illinois, the waterways division for the State of Minnesota, and vice president for the Redwood Line, which operates steamships between New Orleans and San Francisco, said:

In 1920 we went before the Interstate Commerce Commission asking for a broad basis of joint rates, for fair divisions, and for fair reciprocal relations with the railroads at terminal points.

That case was presented elaborately and took a long time. The record was some 2,700 pages of testimony and about 500 exhibits. It began in May, 1920, and it was not until May, 1923, that there was any outcome from the commission. At that time the commission issued no orders, but gave us certain formulas for making the river and rail rates and for rail and river rates and laid down certain principles upon which divisions should be based and remanded us to what they termed "friendly negotiation" with the railroads. Unfortunately their formula for divisions gave alternative bases, and the railroads liked their basis, and the barge lines could not stand for it; and the barge lines liked another basis, and the railroads would not stand for that. * * *

I merely mention these things to show you the vicissitudes under which a Government corporation, even under the existing law, operates in its attempt to serve the public against the unquestionably hostile attitude of the railroads of the country.

Senator FLETCHER. During this time were you carrying about your capacity?

Mr. BRENT. Well, no. Of course we are not carrying, in some directions, the capacity of the lines at present, because the rates do not exist to give us capacity.

In certain directions we have capacity carloads and in other directions we do not; but during this period during which we were waiting for the beginnings of these rates we lost $1,500,000 in operating expenses, and during this period we received and stood the attacks of hostile newspapers throughout the country, expatiating upon the demonstration of the lack of economic value in water transportation.

Senator SHEPPARD. Whose fault is it that you do not get the rate you need?

Mr. BRENT. We think it is largely the fault of the law.

Senator SHEPPARD. Of the law?

Mr. BRENT. Yes. The law is permissive. The law is not mandatory. The commission may or may not. The commission does not have to.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BRENT. Yes; but what I mean is this—we have never gone before the Interstate Commerce Commission and its examiners yet but what we have a cohort of railroad attorneys who insist that this thing is of no value. We have plenty of transportation facilities already available. The country does not need this service. This is not a necessity and it is really an inconvenience.

Testifying further, Mr. Brent said:

The roads do not want to see this development, because they think it is a menace to their prosperity. We must have a change in the provisions of the law. To-day the law is permissive. It permits the commission to take its time and do as it pleases, to give it to you now or to remand you to what you call friendly negotiations. The law should be mandatory and compel the commission to act.

Interpreting the evidence showing this opposition the committee in its report states:

This policy of opposition on the part of many of the railroads has resulted in years of delay in the extension of the benefits of water transportation to interior communities and has seriously retarded the successful operation of the Inland Waterways Corporation. Unless such opposition on the part of the rail carriers is overcome and through routes, joint rates, and an equitable division of joint rates is made available without interminable delays and the heavy expenses necessary to carry on such proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission, privately owned transportation service will never be realized on the inland waterways of the country.

The hearings on this bill convinced the committee that legislation somewhat drastic is now not only needed, but is necessary in order to fully carry out the purposes for creating the Inland Waterways Corporation and to realize the benefits of the policy of Congress manifested by the large expenditures made for the improvement of our inland waterways.

Mind you, this opposition of the roads is in face of the declared policy of Congress in section 500 of the transportation act of 1920, as follows:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to promote, encourage, and develop water transportation, service, and facilities in connection with the commerce of the United States, and to foster and preserve in full vigor both rail and water transportation.

It is to be regretted that the commission was unable to find authority for the exercise of its initiatory power in that part of paragraph 3 of section 15 of the transportation act of 1920 and other supporting sections of the act, reading as follows:

The commission may, and it shall whenever deemed by it to be necessary or desirable in the public interest, after full hearing upon complaint or upon its own initiative without a complaint, establish through routes, joint classifications, and joint rates, fares, or charges applicable to the transportation of passengers or property, or the maxima or minima, or maxima and minima, to be charged (or, in the case of a through route where one of the carriers is a water line, the maximum rates, fares, and charges applicable thereto), and the divisions of such rates, fares, or charges as hereinafter provided, and the terms and conditions under which such through routes shall be operated; and this provision, except as herein otherwise provided, shall apply when one of the carriers is a water line.

Opposition of the roads and the failure of the commission to administer satisfactorily have been the two outstanding obstacles to the successful demonstration of the experiment of our inland waterways. Not only that, but they have been, and are to-day, preventing a revision and readjustment of rates so as to permit of the equitable apportionment of the burdens of transportation alike to every section of the country and industry. This has become so pronounced and outstanding in the presence of our most imperative need as to create a growing demand for the abolition of the commission.

That the commission has failed to administer our regulatory power satisfactorily to the country, that it has failed to administer such power so as to approximately apportion the burdens of commerce equitably alike to every section of the country and line of industry, is generally claimed throughout the country. And unless there is some radical change of policy on the part of that body in the adoption of a constructive program for aggressive revision and readjustment of the horizontal increases imposed, the demand for its abolition will continue to grow and become imperative.

In a signed article published in one of the leading magazines of the country but a short time ago, a Member of Congress representing a prominent eastern industrial State declared that if he had the power but for a single day to effectuate the most-needed reformation in the Government for the greatest relief of all the people he would abolish the Interstate Commerce Commission and turn the roads back to private regulation and control.

In view of the general dissatisfaction with the rate structure and the nation-wide demand for a revision and readjustment of rates, such a statement, if unchallenged, in many quarters will be accepted at its face value as a proposal of the only adequate remedy for the existing unsatisfactory rate conditions throughout the country.

EXISTING UNSATISFACTORY CONDITIONS THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY

I have recently received resolutions from numerous representative farm and civic organizations in the Mid West demanding the repeal of section 15a of the transportation act of 1920. In yesterday's mail I received resolutions from several of the national farm organizations demanding the immediate repeal of the entire act. These resolutions are indicative of the deep-seated existing dissatisfaction with rate conditions in the interior mid-western section of the country.

The farmers feel that the roads have been well taken care of since the war. They feel that the Interstate Commerce Commission has said by its horizontal increases imposed in 1921:

We must take care of the roads first. We must save them at all hazards, even though it must be by horizontal increases which we know are especially burdensome on agriculture.

Of course, the system of horizontal increases saved the roads. It rebuilt their financial credit. It doubled the value of their stocks and the amount of their annual dividends. It has enabled them to invest $7,000,000,000 in betterments. The roads have been rehabilitated. They have been saved. They have been restored to prosperous conditions such as they never experienced before.

It may have been good policy or war-time necessity for the Government during its period of operation of the railroads to keep rates at a point at which enormous losses were piled up, but no one would expect the Government to assume responsibility for losses incurred after the roads were returned to their owners. And the owners can not be asked to accept rates which would lead to bankruptcy. Necessary as the rate increases were, therefore, they came at a peculiarly inopportune time. Farmers found themselves compelled to pay higher rates at the very moment they were being forced to accept lower prices for their products and they sometimes found that the price received was insufficient even to cover the railroad's bill.

On May 18, 1920, the Federal Reserve Board voted at its secret meeting to deflate agriculture. In that year the purchasing value of farm products was 131 per cent above the purchasing value of farm products in 1913. In 1922 it was only 24 per cent above the pre-war value, representing a shrinkage in the purchasing value of the 1921 and 1922 crops of six billion. In two short years the value of farm products depreciated 107 per cent, and that at the very time our exports of farm products were the largest in our history.

As a result of this decline in values it is estimated that the value of all capital invested in agriculture declined from $79,000,000,000 in May, 1920, to $58,000,000,000 in 1922.

As late as 1926 the average farm family income had only reached $736 per year. That amount included $630 for the estimated value of food, fuel, and housing furnished by the farm, leaving a cash yearly wage of only $106 for the average farmer of the United States. Think of it! One hundred and six dollars annual income for the American farmer with an average investment of $9,000! When you compare this family income with that of $1,250 for the common laborer, his plight becomes pitiable indeed.

During all these years when the roads were enjoying the revenues from the horizontal increases which created such conditions of prosperity for them, the farmers have been waging a desperate fight to make both ends meet, pay their taxes and interest, and save their homes. Having saved the roads and created such rising values in their stocks as to create speculation and gambling therein unprecedented in recent years, the farmers feel that the commission having performed this work of reclamation should have long since begun the work of revision and readjustment to lighten and adjust the burdens of the horizontal increases.

For five years they have demanded such revision. The agricultural commission appointed by the President in its report demanded such revision. The President, in his message to Congress in December, 1923, said:

> Competent authorities now agree that there should be an entire reorganization of the rate structure for freight.

Notwithstanding the demand of every farm organization in the United States, the representative agricultural commission appointed by the President and the several messages of the President to the Congress, the horizontal increases imposed by the commission in 1921 still remain. They have not been removed except here and there by patchwork and piecemeal as public demand became too insistent to be any longer ignored.

The farmers feel that under these harrowing conditions existing during the last five years, more potential for revolutionary action than the Boston tea tax, the commission should assume the initiative for their relief; it should not continually wear its judicial robes and assume a judicial attitude toward readjusting the horizontal rates which it was so quick to impose; that it should exercise the same power to initiate in revision and readjustment for the relief of the farmers as it exercised to save the roads.

Out of such conditions has come the demand not only for the repeal of section 15a but of the transportation act of 1920, and it may have been such conditions which impelled the Member of Congress to say in substance:

> I would begin my program of relief to the American people by abolishing the Interstate Commerce Commission and turn the roads back to private regulation and control.

However unsatisfactory existing rate conditions may be—and it is admitted that they are indefensible—yet the remedy proposed would create conditions still worse. The proposal to abolish the commission and turn the roads back to private regulation and control immediately challenges a comparison of conditions under private and governmental regulation.

COMPARISON OF CONDITIONS UNDER PRIVATE AND GOVERNMENTAL REGULATION

During their constructive period and up until 1887 the roads exercised full power of ownership, control, and regulation over their properties. This included the exercise of the power to fix their own rates, which was equivalent to the exercise of a power to tax all the commerce of the country in railway transit.

They exercised this power so arbitrarily and oppressively as to create conditions which became intolerable; by secret rebates, midnight rates, circuitous-route rates, basic-point rates, missionary rates, unreasonable rates, rates that were unduly prejudicial and unduly preferential, and rates that were discriminatory, they developed one section of the country at the expense of the other. With one hand they distributed prosperity and with the other hand depression and desolation. In the early days of outlawry in the West, the old-timers used to say with sympathetic consolation to the newcomer, "A town once visited is safe," but such could not be said of the policy of the roads under private regulation. They continued their exactions almost to the point of confiscation. Unsatisfied with fixing their own rates and running their own business, they proceeded to run everybody else's business, as well as that of the political affairs of cities, counties, States, and the Government itself. They insisted upon having their personal representatives as Members of the State and National Legislatures, as members of the State and Federal judiciaries to sit in cases in which they were parties defendants; but the findings of fact by our own agency, the commission, in numerous cases more vividly, accurately, and authoritatively describes the conditions under private regulation. I therefore will indulge your patience sufficiently to read from a brief extract of one of many decisions containing findings of fact of a similar character.

In regard to financial transactions of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. (July 11, 1914, 31 I. C. C. 32, at p. 33), the commission states:

> The difficulties under which this railroad system has labored in the past are internal and wholly due to its own mismanagement. Its troubles have not arisen because of regulation by governmental authority. Its greatest losses and most costly blunders were made in an attempt to circumvent governmental regulation; and to extend its domination beyond the limits fixed by law. * * * It has been clearly proven how the public opinion was distorted; how public officials who were needed and could be bought were bought; how newspapers that could be subsidized were subsidized; how a college professor and publicist secretly accepted money from the New Haven while masking as a representative of a great American university and a guardian of the interests of the people; how agencies of information to the public were prostituted, wherever they could be prostituted, in order to carry out a scheme of private transportation monopoly imperial in its scope; the unwarranted expenditure of large amounts in educating public opinion; the disposition, without knowledge of the directors, of hundreds of thousands of dollars for influencing public sentiment; the habitual chain of unitemized vouchers without any clear specification of details; the practice of financial legerdemain in issuing large blocks of New Haven stocks for notes of the New England Navigation Co. and manipulating these securities back and forth; fictitious sales of New Haven stock to friendly parties with the desire of boosting the stock and unloading on the public at the higher market price; the unlawful diversion of corporate funds to political organizations; the scattering of retainers to attorneys of five States who rendered no itemized bills for service and who conducted no litigation in which the railroad was a party; extensive use of a paid lobby in matters as to which the directors claimed to have no information; the attempt to control utterances of the press by subsidizing reporters; the payment of money to and the profligate use of free passes to legislators and their friends; the investment of $400,000 in securities of a New England newspaper; together with a combination of many other causes set forth herein have resulted in the present deplorable situation in which the affairs of this road are involved.
> Nothing disclosed in the record before us is to be more regretted than the readiness of great banking institutions in our financial centers to loan enormous sums of money upon exceedingly precarious security in aid of such schemes as have been devised in the wrecking of these railroads. Not only this, but the high officers of such institutions, while acting ostensibly as directors of the railroads, have in fact been little more than tools and dummies for the promoters. The trustees of other people's money seem to have had little compunction about violations of their trusts for the benefit of the promoters and at their demand.
> Until this commission or some other governmental body with adequate power primarily controls the issue of carrier securities and within reasonable limitations the application of the proceeds thereof, stockholders and other investors in carrier securities will certainly from time to time be subjected to such perils of mismanagement and resultant losses as have accrued to the stockholders of the New Haven, the Rock Island, the Pere Marquette, the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton, and others.

OUR PROGRESS HAS BEEN SLOW BUT SUBSTANTIAL

To abolish the commission and to return to such conditions as existed under private regulation would be little short of a national calamity. To publish to the country that after 50 years of contest and effort to regulate we have accomplished nothing is a gross misstatement of fact and a grievous injury to a sound public opinion.

While the development of our regulatory power has been a slow and laborious process, it was made so by the continuous opposition of the roads and their circumvention of the law. By continuous oppression and circumvention the people were finally lashed into action in their own self-defense.

Beginning in the seventies, the first contest culminated in the interstate commerce act of 1887. The Hepburn Act of 1906 was the second step; the Mann-Elkins Act of 1910 was the third step; the Clayton Antitrust Act of 1914 was the fourth step; the transportation act of 1920 was the fifth step. These acts mark the big epochal events in the development of regulatory power during the last half century. They mark the culmination of the periodic contests in this forum, on this floor, where the representatives of the people wrung from the grasping hands of the roads the power they had so oppressively used against them.

From time to time during that period numerous other amendments were enacted, but these are the big charters of governmental regulation.

OPPOSITION OF THE ROADS

Every important provision of every act and amendment conferring additional power upon the commission was stubbornly resisted by the roads; first, before the commission, then in the Federal courts, and finally in the Supreme Court of the United States. Such opposition required years and years for a final judicial determination of their regulatory provisions. Our progress has been slow, but it has been continuous and substantial. It has been according to the rules of the game. The people of this country have treated the roads fairly. They did not resort to any undue advantage but only to the orderly processes of the law under the commerce clause of our Constitution.

POLICY OF THE ROADS ILL-ADVISED

From time to time during our history, railway executives have been held up to us as the great captains of industry, as having contributed so liberally to the development of the country; but it will be observed and remembered that their liberal contributions were furnished from other sources. Their policy of oppression and discrimination, of determined resistance, was shortsighted and ill-advised. Their leadership failed totally in the development of a spirit of cooperation with the people. They developed no sense of appreciation of the power that created them and the source of those revenues which maintained them. Like the saloon keeper, they finally regulated themselves out of the regulating business. Like the drunken automobile driver, they became dangerous to the public. Like dangerous incompetents, the people in their self-protection were finally compelled to take away their power to fix rates and to exercise the power of guardianship over their properties; and yet they boast of leadership!

RESULTS OF GOVERNMENTAL REGULATION

To abolish the commission and turn the roads back to private regulation and control would reinstate them as the custodians of our national prosperity, with the power of distribution! It would be equivalent to the Gaulish invasion of ancient Rome. In politics it would make Teapot Dome look like a Sunday-school contribution. It would nullify the work and progress of 50 years!

If it has not done anything else, governmental regulation has produced two outstanding results. It has stripped the roads of their political power, driven their personal representatives from the legislative halls and from the sanctuary of the judiciary, and made for cleaner and better government. It has stripped the roads of the power to fix their own rates, which is equivalent to the power to tax the commerce of the country in rail transit, and has given to the people a new sense of power and freedom in the control of their commerce.

Because rate conditions are unsatisfactory and generally in a chaotic condition is no reason why we should abolish the commission and turn the roads back to private regulation.

By Supreme Court decisions, we have cleared a large field for the proper exercise of regulatory power; a field sufficiently large under efficient administration to apportion the burdens of commerce equitably to every section and industry alike; and that is all the people demand. It is what they are entitled to have done.

Our problem to-day is one of efficient administration. Thus far the commission has failed to administer our regulatory power to the satisfaction of the people. This is evidenced by the general demand for a revision and readjustment of rates during the last five years.

NATION-WIDE DEMAND FOR REVISION AND READJUSTMENT

All the representative farm organizations, the chambers of commerce and civic organizations of the Mid West section of the country have been demanding revision and readjustment during this period. The Agricultural Commission, appointed by the President, and the President in his message to Congress have voiced such demand. In his message of December, 1923, five years ago, the President said:

> Competent authorities agree that an entire reorganization of the rate structure for freight is necessary. This should be ordered at once by the Congress. * * *

In speaking of agriculture he said:

> Indirectly the farmer must be relieved by a reduction of national and local taxation. He must be assisted by the reorganization of the freight-rate structure, which could reduce charges on his production.

In his message of December 3, 1924, the President, speaking of consolidation, said:

> It opens large possibility of better equalization of rates between different classes of traffic so as to relieve undue burdens upon agricultural products and raw materials generally, which are now not possible without ruin to small units, owing to the lack of diversity of traffic.

COMPARISON OF THE EAST WITH THE WEST

The section west of the Mississippi River contains 69 per cent of the area of the United States, 47 per cent of the railroad mileage, and 30 per cent of the population. It produces 54 per cent of the principal grain crops, about 60 per cent of the cattle produced in the United States, and originates 30 per cent of the tonnage. Thus, we see that 47 per cent of the railroad mileage of the United States is in 69 per cent of the area populated by 30 per cent of the people, who furnish 30 per cent of the tonnage originated.

East of the Mississippi River and north of the Ohio River, including the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and the New England States, is 12½ per cent of the area of the United States, 47 per cent of the population, and 48 per cent of the tonnage originated. This area also produces 70 per cent of the value of the manufactured products of the United States.

From this picture of the two sections it is easy to visualize the long haul of the West and the short haul of the East, and it shows that eastern agriculture is in a more favorable economic position than western agriculture; that its near-by prosperous cities furnish a continuous, steady market—markets so near that they permit of truck transportation when rail rates are unsatisfactory. The short and inexpensive haul leaves the farmers of the East a profit on their products which in the West is often entirely absorbed by the long haul and high freight rates. The farmers in the West are not so favorably situated. They are on the high-rate plateau in the interior and have the long haul with which to contend and the high rates to markets.

The high rates are deducted from the prices that the farmers receive for their products, and when they buy their implements, their clothing, their necessities of life, their material and equipment for the farms from the markets of the East, the rates are passed on and added to the price of everything they buy. The freight is deducted from everything they sell and it is added to everything they buy. In effect, therefore, like Jones, the farmer pays the freight both ways—it cuts him like a two-edged sword; and with the rates on agricultural products 53 per cent higher than they were before the war, they absorb the little profits that he would otherwise make.

This explains why the East is not so directly interested in the question of revision and readjustment of rates as it is interested in service.

AVERAGE HAUL IN THE EAST AND THE WEST

I give below the average haul in each of the regions, districts, and the United States, as compiled from the monthly reports of Class I steam railways to the commission for 1927:

District and region	Average haul (miles)
Eastern district:
New England region	113.97
Great Lakes region	154.13
Central eastern region	151.36
Eastern district	149.67
Southern district:
Pocahontas region	265.60
Southern region	201.52
Southern district	222.65
Western district:
Northwestern region	195.59
Central western region	260.37
Southwestern region	208.47
Western district	222.71
United States	184.16

Thus it will be seen that the haul in the southern and western districts is 73 miles, or one-third, longer than the haul in the eastern district.

HORIZONTAL INCREASES

In 1914 the Interstate Commerce Commission granted an increase of 5 per cent on practically all the rates north of the Potomac and Ohio Rivers and east of the Mississippi. In 1917 the rates in the same area were increased approximately 15 per cent. On June 25, 1918, the United States Railroad Administration advanced rates 25 per cent all over the United States.

On May 18, 1920, a meeting was held of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Advisory Council and Class A directors of the Federal reserve banks. At this secret meeting held on that day they voted to deflate agriculture. The restriction of credits, the breaking down of prices, the increasing of freight rates and the discount rates for farm paper were secretly discussed and agreed to; but that was not all. That meeting of the Federal Reserve Board decided to rehabilitate the roads. Why? Because it was representing the interests financing the roads instead of representing the public. It decided on an increase in freight rates. It passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That this conference urges as the most important remedies that the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Shipping Board give increased rates and adequate facilities such immediate effect as may be warranted under their authority, and that a committee of five be appointed by the Chair to present these resolutions to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Shipping Board with such verbal presentation as may seem appropriate to the committee.

Why "verbal presentation"? So as to leave no trace! Following the above resolution—that is, on August 26, 1920—the most radical change in all our history was made.

A horizontal increase in rates in the eastern group of 40 per cent was made; in the southern group, 25 per cent; in the western group, 35 per cent; in the Mountain-Pacific group, 25 per cent; and on intraterritorial traffic, 33⅓ per cent. In 1922 there were two 10 per cent decreases, one on agricultural products and the other on nonagricultural products. On its own initiative, and in cases presented, other decreases in various sections of the country have been made from time to time, so that while these percentage changes do not give us a complete, correct picture of the rate changes and the existing rate status at the present time, yet they do give a general idea of the comparative status of freight rates and the method employed in making such increases.

HORIZONTAL INCREASES BEAR HEAVIEST ON FARM PRODUCTS

The horizontal increases thus made have resulted in disproportionate increases upon long-haul, carload traffic of agricultural products. In making those increases no attention was paid to how high a rate was, or how low a rate was, or how long the haul was, or the value of the product, or what it would bear to carry it to market. By horizontal increases the low-price farm products were compelled to pay the same as high-class manufactured articles. This, in connection with one-third longer haul for farm products, has made the horizontal increase almost unbearable. They have exacted what little profits the farmers would have made during the last five years, when they have been waging their desperate fight for the retention of their homes upon the farms.

That such an unscientific and inequitable system of rate-making should be tolerated by the commission is almost unbelievable. Though the horizontal increases may have been necessary to save the roads, what excuse is there for their retention after the roads have been saved? This is something the farmers are unable to understand. They believe that the retention of the horizontal increases imposed upon agriculture is inexcusable; they are indefensible. For five years they have been demanding their readjustment, and such demands have been voiced by the President to the Congress. The commission has had full power. It needed no extra congressional act, and yet the increases still remain. If permitted to continue, they will again lash the people of the Mid West into action, as the oppressive powers of the roads did in the seventies!

Appointed by President Harding to make a careful and thorough study of rates, with a view to relief from the undue burdens upon agriculture, and with his long experience and intimate familiarity with the commerce of the country, perhaps no other person is better qualified to speak on this subject than Herbert Hoover, our Secretary of Commerce.

In his address on September 28, 1926, at Mitchell, S. Dak., he said:

One of the underlying causes contributing to the present difficulties of our mid-west farmers is the increased railroad rates arising from the war. * * * Owing to such increases and the distance from seaboard, our mid-west farmers must, for instance, pay from 6 cents to 12 cents a bushel more on grain to reach the world's markets than they did before the war. Therefore the foreign farmers reach the world markets at a lower cost in proportion to pre-war than our mid-west farmers.

We can roughly visualize this if we set up a new measuring unit in the shape of the number of cents it takes to move a ton of wheat on different routes. For instance, during pre-war times to move a ton of South Dakota wheat by the cheapest route cost 1,190 cents to reach Liverpool, while Argentina wheat cost 723 cents. To-day the increased freight charges on this ton of wheat moving from Argentina, which is farther from Liverpool than is South Dakota, is 117 cents, while the South Dakota farmer has had his charge moved up 408 cents. This uneven increase in transportation charges has prejudiced the situation of our mid-west farmers in competition with those foreign countries; and, more than that, the prices which the farmer receives in the foreign competitive markets influence the price of his whole products, not only the price of the export balance; therefore, the effect of war increase of transportation rates to seaboard is far greater than its effect upon the part of the crop exported out of the Mid West. It at once tends to depress the return on the whole crop. It is unquestionably one of the contributing causes of our postwar agricultural difficulties.

HIGH RATES PREVENT INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT OF THE WEST

The vast empire west of the Mississippi River is the meat and bread basket of the East. It produces the foodstuffs to feed the industrial workers as well as those of all other occupations and professions. It is the best market the East has for its manufactured product. Its consuming capacity and its capacity to pay are larger than that of any other market in the world, and likewise the East is the best market for the agricultural products of the West. It has the largest consuming capacity and capacity to pay of any market for farm products in the world. These markets are joining each other—depending one upon the other—and there is every economic reason why there should be the closest cooperation in removing from the channels of commerce every unnecessary burden.

The country west of the Mississippi River has approached the industrial stage in its development. When it needs building material for its roads and bridges and cities in the creation of its markets at home, and when it proceeds, as it is about to proceed, in this new epoch of industrial development, to curtail its long haul and cut its freight bill in two and to create a market at home, it finds an insurmountable barrier at the Mississippi River on the east and the Panama Canal on the west.

THE BARRIER AT THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER

What is this barrier at the Mississippi River? It is the sudden jump in freight rates, which, for commerce, is almost as effective as a wall. For each 300 miles east of the river the rate on steel is 47.5 cents per hundred. For each 300 miles west of the river the rate is 83.5 cents per hundred. The rate west is more than 75 per cent higher than the rate east. This is the barrier that prohibits the West from shipping in iron and steel from the East. It is the tollgate whose keeper exacts the heavy exactions from the consumers in the West as they buy the manufactured products of the East.

By this transportation embargo, the West is prevented from building up its cities and markets at home. Such difference in rates not only applies to steel but to other products.

RATES ON CLASSIFIED GOODS

Freight is divided generally into numerous classes, each with its own rate, and there are other special commodity rates. We only refer to the five main classes. Class 1 includes dry goods, shoes, and high-class merchandise; class 2 includes hardware, cutlery, tools; class 3 includes high-class groceries, furniture, and so forth; class 4 includes the general run of heavier groceries, such as salt; and class 5 includes carload lots of steel, and so forth. Here [indicating] are the rates per 100 pounds from New York to Kansas City through St. Louis on the various classes. Bear in mind that the distance from New York to St. Louis is 1,050 miles, and from St. Louis to Kansas City is 300 miles.

	New York to St. Louis	St. Louis to Kansas City
Class 1	$1.66	$0.83½
Class 2	1.45½	.63½
Class 3	1.10½	.52½
Class 4	.77	.38
Class 5	.66	.30½

COMPARE THESE RATES

Consider this vicious discrimination against the West on all the goods that we have to buy of you people in the East!

The part of the through rate that is charged from St. Louis to Kansas City ought to be only about one-third of the rate from New York to St. Louis, when actually it is nearly three-fourths.

On dry goods, shoes, and high-class merchandise it is 69 per cent greater. On hardware, cutlery, tools, and so forth, it is 80 per cent greater. On high-class groceries, furniture, and so forth, it is 73 per cent greater.

On the general run of heavier groceries, such as salt, it is 71 per cent greater.

On the carload classes, of which steel is a typical example, it is 75 per cent greater.

The jump in the rate level at the Mississippi River in each case is so great as to prevent the industrial development of the country west of the Mississippi River and to exact from farm prices the profit that would permit the farmers to enjoy a degree of prosperity.

In the seventies or eighties, when the country was sparsely settled, there might have been some reason and justification for the erection of such a barrier, but since no reason exists to-day, there is no valid claim made anywhere for its continuance, and yet it still remains—the rate level has not been readjusted.

We have had seven years of rate making, with full power to the commission to revise and readjust rates, but the barrier has not been removed. The West says:

Take down the barrier, remove the unnecessary burdens upon commerce, and let it flow as freely as possible between the several States.

THE BARRIER ON THE WEST

Take the barrier on the West—the Panama Canal—the through rates are so low to the coast and the interior rates so high as to erect another barrier on the West which casts a heavy burden upon the interior.

COMPARISON OF INTERIOR AND COAST RATES

The rate on dry goods from Chicago to Enid, Okla., a distance of 832 miles, is $2.275 per hundred. The rate on dry goods from Chicago to San Francisco, a distance of 1,429 miles farther, is $1.58 per hundred. Thus we see that the rate from Chicago to Enid, Okla., is 53 per cent greater than the rate from Chicago to San Francisco, although the distance of the latter is 1,429 miles farther from Chicago than is Enid.

Stated in another way, the hauling of a 30-ton car of dry goods from Chicago to San Francisco, San Francisco being 1,429 miles farther from Chicago than is Enid, Okla., costs $41.70 less than hauling the same tonnage from Chicago to Enid.

Take the rate on steel. From Chicago, a distance of 2,300 miles from San Francisco, for domestic consumption it is $1 per hundred. For export it is $0.40 per hundred. These rates apply on the same commodities between the same points, subject to the same minimum pound weight and the same rule of law which requires earnings in excess of cost.

A 40-cent rate on steel for 2,300 miles when exported to China or any other foreign country and the rate of $1 per hundred when used in construction at home obviously means that one of two things is true—the 40-cent rate covers all the cost and some profit for the 2,300-mile haul to the coast or it is an illegal rate maintained in defiance of law, and that is a burden upon commerce which the consumers of freight should not be required to pay.

When recently interrogated in reference to these rates to the coast, Commissioner Esch blandly explained that they were rates put into effect by the railroads and the commission had never been called upon to determine their validity.

The continuation of such undue preferentials raises the question whether or not the American farmer in the West is not entitled to as much consideration as the Chinaman in the Far East.

VIOLATIONS OF LAW

These illustrations of existing freight structures show a violation of section 4, which declares our policy in transportation matters, of section 2 of the interstate act, prohibiting discrimination; of section 3, preventing unreasonable preferentials and advantages that nullify the minimum-rates provision of section 15. They disrupt the group plan of rate making and prevent the equalization of rates and their equitable apportionment to the commerce of the country; they compel the interior to make up the losses incurred on the competitive rate for the long haul. Why not give farm products the same preferentials?

Recently the Associated Press carried the story of an entire trainload of corn, composed of 50 cars, leaving my home city, Enid, Okla., bound for Europe. That corn was loaded by the Enid Terminal Elevator Co., where it was stored during the last few months. The train contained about 80,000 bushels. The Frisco hauled the train to Fort Worth, from where the Santa Fe took it to Galveston. At the Gulf it was loaded upon a boat headed for Europe. The domestic rate on the corn from Enid to Galveston, a distance of 595 miles, was 32.5 cents per hundred pounds. The export rate was 31.5 per hundred pounds, or a preferential in favor of export rates of 1 cent per 100 pounds. If the 40-cent rate on steel from Chicago to San Francisco, a distance of 2,300 miles, was applied to this shipment of corn, it would result in a saving of freight on the haul of 595 miles of $10,150.70. Or, considering the matter from another viewpoint, the export preferential on steel is 60 cents per hundred pounds. The export preferential on corn is 1 cent per hundred pounds, or a 3 per cent preferential. If corn for export enjoyed the same export preferential as steel, the rate on corn for export would be 12.5 cents per hundred pounds instead of 31.5 cents per hundred, which would result in a saving of $9,120 on the train of corn from Enid to Galveston.

Take another illustration: In 1926 there were about 1,385,471 short tons of wheat exported from the Gulf coast. Supposing that Wichita, Kans., was a central point of its production. The rate on wheat from Wichita, Kans., to Galveston for domestic consumption is 46 cents per hundred pounds and for export 44 cents per hundred pounds. There is, therefore, a 2-cent preferential on export wheat from Wichita to Galveston, or a preferential of about 4 per cent.

Using those rates on the wheat exported from the Gulf coast, the total freight cost would amount to $12,192,144.80. There is a 60 per cent preferential on steel for the 2,300-mile haul from Chicago to San Francisco. If there was a 60 per cent preferential on wheat for export, it would mean an export rate on wheat of 16 cents instead of 44 cents per hundred pounds. Applying that to the wheat exported from the Gulf, the total freight cost would be $4,433,507.20, or a saving to the producers on 1,385,471 short tons of wheat of $7,758,637.60.

Now, suppose this wheat had been carried 2,300 miles on a 40-cent rate, which is the rate applied to steel for export from Chicago to San Francisco, the total freight cost would be $11,837,680. Allowing such freight costs per mile, the costs for hauling from Wichita, Kans., to Galveston, a distance of 723 miles, would be $3,484,158.69, whereas the cost under existing rates would be $12,192,144.80.

In other words, application of the rate on steel on a mileage basis would result in a saving to the farmers, to the wheat growers, shipping to the Gulf for export of $8,707,986.80.

Just why during its long period of depression and surplus, agriculture has not been given an equivalent preferential with steel does not appear. Is it because the dummy directors referred to by the commission as the tools of financial interests financing the roads have been using the transportation facilities of the people as a means of disposing of their steel products, in which they were equally interested, at the expense of agriculture?

It explains how United States Steel has been disposing of its surplus abroad at a profit at the appalling expense of surplus farm products depressed at home. Give the farmers of the country a 60 per cent reduction on basic crops for export and the surplus, with its ruinous price depression of the domestic market, will disappear.

THE EXCUSE FOR SUCH PREFERENTIALS

The railroads attempt to justify this system of rate making under the guise of meeting water transportation through the Panama Canal. They claim that the interior sections of the country must make good the losses in freight revenues diverted through those waters. In other words, the people, having built the canal with their tax moneys, must now pay the roads in excess rates for the resulting losses in freight revenues.

At the present time they are talking about building another canal. If the second canal should be as ruinous to the farmers of the Middle West as the first one has been, it will depopulate that vast section of the country. The roads should be compelled to stand upon their own bottom and meet the competition of the country the same as other industries. They have compelled the people, through the exaction of water competition rates, to fight inland waterway commerce. Just think of it! With the exactions from the people the roads have been driving the boats from the inland waterways. Every time a boat has shoved its prow into the bank of one of the interior rivers, the roads have met it with cut-throat rates to the river points and higher rates to the intermediate points, until to-day the only steamboat navigation on the Mississippi River is that subsidized by the Government.

RATE CONDITIONS IN THE SOUTHWEST

In Consolidated Southwestern cases, decided April 5, 1927, the Interstate Commerce Commission found the classification rates between points in the Southwest and Kansas-Missouri territory to be in a general chaotic condition, complicated and unsatisfactory, with undue prejudice against different points.

Quoting, the commission said:

The record discloses mutual competition under inequitable rate conditions between points in Oklahoma, Arkansas, western Louisiana,

Texas, Kansas, and southern Missouri. In other words, the opportunity to do business is sometimes foreclosed by freight rates. That communities, as well as individuals or industries, may be adversely affected by rate maladministration is clearly illustrated by the testimony in this case.

A TYPICAL EXAMPLE

Take Miami, Okla., as a typical example. It is 13 miles from Baxter Springs, Kans. The spread in first-class rates from St. Louis is 32.5 cents. Between the other class rates the spreads are correspondingly disproportionate. A dealer in Miami received from Detroit 572 Ford automobiles during 1922. The freight charges amounted to $55.07 per automobile. On a similar shipment to Baxter Springs, Kans., the charge would be $51.55 per automobile. To meet that competition the dealer suffered a pecuniary loss of $2,207.80 a year. Merchants at Miami are unable to compete with merchants in Baxter Springs, where the freight is a material factor. In their struggle for commercial existence, many of the people of Miami are moving to Baxter Springs.

In picking a location for a jobbing house or factory one of the first things to be considered is the freight-rate situation. There is keen rivalry between towns in the Southwest for the location of new industries to meet the increased need of the growing population. There is thus an endless chain of actual and potential competition in the distribution of goods or class rates not only within the territory but from and to the border States and cities beyond. Towns paying for like service higher rates than others or paying rates higher, distance considered, than others are placed at a disadvantage and often are deprived of their natural advantage of location.

In its investigation the commission found undue preferentials and discriminations in rates on farm products in the same rate-making district.

A COMPARISON OF WESTERN GRAIN RATES

The following is a memorandum showing a comparison of western grain rates in the same rate-making district. In comparison with the rates of other States in the district it will show vicious discrimination against the farm products of Oklahoma and Texas.

Miles	Minnesota scale	Kansas scale	Oklahoma-Texas scale	Carriers' proposed scale
50	8	10	11	15
100	12	13	15	19
200	14	17½	20	26½
300	16	20	26	34
400	17½	20½	29	39
500	19½		33	44

It will thus be seen that the Oklahoma-Texas scale on a 300-mile haul is 30 per cent higher than the Kansas scale and 62½ per cent higher than the Minnesota scale; on the 400-mile haul the discrimination is nearly 41 per cent in favor of Kansas points and nearly 66 per cent for Minnesota points. The discrimination is shown to be existent all along the line, the Kansas grain rates being from 20 to 30 per cent lower on shipments to Kansas City than are Oklahoma grain rates, generally, to the same point, and Minnesota grain rates to Minneapolis are still lower than are the Kansas rates. If we could secure the Minnesota scale on shipments from Oklahoma to the Gulf, it would mean a reduction of approximately 60 per cent in our wheat rates.

ILLUSTRATING THE DELAY IN RATE RELIEF

The proceedings in the cases cited were instituted in 1923 and finally submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission on June 19, 1925, and by it decided on April 5, 1927. Because of suspension orders the decision will not become effective until May, 1928, and not then if further deferred.

The freight conditions described by the commission have existed in that southwestern country for years. The rates were fixed by the roads under private regulation and have exacted millions and millions of dollars annually from the people of Oklahoma and other Southwestern States in excess of a reasonable compensatory return. The rates have never been revised or readjusted, although there has been a constant and incessant demand for such relief.

How long is the country going to stand this interminable delay in such proceedings? If it has taken the commission five years to revise and readjust rates in the classified service in the Southwest, how long is it going to take it to revise and readjust rates of all classes throughout the entire country?

The commission has been engaged in the performance of too many other duties imposed upon it by the Congress. It is attempting to administer under 28 different acts of Congress. From time to time it cheerfully accepts enlarged jurisdiction and additional responsibilities and then in their exercise and performance is compelled to redelegate its power. Such redelegation for the performance of the duties purely ministerial in their character is, of course, necessary and expected, but the redelegation of power for the performance of legislative duties is a dangerous procedure and unnecessarily jeopardizes the public interest.

The power to initiate rates for revision and readjustment is the commission's greatest responsibility. There is no other power the commission can exercise which would result in greater benefit direct to all the people. In his December message in 1923 President Coolidge, recognizing this fact, insisted upon the entire reorganization of the rate structure for freight for the relief of agriculture. The commission undoubtedly read the message. Since that time every farm organization in the country and many representative civic organizations, including the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and all of its submembers, urged a revision and readjustment of rates for the relief of agriculture. The commission knows this. It knows that the horizontal increases should not be permitted to stand 24 hours. It knows that the President, the Congress, and the country have been expecting revision and readjustment, and yet during these five years of coma for agriculture, what has it done?

The very fact that after five years the commission has been unable to effect substantial results in revision and readjustment for agriculture when every other line of industry has been abounding with prosperity ought to convince the most skeptical of the inadequacy of our present machinery to administer our regulatory power in rate making satisfactorily to the people.

We have overloaded our machinery of administration. The magnitude of the responsibilities and the multitude of the enormous tasks imposed upon the commission are not adequately appreciated. Visualize for a moment the national railway system of this country.

THE MAGNITUDE OF THE SYSTEM

On December 31, 1926, we had a total owned main-track railway mileage of 249,138.40 miles, including 176,901.80 miles of Class I owned roads; 14,004.80 miles of Class II owned roads; 5,555 miles of Class III; 9,805.27 miles owned by proprietary companies—that is, companies whose entire capital stock and funded debt is owned by some other road; 3,572.40 miles of circular mileage—that is, mileage reported by companies not interstate carriers but which may become so; 38,832.15 miles owned by lessor companies; and an additional main-track mileage of about 466.98 miles—unofficial figure, companies not reporting.

In addition to this main-track mileage there are second, third, and fourth side, passing, terminal, and switching tracks, bringing the aggregate mileage to 421,268 miles. Then there are the roadbeds, culverts, bridges, stations, elevators, warehouses, and office buildings in which the business is carried on. There are 66,847 locomotives, 56,855 passenger-train cars, excluding privately owned cars, and 2,403,967 freight cars, excluding caboose and cars owned by private interests.

These properties in 1919 were tentatively valued by the commission at $18,900,000,000, owned and operated by about 1,728 separate and independent railroad corporations.

For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1927, Class I railways, including switching and terminal companies, reported an average of 1,821,490 employees receiving a total compensation of $3,000,000,000, nearly double the aggregate compensation of 1916, and representing an increase in compensation per employee per annum in the decade of about 80 per cent.

With these facilities and over these tracks are carried each year more than one-half of all the rail traffic of the world.

REGULATION IMPOSES UPON THE COMMISSION MOST GIGANTIC TASK OF ADMINISTRATION

To regulate these properties so as to equitably apportion the tax on commerce to each section of the country is one of the most gigantic problems of administration of modern times. This undertaking alone would be sufficient to test the highest administrative capacity of any commission in the service of the Government. It is a continuing duty requiring the constant personal attention of the commission and the exercise of its legislative functions, but the duties of the commission are not limited to the intricate, complex problems growing out of such regulation. They extend to a far wider field. It has organized 14 bureaus within its department to gather in the required information essential to the discharge of its many responsibilities.

It must determine the cost of carrying the United States mail by rail as well as regulate commerce through the Panama Canal. The regulation of interstate motor-bus transportation and the consolidation of roads is sought to be included within its jurisdiction.

Then there is the valuation of the roads to be brought down and completed under the act of 1913. Again, there is the investigation to ascertain the efficient, economical, and honest administration of the roads as a factor in rate making, the machinery for which does not exist. The commission is disposing of between 1,400 and 1,500 complaints annually, and yet it is about two and one-half years behind in the hearing of complaints filed. As the number of complaints increase and the field of its activity enlarges, it will not be able to keep pace with the increasing number of complaints. The disposition of these complaints within a reasonable time will become humanly impossible, and we are fast approaching such a condition to-day.

It is not necessary to give a complete list of its statutory duties to show that it is unreasonable to expect prompt and careful consideration of all matters referred to it. An enumeration of a few of its more important functions will suffice for that purpose. It must hold hearings and render decisions on complaints alleging violation of the interstate commerce act on new schedules of rates which have been suspended pending investigation, on applications for certificates of convenience and necessity covering proposed construction, extension, or abandonment, on applications for authority to issue securities, and on applications for authority for a road to acquire control of other roads. It must supervise the regulation of the general level of rates throughout the country to provide the fair return contemplated by section 15a of the interstate commerce act. It is required to enforce the provisions of the interstate commerce act for the recapture of earnings in excess of a fair return and for the administration of the fund resulting from such recapture. It must supervise and prescribe the methods of accounting for interstate railroads, which entails complicated work, such as that involved in the recent reclassification of carriers' accounts and the order concerning the establishment of depreciation reserves. It is charged with the enforcement of the various Federal laws for the promotion of safety, such as the hours of service act, the safety appliance acts, the boiler inspection act, and the provisions of the Interstate Commerce act concerning automatic train-control devices. It must decide applications for permission for a person to hold a position as officer or director of more than one carrier. It must execute various provisions of the Clayton Antitrust Act, relating to interstate carriers, including the supervision of dealings with other corporations having the same officers. During the year 1926 the commission conducted 1,584 hearings and took over 300,000 pages of testimony. From this brief statement of the volume of the work of the commission it clearly appears that it is physically impossible for the commissioners to give prompt and careful personal attention to the innumerable problems which require the exercise of legislative and judicial power. To a very large extent this work must be delegated to subordinates.

NO SCIENTIFIC METHOD OF RATE MAKING

The commission has not had sufficient time to develop a scientific method of rate making. Thus far our rate making has been by guess and by God, with the emphasis on the last two words. It recalls the story of a little girl in western Kansas, who at her morning prayers, as she was about to return to her Missouri home, said: "Good-by, God, we are going back to Missouri." Her wicked brother, who happened to overhear her and was jubilant at the idea of returning home, used the same words in a sentence, but not with the same emphasis. He said: "Good, by God, we are going back to Missouri."

RATE FIXED BY AGREEMENT

Neither the commission, the experts, the shippers, nor the public have any accurate knowledge of the mileage cost of transportation in any section of the country. Where no objections are filed, rates are fixed by agreement between representatives of shippers and by the traffic associations of the roads. Special interests employ traffic experts to haggle down their own rates, without regard to the additional burdens that those rates settle upon the vast multitude of small shippers, with little knowledge of rates or with too small an interest to warrant the employment of traffic experts.

RULE FOR RATE MAKING

Edgar E. Clark, a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission for 15 or more years and recognized as one of the ablest members of that body, in speaking of our rate structure, said:

> I am firmly of the opinion that there is urgent need of a new system of rate making and no hope of it being achieved except under Federal control or with the Government owning the railroads. The so-called blanket grouping of communities, basing points, etc., growth of competitive conditions, in my humble opinion, make for favoritism and are highly uneconomic. In a word, the freight rate has been frequently used as a sort of protective tariff by means of which favored cities or communities have prospered at the expense of others. The freight rate should be made, under proper classification, on the basis of a terminal charge plus straight mileage cost. We are coming to it some day because it is the only just and logical plan, and I think the sooner it is perfected and adopted the better.

BELOW COST RATES

Under the existing system and due to competitive theories and ignorance of the actual cost of service, we have "below-cost" rates to prevent the active use of our inland waterways; "below-cost" rates from coast to coast. We have import and export rates that barely cover the port-terminal service, much less the real haul and port-terminal charges.

AN EQUITABLE METHOD SHOULD BE ADOPTED

According to exhibits in a pending port investigation covering Atlantic and Gulf ports, the losses upon such classes of traffic are so great as to destroy the small margin of profit upon a vastly greater volume of traffic. The plan to ascertain transportation costs under average conditions in every section of the country is feasible and should be worked out. It would settle the long-and-short-haul controversy and the railroad intercoastal problem, protect inland waterways, conserve railroad transportation, and eliminate the transportation waste. Lastly, it would provide an equitable basis for the establishment of rates for all shippers alike where we now have unreasonably low rates to some points and unreasonably high rates to others.

In the language of President Coolidge it would meet the imperative need of the country—

> An entire reorganization of the rate structure for freight and thus relieve in a large degree the depressed condition of agriculture.

To entirely reorganize the rate structure for freight as suggested by President Coolidge and revise and readjust the rates so as to reapportion the burdens of commerce in rail transit equitably alike to every section and industry is a task of such magnitude and importance to the country as to require years in its performance, in study and attention for its continuous adjustment. It alone is of such character and of such vital importance to all the people and every section of the country as to require the undivided attention of an administrative agency.

With our present machinery overloaded as it is we can not hope for such an accomplishment during the next decade. The only alternative for such relief, as suggested by the President, is to provide for additional machinery of administration.

The existing law should be amended so as to provide for the appointment by the President of three resident deputy commissioners for each of the rate-making groups, with power and specific directions to proceed at once with the revision and readjustment of the freight rates in their respective districts, the Interstate Commerce Commission to be given equalization jurisdiction and power to modify and adjust by raises and decreases, so as to secure and preserve uniform rate level, not only for the district but for the entire country; also to have and exercise original and exclusive jurisdiction over intergroup rates and appellate jurisdiction on the record to hear and determine all complaints on appeal from deputy commissioners; the deputy commissioners in each district to have exclusive original jurisdiction over all complaints, limited to those originating and ending in their group; and the Interstate Commerce Commission to have exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine all intergroup complaints, or complaints including intergroup rates.

Such additional machinery would unload the present commission of much of its detailed and intricate work. It would provide a convenient tribunal in every section of the country to hear and determine group complaints, thousands of which are endured and never filed because of their small amount and the expenditure and length of time required in presenting them to the commission so far distant.

It would afford a complainant a hearing direct before a commissioner responsible to the people and do away with the unsatisfactory procedure of hearing before examiners. It would be setting up procedure in transportation proceedings similar to that which we now have in the civil courts.

In addition to the above it would provide an agency to proceed at once to the very heart of the Nation's need—revision and readjustment of rates.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, thus relieved, would be able to meet the heavy and exacting demands of the intricate and complex problems presented by consolidation of roads, so important to every section of the country. In addition it would be able to render a more efficient administration in its many other fields that will continue to increase in number and importance with the rapidly growing commerce of the country.

More than any other class the farmers are vitally interested in the immediate revision and readjustment of freight rates. They are the only class that is compelled to pay the freight both ways—on everything they sell and everything they buy.

In 1927 they paid approximately $1,000,000,000 in freight rates on their farm products. This did not include forest products. This represented 10 per cent of the total cash income from the sale of farm products and 18.7 per cent of the estimated net farm income for that year. Of the total volume of freight transported over the railroads during 1927, the farmers furnished 11 per cent, and yet by the horizontal increases in freight rates they were compelled to pay 19.8 per cent of the total freight revenues of the roads.

The immediate revision and readjustment of rates on farm products in the Mid West will afford the farmers immediate substantial relief. The reduction in rates will be reflected direct to the farmers in higher prices for their products and a reduction in the prices of their farm implements, building material, and the manufactured goods they purchase from the East.

Here is a method of relief that is workable, sound, and constitutional. The commission is clothed with full power to initiate such revision and readjustment. It needs no additional grant of power from the Congress. Will it drop for the time being the multitude of duties of lesser importance and proceed with its plain duty in this respect as requested by the President five years ago? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, there are some of us here that have amendments which are vital to our section of the country and upon which we are being denied the right to be heard. If the gentleman's time is extended, it will prevent us from having any opportunity to discuss our amendments; therefore I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. GARBER. I thank the gentleman for his courteous consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, the bill we are now considering, H. R. 13512, introduced by Mr. DENISON, of Illinois, provides for certain amendments and improvements to the act of June 3, 1924, creating the Inland Waterways Corporation.

It increases the capital from five million to fifteen million dollars for the purpose of providing additional equipment—that is, barges and towboats—that is now needed to handle the freight business now being offered to the Barge Line, and to provide the necessary equipment for certain extensions already authorized by law and under process of construction.

Mr. DENISON, the author of the bill, has already explained its provisions in clear, understandable language. Because of my limited time I shall not attempt to cover the same facts, but briefly to call your attention to the great need of Iowa and the Middle West for this legislation.

To us of that great section transportation is a very vital thing. We are located in the central part of this great country. To reach the markets of the world, to reach the markets of the thickly populated sections of our own country, to reach the markets of the manufacturing and industrial sections of our country, to bring their products to us, to take our products to them, transportation is absolutely necessary and all essential.

We are proud of our producing ability; of the fact that we furnish America, and to some extent we furnish the world, with the choice things of life, a superior quality of food, of agricultural products. Iowa and the States adjoining and near by supply America with the food products that make life and living worth while, but we must get these products to you, and this means transportation.

We are your great market for your products and will consume them in ever-increasing quantity, thus furnishing you the best market the world offers. This all requires transportation.

Life in Iowa might almost be described as just one shipment after another. We ship in—we ship out; this constant, never-ending shipment or movement of our commodities out and your commodities in—producing, consuming—this exchange of products means prosperity to us of all sections if it be had in the right proportion and at right prices.

Water transportation is the cheapest transportation known. For bulky, heavy commodities for which rapid transportation is not necessary water transportation is especially adapted. The record shows that this class of commodities can be transported by water at about one-third of the cost of moving them by rail. For sugar, grains, coal, iron ore, steel products, cement, building material, lumber, canned foods, and a multitude of similar products transportation by water will mean a large saving.

For years our Government has been spending large sums to bring this about. We have spent about $250,000,000 improving our rivers. Of what value is it unless we use these rivers? This work is not completed, but it is completed sufficiently to prove its immense value, as shown by transportation on the lower Mississippi River and on the Ohio River.

The upper Mississippi is now ready for this barge service. The channel still needs additional improving and the Government has already provided for it; barges and towboats are now in use on the upper Mississippi but in limited numbers, insufficient to handle the freight business that is offered. We need more barges and more towboats. This bill provides the funds to secure them.

Dubuque, Iowa, in my district—a fine, alert, progressive, prosperous city of about 50,000 population—is now completing a dock and terminal system, costing from four hundred to five hundred thousand dollars, to handle incoming and outgoing freight on this barge line. We there have a joint rail rate that carries some of the benefit of the reduced rates into the interior of the country. This is an essential factor in the transportation problem and this bill provides for its extension.

It is greatly to the credit of cities like Dubuque and others that they have used their credit and their money to build modern dock and terminal facilities and lease them to the Inland Waterways Corporation at a low rental for use of the barge line and connecting rail carriers. Without these facilities a demonstration of the usefulness of the barge line would be almost, if not entirely, impossible.

It is not the purpose of those who favor this legislation to keep the Government permanently in the water transportation business. Our purpose is just the opposite—to have the Government dispose of the barge line to the best advantage possible as soon as conditions are such that private capital and business can be induced to take it over and operate it under conditions somewhat similar to those required of other carriers—that all carrier business, rail and water, shall be operated by private business under regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the interest of the whole Nation.

The report of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on this bill gives the following:

DECLARATION OF POLICY

Paragraph (c) of the bill is a declaration of the policy of Congress with reference to the continuance of the operations of the Inland Waterways Corporation and provides the conditions under which the operation of such service by the Government may be terminated and the facilities of the corporation disposed of. It states that it is the policy of Congress to continue the transportation service of the corporation until the following conditions shall have been met: (1) There shall have been completed in the rivers where the corporation operates navigable channels, as authorized by Congress, adequate for reasonably dependable transportation service thereon; (2) terminal facilities shall have been provided on such rivers reasonably adequate for joint rail and water service; (3) there shall have been published and filed under the provisions of the interstate commerce act such joint tariffs with rail carriers as shall make generally available the privileges of joint rail and water transportation upon terms reasonably fair to both rail and water carriers; and (4) private persons, companies, or corporations are ready and willing to engage in common-carrier service on such rivers.

This paragraph of the bill declares the policy of Congress. By this provision Congress announces to the cities along the Mississippi and its tributaries that the service of the corporation will be continued until suitable channels shall have been completed and suitable terminals shall have been provided. These cities will not incur the heavy expenditures for the construction of terminals without some assurance that transportation service will be provided. Modern water transportation by barges and towboats requires a special type of terminal for the exchange of traffic. Such terminals are very expensive, and there can be no private operation of water transportation until such terminals are available. The Government is endeavoring, through the operations of the Inland Waterways Corporation, to encourage the development of transportation on the inland waterways of the country and its operation by private interests. For this purpose Congress announces to the States and municipalities along this river system that the Government will provide this service, and it invites such States or municipalities to construct suitable terminals to the end that private capital may be attracted to invest in the water transportation business.

THE RIVERS ARE OUR NATIONAL HIGHWAYS

The United States has a larger system of navigable rivers than any other country in the world. These rivers are the Nation's natural highways, over which, by the Constitution, the Federal Government is given jurisdiction in the interest of commerce. From our early history it has been the policy of the Government to improve these highways for navigation; we have now expended $250,000,000 from the Public Treasury deepening the channels, revetting the banks, and otherwise improving our rivers for commerce. Sixty million dollars more will be required to complete them. The Monongahela River has already been completed and now more commerce is transported over that river than any other river of the same size in the world. The Warrior River has been completed and is now available for transportation from Birmingport near Birmingham to Mobile, a distance of 440 miles. The Ohio River will soon be completed. Work is now progressing on Dams 52 and 53, and when these dams are completed the Ohio River will be canalized from Pittsburgh to Cairo; and as the work progresses commerce is getting ready to use this great river. The Mississippi has been practically completed from Cairo to the Gulf, and work is now progressing on the upper Mississippi, the Missouri, and the Illinois. But the country will never realize any benefits from the money that has already been expended in the improvement of these rivers until their improvement has been completed.

Now, for what purpose has Congress expended this vast amount of money? Why are we still spending $50,000,000 a year on our rivers and harbors? It has been done in the hope that when improved they would serve as free highways for the Nation's commerce; and this vast expenditure will have been totally lost if commerce is not put back on the rivers when they are improved. In former years there was considerable commerce on our rivers, transported largely by the old packet steamers; but years ago the packet steamers were driven from the rivers by the competition of the railroads, and commerce practically disappeared from our inland waterways.

Water transportation is the cheapest transportation that is known. The cheapest transportation in the world is on the Great Lakes. The Inland Waterways Corporation is transporting freight on the Mississippi and Warrior Rivers at a substantial profit for about 4 mills per ton-mile, while the average rail rate in this country is 11 mills per ton-mile. It is impossible for the railroads to transport freight as cheaply as it can be transported by water. The older countries of Europe appreciated the economy of water transportation generations ago and have utilized their rivers and canals as their principal means of transportation. The cheaper transportation made available by the operations of the Inland Waterways Corporation on the Mississippi River from St. Louis to New Orleans has resulted in a direct saving to the farmers of the Middle West of from 1½ to 3 cents a bushel on their wheat. It can readily be seen what a possibility for substantial savings there will be for the farmers of the country if this service can be made more generally available by improving the tributaries of the Mississippi and developing privately owned transportation thereon.

The principal difficulty in recent years with American agriculture has been that our great farming area lies so far in the interior of the country that the cost of transporting supplies from the seaboard to the farming communities and of transporting the products of the farm to the seaboard has largely wiped out the farmers' profits. In the Argentine Republic and in Australia and other countries which compete with the United States in agricultural products the agricultural sections are located near the sea, and the farmers do not suffer from the high cost of rail transportation, as is the case in the United States.

Another result of the vastness of our territory and the location of our great farming interests in the interior of the country has been the inability of our interior communities to build up and support industries, and the unnatural concentration of industrial development along our seaboard. This requires the agricultural communities to pay high rail transportation on all the supplies they have to buy and high rail transportation on all the products they have to sell. If great industries could be located in the interior part of the country, if population could be increased nearer the agricultural regions, so that agriculture could find a market for its products nearer home and could purchase its supplies from sources nearer home, the burden of transportation would be largely eliminated and agriculture in this country would to that extent be rehabilitated. These natural difficulties to our agricultural sections can be largely overcome by the improvement of our rivers and by providing the interior sections of our country with cheaper transportation which our great inland waterways can afford.

It is believed by the committee that with the development of our inland waterways and the return of commerce thereon the great interior sections of the country will be developed industrially, and will be made more accessible to the sea, and the burden of expensive rail transportation from the interior to the seaboard will be largely overcome. It is said by some of the best transportation men of the country that the transportation business of the United States will double every 15 years or less. It is the duty of Congress to look to the future and encourage the development of adequate transportation facilities to care for this increasing commerce of the country. The development of commerce on our waterways will do no serious injury to the railroads. It will merely afford a supplemental system to aid the railroads in taking care of the commerce of the future. And it is certainly the duty of Congress to encourage the development of any kind of transportation that will promise to the people of the country, and particularly of the agricultural sections, a cheaper form of transportation.

So, looking forward to the future and realizing the rapid growth of our population and the inevitable increase in the transportation business of the country, and appreciating the desirability of affording to the country the cheapest possible transportation that can be made available, the committee believes that it will be wise for Congress to do what it reasonably can to further carry out the purposes expressed in section 500 of the transportation act of 1920 and carry on for a while the work now being done by the Inland Waterways Corporation, with a view to removing as fast as possible those conditions which have in the past prevented, and are still preventing, the investment of private capital in transportation facilities on our inland waterways.

The Inland Waterways Corporation has been doing splendid work. It is showing to the country the practicability and the economy of water transportation. It is developing suitable types of barges and towboats for the different rivers and the most economical use of fuels for such facilities. It is developing the most suitable and economical terminal facilities, and is showing to the country the economies that will be available by the joint use of rail and water service.

With these obstacles largely overcome, it is the belief of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that private capital will readily invest in transportation on our waterways; the Government will have done its full duty in fostering such transportation, and can then dispose of the facilities of the corporation and withdraw from this service which has been so necessary and which it is now carrying on with the promise of such marked success.

This transportation by water is not for the purpose of harming other and very necessary transportation, but that together, working in harmony, rail and water transportation, may bring to our people cheaper transportation for the class of commodities that can as well be transported in this slower way in large bulk and quantity and help solve the problem of freight facilities for the increased transportation business of the future.

It is not a very large thing that we are asking of you. The Middle West is entitled to a fair trial of river freight transportation. It has already proven its success on the lower Mississippi. We believe it will prove it on the upper Mississippi, and that together, upper and lower Mississippi, and tributaries its success will be still greater, and the ultimate benefit to our people of all sections of our country will be well worthy of the effort. [Applause.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WRIGHT: Page 3, line 1, after the word "any," strike out the words "tributary or"; also strike out all of line 2, on page 3, up to the word "not," and insert in lieu thereof the words "navigable river or waterway of the United States."

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, under the provision of this bill it is sought to extend this barge-line service on tributaries of the Mississippi, not including the Ohio. Heretofore, as I understand it, the service has been confined to the Mississippi and to certain streams in the State of Alabama, including the Warrior River. This bill proposes to maintain this service, but in addition to extend it to tributaries of the Mississippi River, not including the Ohio.

Gentlemen of the committee, why make a ward or a pet of the tributaries of the Mississippi River and treat every other river in the United States as an orphan and an outcast?

Mr. WYANT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I will.

Mr. WYANT. The shippers along the Monongahela, the Allegheny, and the Ohio do not want the operation of Government barges in those rivers. They appeared before the committee and protested against it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not know what they want out there, but I know various States in the United States would very much like to have this barge-line service extended.

Mr. ABERNETHY. And we want it on the inland waterway.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes. This does not mean that just any river in the United States would be eligible, but it means a river which may become navigable and a river which meets the requirements laid down in this bill. So why exclude every river in the United States except tributaries of the Mississippi, especially in view of what we have just done for the Mississippi and the people in that great section.

I think this bill is absolutely discriminatory and should not pass the House in this form. If this service is good for transportation on the Mississippi and its tributaries, why not for every waterway of the United States? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 4, line 11, after the word "carriers," strike out the semicolon and insert a period and strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as time is limited, I will only take three minutes. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with this bill, but I am not in accord with the policy stated by the sponsors of the bill and intended to enact into law that the purpose or policy of the Government is to inaugurate this barge service, build it up, operate if the returns show a loss, and when the operation is at such profit-paying basis as to invite private persons, companies, or corporations to express their willingness to carry on the service, then immediately and automatically put the Government out of business.

I am for Government operation of transportation, and I do not hesitate to say so. I will be frank about it. Now, let me point out, with such a policy in the law, I am sure the committee does not want to go as far as this bill does, any time a private company or corporation is willing to take up the service because it is profitable the Government may, by the commitment contained in the bill, be compelled to cease operations and turn the business over to private operation. I do not see why you can not strike out that expression of policy and let a future Congress decide if the Government is to go out of business. I do not believe that after the Government has initiated and built up the service it should give it up. If the Government is to operate it, build it up, and sustain the losses, let us provide that the Government shall operate when it is profitable.

I want to say that many of the sponsors of this measure are the most rabid anti-Government operation men, including the distinguished chairman of the committee, my colleague from New York [Mr. PARKER], and yet they are people who come here and say that this river transportation is necessary, that we have got to have it, that private corporations or private initiative will not take hold of it, that we have got to do it, and we have to increase the capitalization and are going to do it; but as soon as it is a profitable, paying business, as soon as that private company or corporation expresses a desire to carry on the operation, then we will go out of the business. Then after this pioneer work is over, it will be pointed out that the Government operated at a loss and private companies at a profit. That is not fair. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. TARVER: Page 3, line 2, after the word "waterway," insert the words "of the Mobile River or."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is vital to that part of the country which I have the honor to represent. At this time the Inland Waterways Corporation is operating on the Mississippi River, and also on the Mobile River and the Tombigbee River and the Warrior River. It operates on every river of the Mobile River system except the Alabama-Coosa, a tributary of that system that runs 750 miles into northwest Georgia on which there originates commerce worth $200,000,000 annually.

You are extending the benefits of this law to tributaries of the Mississippi which may in the future become navigable, and if you are going to extend it to every tributary of that river why should you exclude the tributaries of the Mobile River which do not receive these benefits now? I am asking you for fair treatment in behalf of this great country from which I come. I am asking you not to discriminate against these people that would be benefited by the operation of barge lines on the Alabama-Coosa River. I ask you to extend the benefits of this law to all the tributaries of the Mobile River, including the Alabama-Coosa River extending 750 miles into my district from the Mobile, as you are proposing to extend them to tributaries of the Mississippi.

In common with other Members of Congress from my State and my section I have been supporting all legislation proposed in the interest of the Mississippi Valley people. I have felt a deep interest in their problems and I have tried to work in cooperation with them. I now appeal to their Representatives not to vote to discriminate against the people living along this tributary of the Mobile River, but to include that tributary as you have included all tributaries of the Mobile River system with this exception, and to authorize, when it shall be made navigable, operation of barge lines thereon by the Inland Waterways Corporation in the same manner that you are authorizing such operation on tributaries of the Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TARVER) there were—ayes 35, noes 81.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interfere but I should like to be heard for a very few minutes on this proposition.

Mr. PARKER. Under an agreement I was forced to make by the House, I agreed to move to rise in 30 minutes. If the gentleman wants to force me to make that motion, I shall have to do it.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel like taking that responsibility, but I do regard the debate upon this bill as very insufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDRESEN: Page 3, line 3, after the word "been" insert the words "completed or."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HUDSON: Page 3, line 1, strike out, beginning with line 1, all the following lines, including line 23.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HUDSON) there were—ayes 7, noes 62.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. McDUFFIE: Page 2, line 2, after the word "river," insert the words "and the Warrior River system."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I have three perfecting amendments, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DENISON offers the following amendment: Page 1, line 7, after the figures "1924," insert the following: "(152, ch. 2, title 49, Code of Laws of the United States; ch. 243, vol. 43, p. 360, United Statutes at Large)."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DENISON: Page 4, line 22, after the word "facilities," insert a comma and the following words: "or any unit thereof."

Mr. DENISON. That amendment, Mr. Chairman, will authorize the sale or lease of the corporation's facilities on the Warrior River, which is one unit, separately from the facilities of the corporation on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, which is or will be a separate unit.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DENISON: Page 5, line 7, after the word "corporation," strike out the semicolon and insert a comma and the following words: "together with ample security by bond or otherwise to insure the faithful performance of such agreement."

Mr. DENISON. That amendment, as well as one similar to the last one, was asked by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following perfecting amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HOCH: Page 5, line 25, strike out the words and figures "subsection 3" and insert "paragraph (3)."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FROTHINGHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13512) to amend the act entitled "An act to create the Inland Waterways Corporation for the purpose of carrying out the mandate and purpose of Congress, as expressed in sections 201 and 500 of the transportation act, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1924, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PARKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

R. 11133) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and that the Senate recedes from its amendment No. 1 to said bill.

REAPPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 207, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 207

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 11725, a bill for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed three hours, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing the bill, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall arise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes in order the bill H. R. 11725, which is commonly known as the reapportionment bill. By the terms of the Constitution a Federal census is taken once every 10 years. By the terms of the same Constitution it is contemplated that this Congress shall reapportion the Representatives in this body once in every 10 years.

Beginning with 1790, the Congress of the United States has observed carefully this constitutional provision down to and including the year 1910; and after each decennial census there has been a reapportionment within two years after the taking of the census until 1920. The matter of reapportionment has been before Congress constantly since 1920.

In the Sixty-sixth Congress, as well as in the Sixty-seventh Congress, Congress by a majority vote decided not to reapportion. The technical reason given by the Members at that time was that the census was not fair; that we were just following up a great war; that the people throughout the country were not settled; that they were not at home, if you please, when the census was taken; and many have thought that that census was inaccurate, and that disadvantage would be given to certain communities, and they based their opposition to a census bill or reapportionment bill, as evidenced by the debate here, upon such bottom.

But, Mr. Speaker, the real motive that I think is generally understood by the House to have operated in defeating the reapportionment legislation is the fact that certain States will lose, provided the number of Representatives is kept at 435. In my judgment there has not been a time since 1920 when this Congress would not by a majority vote have reapportioned, provided that every State retain the number of Members now sitting in this body, and that increases be provided in other States.

One proposition was to increase the number to 483. Another proposition was to increase it to 460. To increase the number to 483 under the 1920 census would permit each State to retain its present number of sitting Members. But there must come a time, Mr. Speaker, when we must discontinue this increasing. In the years gone by we have continually increased the number of Members of the House until to-day this body has reached a size where it is unwieldy. If the size is increased, the Hall must be enlarged. No good results, in my judgment, can come from an increase in the size of the membership of this House; there are too many now.

Now, I shall not undertake to explain this bill in detail. It will be explained fully by members of the Committee on the Census. But it does deal with matters in a way whereby those Members whose States will now lose will not be embarrassed by voting for that kind of a bill.

This is anticipatory legislation. It seems to meet an emergency situation which might develop after the census of 1930. We have faced this emergency so far as reapportionment is concerned since the census of 1920, and I think I am speaking the truth when I say that there are enough States losing under the 1920 census that any reapportionment in this Congress is impossible unless, of course, the number of Representatives be increased, and I am satisfied that the sentiment of the country is opposed to a greater number in this body at this time. There is every reason to believe that some States will lose under the 1930 census, and the Census Bureau estimates that in order to prevent any State losing the number of Representatives it now has that the number of Representatives must be increased to approximately 550 Members. If I am right in my conclusion as to why Congress has been unable to function in the matter of reapportionment since 1920, then there is much more reason to believe that it will be increasingly difficult to do the same constitutional task after the census of 1930.

Some objections have been raised to the provision in the bill permitting the Secretary of Commerce to perform certain ministerial acts. As to the constitutionality of this provision I have no doubt. The Supreme Court has recognized delegated power in the Tariff Commission, in the Treasury Department, and in the Interstate Commerce Commission far exceeding any power here delegated. In 1850 the Thirtieth Congress provided that the future reapportionment made on the basis of the 1850 census should be made by the Secretary of the Interior, and it was so made and approved.

Much discussion has been had in reference to the method mentioned in the bill, and known as the "method of major fractions." A full explanation of this procedure is contained in the committee report, copies of which are in the hands of the members. If this method is not acceptable to the House, then the method of "equal proportions" may be substituted when the bill is under consideration. We are told by the mathematicians that each method is mathematically correct. Every Member in this body holds his seat to-day by virtue of the reapportionment of 1910, at which time the method of "major fractions" was used, and I have yet to hear any criticism of that system as adopted in 1910, and it strikes me that the objections here raised in this particular are resorted to by opponents of any reapportionment that does not increase the size of the House.

The following States would lose under an apportionment of a House of 435 Members based on the 1920 census:

Indiana	1
Iowa	1
Kansas	1
Kentucky	1
Louisiana	1
Maine	1
Mississippi	1
Missouri	2
Nebraska	1
Rhode Island	1
Vermont	1
Total	12

The probable losses in representation by States on the basis of estimated population of approximately 123,000,000 for 1930, with the size of the House at 435, are as follows:

Alabama	1
Indiana	2
Iowa	2
Kansas	1
Kentucky	2
Louisiana	1
Maine	1
Massachusetts	1
Mississippi	2
Missouri	3
Nebraska	1
New York	1
North Dakota	1
Pennsylvania	1
Tennessee	1
Vermont	1
Virginia	1
Total	23

The probable gains in representation by States on the basis of the estimated population for 1930, with the size of the House at 435, are as follows:

Arizona	1
California	6
Connecticut	1
Florida	1
Michigan	4
New Jersey	2
North Carolina	1
Ohio	3
Oklahoma	1
Texas	2
Total	23

The Congress must eventually meet the issue as to whether or not the size of the House is to be increased every 10 years, and I doubt if there are those present who would advocate a continuous increase. Therefore it seems the part of wisdom and statesmanship to meet the issue squarely at this time. For my own part I am convinced that this body would be more efficient with 300 Members than with its present 435, and I will vote to reduce the number accordingly. This is not a matter of partisan politics. It is not a sectional question. It is a constitutional question and requires unbiased consideration and unselfish action.

I do not believe there will be any opposition to the rule which we are now considering making consideration of this bill in order at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I agree with almost everything that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] has said. But there are some things on which I do not agree with him. The first thing on which I agree with him is that this bill should be considered. I am opposed to the bill, but I am in favor of the rule. The bill comes from one of the great committees of the House; a committee which has given a perplexing proposition careful consideration and has tried to meet a practical situation and solve a difficult problem. I think they are entitled to have their bill considered, and I hope there is no one here who is opposed to the principles of the bill who will vote not to give it consideration.

Now, I agree in some other respects with the gentleman from Michigan. I believe that this House is large enough. In former years when confronted with reapportionment of the House membership after each decennial census the Congress has done the easy thing and increased the membership, so that no State would lose in its membership. I understand if this practice is followed, in 1930 the membership of this House would be 100 more than it is now. If you keep up this practice, it will not be many years until we have a House here of 700 or 800 Members. The House now is large enough.

If the House membership is kept at the present number of 435, my State will lose one or two or maybe three Members; no one knows exactly. In the winter of 1920–21 the short session, a bill to reapportion the House membership passed this House, holding the number down to 435, and under the estimate then made Iowa would have lost a Member, and every Member on the Iowa delegation agreed that I individually had the poorest location strategically in the State as it would have been impossible to redistrict the State without pushing me into the district of one of my colleagues and thereby eliminating me from this service. Notwithstanding that, and notwithstanding that Iowa would lose, I was so firmly convinced that the membership of the House was large enough that I with one other Iowa Member of the House who was going out, voted for the 435 and against the increase.

I believe in facing my responsibilities and my duties manfully and with my eyes open. We are going to take a census in 1930. This Congress will in the short session of the next Congress have the reapportioning to do. If I am here then I am willing to face that proposition, and I am going on record now in saying that I will oppose an increase in the membership of this House. But I want to face that situation with my eyes wide open.

Some of you fellows who were raised on a farm have probably had the experience of trying to lead a horse into a place where he did not want to go or was afraid to go. You blindfolded him, petted him a little, got him less nervous, and then led him into the place where he should have gone with his eyes open. Now, the proposal here is based on the assumption that you are too cowardly to face the situation when the time comes. That you are afraid of the consequences and that you have not the intelligence and patriotism to do that which is wisest for the country in 1931. Therefore, confessing to yourselves that you lack the intelligence, the patriotism, and the courage to face an embarrassing situation manfully when it shall come before you during the second session of the next Congress, you are going to blindfold yourselves by passing this bill and let somebody else lead you into doing that which you now say to yourselves should be done in the future, three years hence. That is the whole proposition in a nutshell. I am for reapportionment immediately following the 1930 census. On principle I am opposed to telling some one else to do what is the duty of this Congress to do. To reapportion and to hold down the membership of the House is a duty imposed by the Constitution on Congress. I am not going to announce to the world by voting for this bill that the next Congress will not have the intelligence, courage, and patriotism to make a wise reapportionment of the Members of this House. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am opposed to the principles and provisions of this bill, and I trust it will be defeated on the final vote in the House. For that reason I opposed the rule in the Committee on Rules, and I shall vote against the adoption of the resolution provided for in the rule, although I do not insist that anybody else should do so. I think it is probably fair, in view of the importance of this proposition, and in view of the criticism that has been indulged in upon the part of the press and other sources, that this matter should at least have consideration.

Gentlemen, I am opposed to this bill primarily for the reason so well stated by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER]. If the Congress of the United States is legitimately subject to any criticism or odium for failing to perform a so-called constitutional mandate to pass a reapportionment bill, certainly we can well afford to wait two more years in order to get the real facts of the new census to guide the Congress in making its decision on this question of reapportionment. In other words, if we have neglected our constitutional duty, we have neglected it now for some eight years, and certainly neither our reputations nor the safety of the country could suffer much by a continuance of the proposition for two years more.

This is merely a gesture in effect. Whatever this Congress does with reference to reapportionment under the census of 1930 would in no wise, either constitutionally or morally, be binding upon the Congress which will come into effect two years from now. For that reason it seems to me it is the part of wisdom, as well as of courage and of intelligence, that the Congress whose duty it will be to reapportion the country under the census of 1930 should be trusted with the performance of that duty.

It has been asserted that the census of 1920 does not now afford a fair basis for any attempt to make a reapportionment. It will be pointed out to you by those who will speak on the bill that that was a time of instability of population; that the country had not had time to readjust itself from the migrations incident to the World War; and, in fact, gentlemen, when this next census is taken there may be some rather startling revelations with reference to an equitable and just reapportionment of the country based upon the population of 1930.

There is another proposal here which I do not like. Congress from time to time has been justly charged with abdicating a great many of its constitutional duties and functions, and here is a proposal that the Congress of the United States, which is charged with this responsibility under their oaths, shall abdicate it and turn it over in advance, upon a mathematical thesis, if I may call it that, to the executive branch of the Government, in effect, to reapportion the Congress of the United States, and I am opposed to that principle. [Applause.] If Congress of the United States itself, when it convenes after the census has been taken, has not the wisdom, the courage, and the prudence to take into consideration all of the practical factors and equations in the case then certainly our forefathers should not have lodged that duty in us. I think, as the part of wisdom, as a matter of practical politics—and I speak that in its highest and best sense—and as a matter of carrying out our duties under the Constitution we ought to postpone this reapportionment until the next census is taken, because it might be the best judgment of this House, in order that no State might lose its representation in Congress, that the membership of this body should be increased. We do not know what is going to be the judgment or the will of the Congress after the census of 1930.

In view of these propositions it seems to me, gentlemen, this bill ought not to pass, but that we ought to defer action until we have all the facts before us, and then perform courageously our constitutional duty.

Mr. CELLER and Mr. LINTHICUM rose.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; if I have the time.

Mr. CELLER. I would like to get the gentleman's view as to the constitutionality of this delegation of authority. Is it not a delegation of legislative authority?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I assume, although I have not given that question any serious consideration, that it is a delegation of authority that might well be carried out under the terms of this bill. I have not investigated that and I am not prepared from the standpoint of a lawyer really to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman realizes that under this bill the Department of Commerce would have the right and the duty of taking the census, and if this bill should pass in its present form we would be delegating to that same department that takes the census and passes on it also the power to reapportion Congress.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; that is true; and there is another feature of this bill, gentlemen, I want to call to your attention. According to the language of the bill this is not a temporary expedient that we are framing up here in order to meet some criticism that has been hurled at the Congress of the United States because of its failure to perform its constitutional duty. Under this bill you are preparing a perpetual system by which every 10 years, if for any reason the Congress of the United States should fail to make the apportionment, the Secretary of Commerce for all time to come will have that right vested in him.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield first to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] asked the question I had in mind.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Is there anything in this bill, if enacted, that would prevent the first Congress meeting after the census from reapportioning the country regardless of what we do here now?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why, absolutely nothing. As I argued a few moments ago, if we should pass this bill and set up this formula of reapportionment based upon the contingencies expressed in the bill, the Congress which it would affect would have the constitutional right to come in and absolutely repeal, modify, or change it in any particular. So I say it is merely a legislative gesture in its present form.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. But in case the Congress at that time should not make the reapportionment, then this bill, if enacted, would apply.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think it would, if held to be constitutional.

Mr. LOZIER and Mr. JACOBSTEIN rose.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield first to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. LOZIER. This proposed legislation does not purport to attempt to do anything now?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No.

Mr. LOZIER. It is obviously anticipatory legislation; and, reduced to its lowest terms is not all this bill does to declare a national policy and attempt to commit subsequent Congresses to an adherence to that policy?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think that is a good analysis of this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Does the gentleman find that Congress has ever undertaken to make an apportionment prior to the census being actually taken?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not that I know of.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield there for a correction?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I think the gentleman will find that in 1850 the Congress did do exactly what is being done under this bill, and the reapportionment was actually made by anticipation.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. How far in anticipation?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Just like is proposed under this bill—one Congress in advance.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman does not mean to say that Congress delegated the power to make the apportionment?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. That is exactly what I mean to say. The Congress delegated to the Secretary of the Interior the right to apportion, and the apportionment was made and accepted by the Congress and its constitutionality was never questioned.

Mr. RANKIN. It took the gentleman from New York a long time to find that out, because the gentleman has been on the committee two years and has been engaged in the hearings and this is the first time the gentleman has ever mentioned it.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I have stated the facts.

Mr. MICHENER. I might state that that fact is included in the committee report.

Mr. RANKIN. It is not in the committee hearing.

Mr. MICHENER. It is in the report.

Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS]. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, personally I am opposed to this legislation, and if I am able to get a little time under the general debate on the bill I will try to explain the reasons for my opposition to the legislation. The matter we have before us at this time, however, is the rule reported out by the Rules Committee making in order the consideration of the bill reported by the Committee on the Census.

I think it is the duty of the House to give consideration to this bill and to the report of the Committee on the Census. As has been said, the Committee on the Census is one of the great committees of the House. In this matter it is dealing with a great constitutional question. It has given a great deal of attention to this subject, a great deal of thought and investigation, and has presented here a measure representing the best thought and the best effort of this great committee.

This is a matter of such supreme importance to the whole country and to the Congress that it seems to me there should be no opposition on the part of anyone, whether they favor the legislation or oppose it, to giving it an opportunity to be heard and determined on the floor of the House.

I am opposed to the legislation for the reasons so well stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. It seems to me that at most this is but an idle legislative gesture. If Congress feels it should take action at this time and that we should have an apportionment, which we should have had seven years ago, the courageous and the right thing to do would be to consider an apportionment bill, but this is not an apportionment bill.

This is simply anticipatory legislation seeking to bind the Congress that is to succeed us, that has jurisdiction over the matter and will have the right to determine the policy of the House at that time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Would not this bill have this merit: That if the Congress did not see fit to do its duty at the next session, after the census was taken this would be a kind of penalty hanging over it to make it take action?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I do not know whether you would call it a virtue or a vice.

Mr. KINCHELOE. In other words, if Congress does not do its duty, we let the Secretary of Commerce do it?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Congress surrenders its power given it under the Constitution. If the Congress fails to act at the next session, after the census is taken we have abrogated our power to control the matter.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. The gentleman does not mean to say that the Secretary of Commerce has any discretion?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. No; it is merely a ministerial act. He acts in a ministerial capacity. But by this bill this Congress is doing work under the Constitution which is the duty of a subsequent Congress to perform. I am not willing to say here and now that the Congress that will sit here in 1931 will either be lacking in ability or in integrity to do its duty under the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.] However, I think we should all vote for the rule, give the matter full and fair discussion, and then vote down the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it has been said that this legislation is anticipatory, that this Congress is attempting to bind a future Congress, and upon which a future Congress may act. I am against the rule because I think the Congress should act after the census has been taken. Because the Sixty-sixth Congress failed to do its duty is no reason why we at this period should anticipate the action of a future Congress. Regardless of what the population will be in 1930, we are arbitrarily fixing the number of Members of the House of Representatives at 435 and placing it in legislation. If a future Congress thinks the House should be composed of 460 Members and the President should disagree and veto such legislation, we would be required to pass such a bill by a two-thirds majority, to override a presidential veto, or accept this bill as the basis of the size of the House.

Something has been said about delegating authority to the Secretary of Commerce. There is a delegation of legislative power to the President that goes to the sanctity of the House itself. Therefore I do not believe that we should engineer the House into that position, but should leave it to Congress to act after the constitutional provisions for the census have been taken, when they can act with intelligence at that time.

It is true that there are certain States that will lose representation; that perhaps will be true under any apportionment or adjustment, but it ought not to be left to the Secretary of Commerce, it ought not to be left to the power of the President to veto the bill that may fix the new apportionment and require us to override a veto, but should be left to that Congress to deal with when the time arrives based upon the future census.

So I for one will vote against the rule and vote against the bill, and will not vote for any reapportionment that does not state in the body of the bill how many Representatives the State of Indiana is entitled to have and the number every other State will have. I think that fulfills my constitutional duty and thereby not leaving it to the Secretary of Commerce or any other power to decide. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman hit the nail when he said that this provides a formula. It merely provides the procedure whereby we guarantee fulfillment of the constitutional provision in reference to reapportionment in case, perchance, another Congress should be as derelict of duty regarding reapportionment as the present Congress has been.

No future Congress will be bound in any way unless that Congress desires to be so bound. We are simply providing that the Congress in the future after the next census shall be taken shall be composed of 435 Members. We are laying down a formula or plan, so to speak, to be worked by the Secretary of Commerce. We are not delegating any discussion. If the Congress to which this gentleman refers does not agree with what we have done, that Congress may change; but in case it fails to act, then as long as this statute stands upon the books we are assuring a representative Government to the people. [Applause.]

We are drifting along and getting back into the old English borough system. There is no man here who will deny that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the census should be taken every 10 years, and that immediately after the taking of that census that there should be a reapportionment in order that we might have representative Government. I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] now whether he would vote for a 435 membership under the 1920 census?

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MICHENER. No; of course, the gentleman would not so vote, but these gentlemen here representing States where they lose Representatives are objecting, and why? They are objecting because they fear that their State will lose. I sympathize with them, but still to me the question of whether or not we shall abide by the Constitution is a greater question than whether or not perchance a particular individual shall lose his seat in Congress. I admire the statement made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER], who said that he appreciated the constitutional direction, and that even though it might cost him his seat in Congress he felt constrained to vote for that which he believed to be his constitutional duty. To me it is just a question of whether or not we want to comply with the terms of the Constitution.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. In other words, the gentleman proposes to enact a law by this vicious Congress to make the next Congress more virtuous than this one? [Laughter.]

Mr. MICHENER. No; I do not want to cast any aspersions on this Congress, but I do say that this Congress has shown a dreadful lack of courage.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. In 1921 when the bill was being considered in this House providing for a representation of 460 Members in the House of Representatives the gentleman from Michigan voted to recommit that bill to the committee without instruction, thereby defeating the legislation in that Congress.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes. I voted to recommit.

Mr. LOZIER. Does the gentleman think that he was derelict in his duty in voting to recommit that bill in 1921 which deprived his own State of three or four additional Representatives in Congress?

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman from Michigan felt that 435 was a large enough number, and the gentleman from Michigan did not want to increase the number. There was no reason on earth why 460 should be adopted arbitrarily unless it was to take care of some States like the gentleman's State.

Mr. LOZIER. Does the gentleman think he was derelict in his duty and that he violated his oath to the Constitution when he voted to recommit this bill in 1921, thereby destroying the possibility of any reapportionment at that time?

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman certainly has no such notion, but the gentleman from Missouri would not vote for any bill anywhere, anyhow, which deprived his State of its present representation. I decline to yield further.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. The very question raised by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] calls attention to the dangerous situation unless we pass this bill. Gentlemen who want reapportionment are lined up with those who do not want reapportionment, to defeat a reapportionment bill. You get a combination of men who really desire reapportionment and who do not want the House to be greater than 435 Members lined up with those who do not want reapportionment, a situation which we have had for 10 years, so that while the gentleman performed his duty in 1921, yet in doing it he actually joined forces with those who did not want any reapportionment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think it might be fairly stated that the crux of the gentleman's argument is that we should insist on the limitation of 435 Members of Congress. Does not the gentleman think that the Congress succeeding this one has the absolute right to an untrammeled expression of its own views on that question?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; and it will have. There is no question about that. If this bill is taken up for consideration under this rule, it will be subject to amendment, and if there are sufficient Members who want to amend the bill and increase the number, that will be their privilege.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In other words, we are doing a thing now with our eyes open, which we recognize is within the power of the succeeding Congress to change.

Mr. MICHENER. We are doing that now which the gentleman from Alabama has objected to doing since 1920.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I do not see any difference, so far as the Constitution is concerned, between the position of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER]. The gentleman from Michigan refuses to vote for a bill that provides more than 435 Members in the House, and the gentleman from Missouri will not vote for a bill that does not have more than that number. So far as the Constitution is concerned, one is just as guilty as the other. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, like the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] I was one of those who voted to recommit the bill which provided for a membership of 460 Members in this House, and every man who voted that way did so because he felt that 435 was a large enough membership.

Mr. DOWELL. And the gentleman is willing to kill the bill for that reason?

Mr. BARBOUR. I have not yielded to the gentleman from Iowa. If the gentleman from Missouri and his colleagues on the Census Committee had done their duty and not blocked action by that committee the committee would have reported out a bill providing for 435 Members, as the House indicated by its vote it should do. The committee has been delinquent in its duty in not reporting out such a bill.

Mr. LOZIER. Why, I was not even a Member of Congress at that time. [Laughter.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11725. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that the time be controlled equally by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11725, and asks unanimous consent that the time be equally controlled on one side by himself and on the other by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]. Is there objection to his request?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut.

The motion was agreed to.

Tse SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] will kindly take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11725, with Mr. CHINDBLOM in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11725, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11725) for the reapportionment of Representatives in Congress.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the committee, this bill accomplishes two things; one with some degree of permanence, and the other only tentatively. First is the provision that the Secretary of Commerce, after a census is reported, shall prepare a statement under which Members of Congress are apportioned to the respective States. The second fixes the number of Members and is in a measure tentative. Indeed there had to be some number given in order that the Secretary of Commerce might act. That number is 435, the present membership of the House.

I am strongly in favor of this bill, for two reasons. In the first place, we have very naturally subjected ourselves to some reproach because we have not complied with the constitutional provision for a reapportionment under the census of 1920. The point I wish to impress upon you is that the same situation will probably—I might almost say inevitably—arise under the census of 1930.

I have been here when apportionments were made under the acts of 1890, 1900, and 1910. The sentiment of the House in each of these three cases was decidedly against an increase of membership. In fact, those who advocated or submitted to an increase of membership said, "Never again; that is the last time that there shall be an increase. The House is too large already." But the insistence of Members from States which lost Members in each case prevailed, so that the number was increased from 325 to 356, 385 approximately, and under the census of 1910, to 435.

Now it has been said here that we are saying to the next Congress what it shall do. That is not correct. This is but tentative. If the Congress elected in 1928 has courage and wisdom and can agree upon a bill, then it will take one up and pass it, and this one, giving authority to the Secretary of Commerce to make a statement, will be wiped off the statute books.

It is no reflection on the courage of the Congress elected in 1928 if there is recognition of the fact that the same situation which accrued after the census of 1920 is very likely to occur again in 1930. Indeed, I think the probabilities are very strong that it will occur again in 1930, or after the census of 1930, because of that irrepressible conflict between those who do not wish to increase the size of the House and those who do not wish to allow their respective States to have a decrease in membership.

I might say here by way of explanation that it should not be regarded as such a calamity that a State should lose part of its membership. On page 189 of the Congressional Directory a statement is given showing the representation under each census, beginning in 1790. There is none of the older States but has sometime lost some of its membership, Virginia perhaps most of all, frequently; next, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland. Every one of those States lost some of its Members.

The question is one which we should look at from the broad standpoint of the general good of the country and the efficiency of this House of Representatives. An argument is occasionally made in regard to the size of the Chamber of Deputies in France and the House of Commons in England. The House of Commons in England has more than 600 members. I wish to call attention to the very great difference. The very great majority of members of both of those bodies never express themselves on the floor. They are not regular in their attendance. There is a certain honor attached to a manufacturer or a business man or a man in some other vocation to be a member of the House of Commons, but he takes no active part in the deliberations. If you will consult Hansard you will find a very small proportion, comparatively, of the members of the House of Commons who ever take part in the proceedings.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. I would rather not. I prefer not to be diverted from the line of statement I am pursuing. I am frank to say I am very strongly in favor of limiting the size of the House of Representatives to 435. I say here frankly and bluntly that I would rather fail to comply with the constitutional provision than to see the size of this House increased.

There has been a good deal that has happened within the last few days which, I think, shows how disorderly we are liable to become, how the cry of "Vote" may drown out legitimate debate, and the larger we become the less efficiently we will function. I can not describe to you too strongly the difference between the transaction of business in this House when I first became a Member of it, when there were only 325 Members, as now compared with 435. The average ability is no less to-day, but the distinction of membership is less; the opportunity of the individual Member is less and the tendency is toward disorder and inefficiency in the transaction of business, and that is sure to increase. So I say, let us meet the constitutional requirement by providing a way. It is ministerial only. The Secretary of Commerce will not be usurping anything; he is not to take away any right of the Congress.

Ministerial duties are assigned to members of the Cabinet much more far-reaching than this. So I say, gentlemen, we should vote for this bill and pass it. It will provide for the future. We can, in the next Congress—and I speak as though we were all going to be here, and most of us will, I expect—change it and pass any bill we please. We could pass a bill increasing the size of the House, although I should much deplore that; we could make a change in the major fractions, though that was advocated by Thomas Jefferson and has been followed since.

Mr. LOZIER. Does the gentleman say the major-fraction theory was advocated by Jefferson?

Mr. BURTON. I believe so.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not true that Jefferson advocated the rejection of all fractions?

Mr. BURTON. That statement is made in a book of some authority as being so, and I think it is correct. I just want to read a few words from James Madison in regard to a larger body:

> The people can never err more than in supposing that by multiplying their Representatives beyond a certain limit they strengthen the barrier against the government of a few. Experience will forever admonish them that, on the contrary, after securing a sufficient number for the purposes of safety, of local information, and a diffusive sympathy with the whole society, they will counteract their own views by every addition to their Representatives. The countenance of the Government may become more democratic, but the soul that animates it will be more oligarchic. The machine will be enlarged, but the fewer, and often the more secret, will be the springs by which its motions are directed.

The delusion of believing that an increase in the size of the House makes it more democratic was never more clearly pointed out than by James Buchanan, who was then in his prime, in the debates following the census of 1840. Again in the Federalist, Mr. Madison said:

> Though every member of the Athenian assembly be a Socrates, the aggregate body would be a mob.

Going to show that the more you increase the size of a legislative body, the more the domination of that body falls under the influence of a few, and the more the individual member becomes merged in, shall I call it, that mob, which extinguishes his individuality and gives a bent to the direction of affairs in which the individual has less and less to say. Mr. Charman, I sincerely hope this bill will pass. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those men who have been charged with responsibility for not reapportioning under the census of 1920. I plead guilty to that charge.

I said on this floor in 1921 that I was opposed to the reapportioning of the House under the census of 1920 for several reasons. In the first place, the census of 1920 was taken, you might say, while America was still in the World War; when our soldiers had not returned to their homes; when thousands and thousands of them were away from home and were not counted where they should have been counted. I was opposed to it also because of the fact that the census was taken at a time when, owing to war activities, the population of a good many States had been drawn away from home and concentrated in the large industrial centers of the country.

I was opposed to it because the Bureau of the Census, for the first time in the history of this country, undertook to take the census in the wintertime, when the roads were muddy, when the weather was bad, and when it was almost impossible to go into the agricultural sections and make a correct tabulation of the population. I was opposed to it because it was taken at the time of the very peak of high prices. It was shown before the committee, in the former hearings on this bill, that they found it impossible to get men at the prices paid to go out and do this work.

As a result they brought in a census which showed an abnormal gain, an unreasonable gain, if you please, in the large congested industrial centers and at the same time an unreasonable falling off in the agricultural sections.

I say this was brought about largely as a result of the World War, and as the result of the World War we smashed almost every precedent of which you can think. We drafted our manhood in the Army; we sent them overseas to fight our battles; we put on wheatless days, meatless meals, and lightless nights; we limited the amount of sugar a man could put in his coffee and changed the time of day, but when it came to holding up reapportionment because of the fact that we did not have a proper census we heard a great protest on the part of those gentlemen representing States which would have gained as the result of that census.

In 1921, when this bill was brought before the House, I announced my attitude clearly. I was not in favor of increasing the membership of the House, and I think the record of the hearings will show I so stated, but in order to get this measure off our hands, I joined a majority of the committee and reported to this House a bill providing for a membership of 460, which would have taken care of all the smaller States, although it would have added a little more to the already inflated number which some States would have received. It would have taken care of all the small States with the exceptions of Maine, which would have lost one, and Missouri, which would have lost one instead of two.

We debated that bill all day long. That night a motion was made to recommit, and it was recommitted by the votes of the very gentlemen from Michigan and California who now complain that we who tried to do justice to all on that occasion are responsible for the House not being reapportioned.

Now, these are the facts in the case and so far as I am individually concerned, I am willing to assume my part of the responsibility.

Oh, but they say, "You have violated the Constitution." Now, as a matter of fact, reapportionment every 10 years is not mandatory under the Constitution. The gentleman from Massachusetts shakes his head, which convinces me that I am correct, or helps to do so. [Laughter.]

The Constitution does provide that the census shall be taken every 10 years. It also provides that representation shall be based on population. In other words, it does not provide that you shall apportion every 10 years but when you do apportion, instead of using territory or wealth as a basis, you must use population.

You can reapportion Congress every five years. You can take the census every five years and reapportion Congress every five years if you want to and come entirely within the Constitution, but you must take the census every 10 years. You can take it oftener if you so desire.

I was one of the men who wanted to take a census in 1925, when you took the agricultural and manufacturing census, in order that we might straighten this matter out and get a just reapportionment measure that would take care of all the States and do justice to all of them alike.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman is a lawyer and he and I have worked together on this problem.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman is going to argue the constitutionality of the measure, I must decline to yield.

Mr. BEEDY. No; I am in agreement with the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. Go ahead.

Mr. BEEDY. We worked together on this problem in the Sixty-seventh Congress. The gentleman is entirely right when he says there is no constitutional mandate to apportion. The constitutional mandate applies only to the taking of the census every 10 years. I want to ask the gentleman this question: This bill comes into effect provided the Congress first meeting after the next census fails to do its duty?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. What would the proposed legislation do in the way of invading the rights of the Seventy-fourth Congress? Suppose the Seventy-third Congress or the Seventy-second Congress apportions under the next census, has not the Seventy-fourth Congress the right to change that apportionment if it wants to?

Mr. RANKIN. Certainly.

Mr. BEEDY. And can this Congress pass a law which in any way encroaches upon the authority of the Seventy-fourth or the Seventy-fifth Congress to apportion in any way it wants to?

Mr. RANKIN. No; I think not. I was coming to that point and I am pleased that the gentleman has raised it.

I am opposed to this measure for a great many reasons. In the first place, it is absolutely unnecessary. You are attempting here to bind a future Congress, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] has suggested, by passing this legislation. You are attempting to make yourselves the guardians of future Congresses.

If we had taken the census in 1925, in my opinion, Missouri would not have lost two Members and California would not have gained the number she is claiming under the census of 1920. I do not believe that Mississippi would have lost a Member. I do not believe Kansas, Iowa, or Nebraska would have lost one, neither would Michigan have gained the number shown under the census of 1920.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Where did the gentleman get those figures?

Mr. RANKIN. I said in my opinion.

Mr. BARBOUR. Oh!

Mr. RANKIN. Has the gentleman an opinion?

Mr. BARBOUR. Occasionally.

Mr. RANKIN. Now, another thing. We do not propose here to apportion Congress under the census of 1920. That is not what you are doing. You constitutionalists, if you are such sticklers for the Constitution, and think we are violating it, you violate it when you postpone this until after the next census.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. We could not get any other bill out of the gentleman's committee. The gentleman would not permit any other kind of measure to come out.

Mr. RANKIN. You might amend this one. You would not have got this one out if I had had my way, because I would have relieved the Congress of the embarrassment of having to answer before the country for this legislative monstrosity. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, you propose here to do what? To fix the size of the House at 435. I rather think the House of Representatives is large enough, but suppose in 1930 in working this proposition out Congress should find that by adding four or five Members or taking away four or five you can do justice to all the States? Will they say, "No; we are bound by this all-wise, all-powerful Congress that was in control a few years ago—they had a corner on the legislative wisdom, those patriotic fathers of the Constitution—they said it was to be 435, and we can not change it"?

You are fixing the House at 435, denying the next Congress, if your law amounts to anything, if it is binding, you would be denying future Congresses the right to reduce or raise the membership of the House.

This bill proposes a formula that they call major fractions. I want any gentleman from Iowa, from California, or from Michigan to tell me the difference between major fractions and equal proportions, and if he will get that in the RECORD he will have a sweet time after the public reads it when he goes back to his district. [Laughter.] And yet you are engrafting into this law a provision that the next House shall be apportioned on the formula of major fractions.

Mr. FENN. Under what method does the gentleman hold his seat—is it not major fractions?

Mr. RANKIN. I hold my seat as the result of a bill approved by a congressional committee passed through the House fixing the number of Representatives of each State.

Mr. FENN. The number was arrived at by major fractions.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Did the gentleman vote for the reapportionment bill in 1921?

Mr. RANKIN. Was the gentleman here then?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. No.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Mississippi was here in 1921.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Did the gentleman vote for the bill?

Mr. RANKIN. I do not know whether I voted to bring it out of the committee; I voted against recommitting it.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. That was under major fractions?

Mr. RANKIN. I want to show you what you are voting for; a formula that by the best mathematicians is robbing your State or may rob it of a part of its representation.

Let me read a few paragraphs. I am not questioning the mathematicians; I presume they know what they are talking about. Nobody on the committee knew whether they were right or not, and so they are safe from criticism.

Based upon an "imaginary" population of the 1920 census Arkansas would receive 7 under equal proportions and only 6 under major fractions. Colorado would receive 4 under the method of equal proportions and 3 under major fractions. Connecticut, the home of the distinguished chairman of the committee, would receive 6 under equal proportions and 5 under major fractions. Now, that is according to one of the best professors—Edward Huntington, professor of mathematics at Harvard University.

Mr. FENN. I will agree to that if the gentleman will vote for the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. No; I do not want to see the gentleman rotated out of office. I want to see him here as long as Connecticut remains Republican.

Now, Florida under the equal proportions would receive 4, and under the major fractions 3. Idaho under equal proportions, according to this distinguished professor, would receive 2, whereas under major fractions she would receive only 1. Kansas would have 7 under the method of equal proportions, and 6 under major fractions. Maine, the State of the distinguished gentleman who interrupted me a while ago, would receive 3 under equal proportions and only 2 under major fractions. But you are asked to fasten major fractions onto the country.

Next we have Maryland. Maryland would receive 6 under the method of equal proportions and only 5 under major fractions. Mississippi would receive 7 under equal proportions and only 6 under major fractions; Montana would receive 2 under the method of equal proportions and only 1 under major fractions. Nebraska would receive 5 under the method of equal proportions and only 4 under major fractions. New Hampshire would receive 2 under equal proportions and only 1 under major fractions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. For a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In the cases where States gain under the method of equal proportions, who loses? Where is the loss?

Mr. RANKIN. I do not know whether you would call it losing membership when they have not yet gained any, but otherwise under the other system, they would evidently go to other States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They would gain under one form and lose under another?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes. New Mexico would receive 2 Members under equal proportions and 1 under major fractions. North Dakota would receive 3 under equal proportions and 2 under major fractions. Oregon would receive 3 under equal proportions and 2 under major fractions. South Carolina would receive 7 under equal proportions and 6 under major fractions. South Dakota would receive 3 under equal proportions and 2 under major fractions. Utah would receive 2 under equal proportions and 1 under major fractions. Vermont would receive 2 under equal proportions and 1 under major fractions. Washington—where is the gentleman from Washington? May I have his attention? According to this table, under equal proportions the State of Washington would have 6 Members and under major fractions only 5. West Virginia would have 6 under equal proportions and 5 under major fractions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And would it not be just as hard to explain if we take this method of equal proportions, which is all visionary, as to explain anything else?

Mr. RANKIN. My idea is to leave this reapportionment off until after the census of 1930 is taken, because you are basing it on the census of 1930; and then when you take your census make your reapportionment on the basis of that census. We will have a bill coming up here on next Monday, I presume, by which we provide that the census must be taken as of the 1st of May, 1930. We are going to see that the people in the rural districts are counted and that a complete census is taken, if possible; and then I am in favor of reapportioning upon the basis of that census.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. Here is a question that has been troubling me, and I would like to have the gentleman answer it if he will: The Constitution states that the actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress, and then within every subsequent term of 10 years.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. The Constitution, therefore, fixes the 10-year period. What about the authority of any Congress to deal with the question of apportionment on the basis of a census that is not to be taken within the 10 years of the life of that particular Congress, but which is to be taken within the next 10-year period prescribed by the Constitution, a 10-year period within which another Congress comes into being?

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman's question answers every argument of those who claim that it is mandatory to reapportion after taking the census, because if it is mandatory to reapportion after taking every census it is mandatory to make your reapportionment within the 10-year period, and, therefore, you are not coming within the very provision of the Constitution that you allege applies in this instance.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. In other words, the authority of Congress to act is with respect to a census previously taken and not with respect to censuses to be taken in the future.

Mr. RANKIN. Absolutely.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I have only a few minutes more.

Mr. THATCHER. Is it not a very serious question whether a Congress in this decade has any constitutional rights to legislate at all as to the next decade?

Mr. RANKIN. I think it is.

Here is the worst provision in this bill. The gentleman from New York alleges that in 1850 this identical thing was done. The record shows that a law was passed under which a Secretary of the Interior made the apportionment, but it does not show that that same department took the census.

The census at that time was taken by the various United States marshals. What are you doing here? You are delegating to a department the right to reapportion Congress on the basis of a census taken by itself. You are surrendering the prerogative, not only to apportion your own Congress and attempting to bind a future Congress, but you are also delegating the power of reapportioning Congress to the very department that takes the census.

Now, suppose we do as we did in 1920. There is nothing in this bill to provide that the census is to be approved by Congress. I have had enough experience with bureaus under this Government to warrant me in saying that bureaucracy is the bane of American institutions. How are you going to explain to the intelligent people of the country, why you delegated the power of reapportioning Congress to the very bureau charged with taking the census and which, I contend, failed in that respect in 1920?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Did they not fail in 1920 because of the lack of sufficient money to properly take the census?

Mr. RANKIN. Not altogether. They failed for the very reasons I have mentioned.

It may be that in some sections it will cost more than it will cost in other sections. Some of these bureaucrats are demanding that we separate these censuses and take one in the fall and one in the spring, and thus add several millions of dollars more to the Budget. They took it in 1920 at a time when we were disturbed with the World War, when the people were concentrated in the large congested centers. They took it at a time of the year when it was absolutely impossible to go out and take the census of the country people.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is not proposed that the bureaucrats take the census at two periods. One is one for the agricultural people and the other of the population at other places.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman gets away from the issue. We provide now that this census shall be taken in 1930 as of the 1st of May. Let us not deceive ourselves by passing this unnecessary legislation to bind a future Congress, but let us wait until 1930 and see that the census is taken, and see that the men charged with that duty perform it, and see to it that they have sufficient money to insure that it is properly performed, and then come back here and reapportion Congress on the basis of the census taken in 1930 in order that we may do justice to all and not injustice to either the small or larger States. [Applause.]

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, in bringing up this bill to reapportion the House on the basis of the census to be taken in 1930, we can not avoid being reminded that for eight years Congress has permitted a condition to continue which has never before existed in the 133 years of our constitutional history. There are many duties imposed upon us by the high office in which we have been placed by trusting constituents. Many of which are significant and urgent. There are other duties which do not have the appearance of urgency, but which transcend all others, because they pertain to that fundamental principle upon which this Government has been founded; namely, the Constitution.

Now, I do not desire to attempt to elaborate on the Constitution, or to condemn individuals who, in my opinion, have gone beyond the scope of their rightful duty in Congress on the committee that I am a member of. But I beseech you, gentlemen, to reflect for a moment upon the sacred trust that we have in our hands to-day.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEOD. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. In the calculation as to the number of Representatives that we have from the various States, what will be the number to be represented by a Congressman with 435 Members as the basis? Will it be 250,000 or 260,000, or how many?

Mr. McLEOD. You mean in 1930?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. McLEOD. No one knows definitely.

Mr. GREEN. Has the gentleman gotten information enough in the hearings to approximate the number?

Mr. McLEOD. No. We were just approximating.

Mr. GREEN. It is now, as I understand, about 207,000 or 208,000.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I submit Article I, section 2, of the Constitution. It is my contention, gentlemen, that it is absolutely mandatory upon us to uphold our oath of office, which is to uphold the Constitution, to act according to this first article in the second section. It reads:

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. * * * The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of 10 years, in such manner as they shall by law direct.

I can not follow the mental gymnastics of those who say that this language does not mean that Congress must apportion its seats every 10 years. Such interpretation does not appear to me to be reasonable, and I am convinced that on this proposition I stand with the great majority of legal authorities, as well as with the great body of American people. [Applause.]

But regardless of the technical legal power conferred upon the Congress, it has the ability, by merely failing to act, to let apportionment go by the board, and there is no power to enforce the higher authority of the Constitution. I say there is no power; that is, there is no statutory penalty for not obeying. But there is a moral obligation backed by the weight of public opinion.

This bill before us to-day removes the possibility of violating the Constitution by mere nonfeasance of Congress. It provides for an automatic performance of the purely administrative features of reapportionment, reserving to Congress in each instance after a census a prior opportunity to apportion its Members by positive action if it so desires. The Constitution, so long as it truly embodies the will of the sovereign people, must be enforced. This bill will make it very difficult in the future to permit the growth of such insidious disfranchisement as has been in operation against several of the great States of the Union during the past eight years. I am strongly in favor—and I am sure a great majority of my colleagues will admit the wisdom—of a measure which accomplishes that result. It is the only way to safeguard the future against usurpation of the Government, consciously or unconsciously, by unyielding minorities.

Congress does not have the right to say what is best for the country in violation of the Constitution. One hundred and fifty years ago George III of England disregarded the rights of his subjects as manifested in their constitution. The result was a war of independence and the birth of a new nation. The grievance which stands out in our minds as the battle cry of that struggle is, "No taxation without representation." The spirit of that slogan won the war, and impelled the founders of our Government to reduce to writing those principles of government which would forever prevent the usurpation of sufficient power by any man or group of men to tax citizens and at the same time deprive them of just and equal representation. And yet has not the failure of Congress to apportion the Representatives for a period of 18 years produced just that situation? The State of Michigan, which ranks fourth in total amount of income tax paid to the Federal Government, is forced to get along with the same number of Congressmen she had 18 years ago. The fact that Michigan, along with several other States, has had phenomenal growth in population and wealth during the last 18 years, while some States have not, has had no recognition at the hands of Congress.

Our forefathers, in their far-seeing wisdom, provided for the unequalities of growth which they knew must necessarily take place in this country. They were well aware that the process of usurpation is gradual and sometimes so imperceptible as not to be recognized for what it is. They could not conceive of a truly representative body in our Government, such as our House of Representatives, succumbing to this pernicious evil. Their problem, then, was to keep it representative. Article I, section 2, of the Constitution was devised for that purpose, and given the leading position in the document, indicative of its preeminent importance. For unless the truly representative character of this legislative body is preserved, we will no longer have a representative form of government.

The authors of the Constitution had just previously to framing that document participated in the Declaration of Independence, and in order to refresh ourselves as to just the nature of the trust we bear let us refer also to the principles of government expressed in the latter declaration:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and institute new governments, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem more likely to effect their safety and happiness.

In order that the wisdom of our forefathers may be vindicated and the trust which they imposed in this honorable body be not destroyed, I call upon the Members of this House to pass this bill now, which, if not abiding closely to the Constitution, has the saving grace of doing so at the earliest practicable time. [Applause.]

The highest test which self-governed peoples have to meet is the unwavering administration of just laws, regardless of circumstances. This test can only be met so long as principles command respect and expediency is decried among those in high places.

Having done away with kings and potentates, as being untrustworthy guardians of the rights and liberties of mankind, our forefathers set up a constitutional form of government which has served ever since as a model of government for struggling freemen. We have proved highly capable up to this point of governing ourselves under this Constitution, and have continuously urged other peoples who have had the opportunity to subscribe to the correctness of our form of government by following our example. Many have done so, and now it again falls to our lot to set an example. Where new conditions make the adherence to old principles unpleasant, we must set an example of moral courage. The crucial period of our national history is before us, when wealth and luxury are ours to master. We must not forget that our Government is an experiment in self-control on a large scale, and that obligation is directly upon Congress to keep us from deviating from the true course of good government. We must not lay ourselves open to the charge of rotten borough politics.

I quote the following definition of an oath from Webster's Dictionary:

> An oath is a solemn attestation in support of a declaration or a promise, by an appeal to God or to some person or thing regarded as high and holy.

Mr. Speaker, it is just a few months ago that we stood before this rostrum and with our right hands uplifted invoked the Divine Witness to our oath of allegiance to the Constitution of the United States. No man in this Chamber can honestly vote "no" on this measure and at the same time uphold the sacred trust imposed upon him.

I therefore plead that you will let your conscience be your guide. [Applause.]

Those of us who long for justice should let the Government of the day respond to the Constitution. It is hard for him who strives to please to be successful in a desire to be honest. Especially is this true when the attempt is to please both you and me. There is no desire so beclouding to unbiased perception as the selfish desire. The commandments of principle are universal and impartial. They steady us in the moment of passion, they lengthen our view in the instant of urgent desire, and broaden our vision when the consideration of self seems paramount. These commandments admit of no exceptions, no realm of human action is exempt from their united judgment. Let us meet this issue squarely and pass this bill to-day. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] in his remarks mentioned the conditions relating to the taking of the 1920 census. He stated that the census was taken when the weather was bad, at the peak of high prices, and that many of the service men had not reached their homes.

The figures that were presented to the Census Committee, not only at the present session, but at the last session, indicated that the growth was along the same ratio as in 1920; that California, Michigan, and Ohio would maintain their same increase and that there was no falling off in those States, but that the continuous falling off in Missouri and Mississippi was practically the same. That is a part of the committee hearing.

Now, gentlemen, if there is anything of importance or significance in the oath we take in this very rostrum every two years, and if it is in any way sacred, I just want to ask this question: Is it just to deprive us not only of our seats in this House, but also of our votes for President and Vice President in the Electoral College? You gentlemen all understand that situation, yet my State is short two votes and certain other States have our votes.

If there is any good reason for not passing this legislation at this time it might be suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], but so far he has not shown any sound reason.

At this time I want to call attention to a matter which has already been brought out, and that is as to the delegation of power.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEOD. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Before the gentleman concludes his remarks will he give just a moment's time to a discussion of the reason for incorporating in the legislation the delegation of power to the next Congress? Is it because of the fact that he believes the situation which embarrasses this Congress in acting would only be accentuated by the conditions that will be found after the next census—that is to say, there will be a greater divergence of opinion as to the way the apportionment ought to be made? More States will be out of line. More States lose and other States gain, so that there will be greater difficulty in coming to any agreement and passing any apportionment bill following the census of 1930. Is that the basis upon which that is put in the legislation?

Mr. McLEOD. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. I wish the gentleman would give some emphasis to that before he concludes his remarks, because it seems to me that is a very important reason for bringing in the bill at this time.

Mr. McLEOD. I might say this: The situation has been the same for the last three Congresses of which I have been a Member, that it is impossible to get any consideration of any bill in the Census Committee. There are certain men on that committee who will not vote out any bill, and it is my contention they will not vote out a bill under the 1930 census, and therefore this bill is the protecting clincher of the whole proposition. The whole question rests on the situation the gentleman has just mentioned.

Mr. KETCHAM. Then I am to understand that in the judgment of the gentleman, who has been a member of the Census Committee ever since he came to Congress, the situation in 1930, following that census, will likely be a worse situation than that which we now face and the chances of getting an agreement will be more remote than they are now, hence this particular provision in the bill—that is correct?

Mr. McLEOD. That is right.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEOD. I have just a few minutes remaining, and I want to refer to a decision of the Supreme Court. I hold in my hand a brief on the part of the United States in the case of J. W. Hampton, jr., & Co., petitioner, against the United States, on writ of certiorari. This case presents the question whether the flexible tariff provisions of the tariff act of 1922, giving to the President power to increase or decrease tariffs, within limits fixed by the statute, to equalize differences in costs of production at home and abroad, found by them to exist after inquiry and report by the Tariff Commission, are unconstitutional, as a delegation of legislative power. That was the question in the case. The opinion of the Supreme Court is as follows:

> The field of Congress involves all and many varieties of legislative action, and Congress has found it frequently necessary to use officers of the executive branch within defined limits, to secure the exact effect intended by its acts of legislation, by vesting discretion in such officers to make public regulations interpreting a statute and directing the details of its execution, even to the extent of providing for penalizing a breach of such regulations. (United States v. Grimaud, 220 U. S. 506, 518; Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U. S. 364.)

And so on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. McLEOD. Further in the opinion the court said:

> The true distinction, therefore, is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring an authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of law. The first can not be done; to the latter no valid objection can be made.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER]. [Applause.]

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield before he gets started for me to ask a question for the gentleman to bring out?

Mr. LOZIER. I would rather not yield until I have completed my statement.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in the brief time at my command I want as best I can to discuss this question dispassionately. I am not going to charge any of my colleagues who differ with or from me on this bill with violating the Constitution or with disregarding their oaths or with having been remiss in the performance of their duties. I have too high a regard for the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] and other Members of this House who killed the reapportionment bill in 1921 to charge them with having been remiss in their duties or with having deliberately disregarded their oaths or with having wantonly violated the Constitution.

In the course of the debate this afternoon, while my colleague from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] was speaking and criticizing those of us who are opposed to this bill, I called his attention to the fact that on October 14, 1921, he and a number of his colleagues from Michigan, California, and other States prevented the passage of the then pending reapportionment bill by voting to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Census without any instructions to forthwith report the bill back to the House, but my reference carried with it no implication that he and his associates who thus voted were untrue to their oaths or that they had thereby violated the Constitution or been remiss in the discharge of their duties. I assumed that the gentlemen who strangled the 1921 reapportionment bill voted honestly and conscientiously in killing that measure.

However, although they were doubtlessly actuated by proper motives, they can not escape responsibility for killing the bill. They had a right to vote as they saw proper, but, having by their votes prevented their respective States from getting increased representation for seven years, it is manifestly unfair for them to seek now to place the responsibility elsewhere than on their own shoulders. A majority of the Representatives from Michigan and a number of their California colleagues have been splitting the air with complaints and loud lamentations for the last seven years, criticizing Congress for having failed to pass a reapportionment bill.

Some of these gentlemen are responsible for the defeat of the reapportionment bill in 1921. They were so wedded to the doctrine of limiting the membership of the House to 435 that they sacrificed the opportunity of getting a large increase in their quota of Representatives. Rather than add 25 to the total membership of the House, these critical gentlemen in 1921 voted to kill a reapportionment bill that would have given California 4 and Michigan 3 additional Representatives and increased the number of Representatives from 14 other States. I refer these carping critics to the language of Lord Beaconsfield, who said, "It is much easier to be critical than to be correct," and to a much greater authority, who said, "First cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote that is in thy brother's eye."

When it comes to complaints and lamentations the Prophet Jeremiah had nothing on the Michigan delegation and a few of the crêpe hangers from California. Having deliberately, with their eyes wide open, defeated reapportionment in 1921, their outpourings of indignation and wrath have resounded through the Halls of Congress continuously since in a vain effort to place responsibility for the defeat or delay of reapportionment on some one else instead of on themselves where it belongs. They were so anxious to limit the House to a membership of 435 that they deliberately defeated what would have given their States increased representation in the House and in the Electoral College.

"Who killed Cock Robin" when the last reapportionment bill was being considered in the House? I answer and speak from the RECORD when I say that a block of California and Michigan Representatives, aided by a number of their colleagues from other States, defeated a reapportionment bill which would have given their States a substantial increase in the number of Representatives and in their vote in the Electoral College.

They can not escape this responsibility which they deliberately assumed when they voted to recommit the 1921 apportionment bill.

In 1921 these gentlemen were at the "legislative crossroads." They were called upon to vote for or against a motion to recommit the then pending reapportionment bill. They must have known that a vote to recommit the bill was a vote to assassinate it. These gentlemen, having made their bed, must lie in it. Rather than abandon their worship of this 435 fetish, they chose to deny California, Michigan, and other rapidly growing States increased representation in the House and in the Electoral College to which they were entitled under the 1920 census. They insisted on having no reapportionment rather than any reapportionment which provided for a membership of the House of over 435. Apparently they considered the number 435 sacred and tenaciously held to this arbitrary formula, though by so doing they defeated reapportionment and deprived their States of a large number of Representatives to which they were entitled under the 1920 census.

These cynical gentlemen were so devoted to this fetish that they determined to allow no law to be enacted which would increase the House membership. Then let them not say that their colleagues have been remiss in the performance of their duty or that they have failed to observe the provisions of the Constitution. [Applause.]

I do not criticize these gentlemen for strangling the 1921 reapportionment bill if they did what they thought was right, and I am assuming that they were actuated by proper motives. If they believed that the interest of the Nation required that the membership of the House be limited to 435, and if they believed that in the interest of orderly government such membership should not be increased, then it was their privilege to so vote; but after having in cold blood murdered the 1921 reapportionment act and, by parliamentary maneuvers, defeated reapportionment, it does not lie in their mouths to challenge the good faith of those who then believed and now believe that the membership of the House should be increased in order to meet the new needs and conditions of the American people.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LOZIER. I regret that I can not yield to my distinguished friend from New York until I have completed my statement, or at least developed some matters to which I want to call the attention of the House. I have before me the RECORD of October 14, 1921. I called your attention to those who are responsible for depriving California, Michigan, and 14 other States of 27 additional Representatives and 27 additional votes in the Electoral College, which they would have enjoyed had not the proponents of the pending bill and their associates defeated the 1921 reapportionment bill, which legislation was strangled prior to the time I entered Congress. I want the people of Michigan and California and these other States to know that they would have had increased representation since 1921 if a number of the Representatives from Michigan and California had not voted to recommit the 1921 reapportionment bill, thereby defeating the reapportionment in the Sixty-seventh Congress.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. When I have finished my statement. On October 14, 1921, a reapportionment bill was pending in this House under which a number of States, including California, would have secured increased representation in the House and Electoral College. A motion was made to recommit the bill, and several of the California Representatives and nearly all of the Representatives from Michigan voted "aye" on that motion, which motion prevailed, and the reapportionment bill was thereby chloroformed. It is idle for these gentlemen to say that they expected the census committee to amend the bill and report it out again, because the motion did not carry with it any order that the committee rereport the bill, but the motion was to recommit the bill without any instructions whatsoever.

Mr. LEA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. I will yield to my friend from California presently. Let us see how the Representatives from Michigan and California voted on the motion to recommit the 1921 reapportionment bill. Let us look at the vote as recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I will now call the roll. Representative LEA did not vote; he had a general pair with Mr. MADDEN. Representative CURRY voted against recommitting. You do not fool that wise and experienced legislator. He knew the meaning of that motion to recommit; he knew that if the motion carried it would kill the reapportionment; he knew that if the motion to recommit carried it would defeat reapportionment and deprive his State and other States of an increased representation in Congress and in the Electoral College; he knew how to vote in order to promote the interests of the people in California, and he voted against recommitting the bill. If his California colleagues had followed his leadership and voted as he voted, California would have had four additional Representatives in Congress and four additional electoral votes since 1921.

Mr. Kahn did not vote. He had a general pair with Mr. Humphreys. In fairness to Mr. Kahn I will say that I understand he was ill at the time, and while I never had the pleasure of knowing him intimately I have no doubt that if he had been present he would have voted against recommitting the bill. In any event he would have voted his convictions.

Mr. Nolan did not vote. He had a general pair with Mr. Johnson of Kentucky.

Mr. Elston did not vote.

Representative BARBOUR voted to recommit the bill, which was, in effect, a vote to kill reapportionment. In view of his vote, how can he consistently challenge the good faith of his colleagues who are opposing the pending measure?

Representative FREE voted against recommitting; he knew what was for the best interests of the people of California and the Nation.

Mr. Lineberger voted against recommitting the bill.

Mr. Osborne voted against recommitting the bill.

Mr. SWING voted to recommit.

Mr. Raker voted to recommit.

The RECORD shows that when the roll call was finished three Members from California voted to recommit the bill, four voted against recommitting, and four did not vote at all. In other words, seven California Representatives voted to recommit the bill or refrained from voting when if they had voted against recommitting the bill California could have had all these years the increased representation to which she was entitled under the 1920 census. Even if three of the California Members who voted against recommitting it, California would have had four additional Representatives and four additional votes in the Electoral College since 1921.

Mr. LEA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. When I have finished my statement and after I have paid my compliments to the Michigan delegation. In order to show their inconsistency I find it necessary to place these Michigan statesmen on the dissecting table. I now want to call your attention to how the Representatives from Michigan voted on the 1921 reapportionment bill. Some of these Michigan Representatives have unequivocally charged other Members of Congress with having been guilty of dereliction of duty and with having violated or ignored the Constitution of the United States. I want to call the roll of the Michigan Representatives who defeated reapportionment in 1921.

Mr. Codd voted against recommitting.

Mr. MICHENER voted to recommit, thereby killing the bill that would have given Michigan three additional Representatitves and three additional votes in the Electoral College since 1921.

Mr. KETCHAM voted to recommit.

Mr. MAPES voted to recommit.

Mr. Kelly voted against recommitting.

Mr. CRAMTON did not vote, but was paired in favor of recommitting with Mr. STEVENSON, who was against recommitting the bill.

Mr. Fordney did not vote. He made a speech favoring the bill, which provided a House membership of 460, and he was paired against recommitting with Mr. CRISP, who favored recommitting the bill. Mr. Fordney was the Republican leader at that time.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN voted to recommit.

Mr. WOODRUFF voted to recommit.

Mr. Scott did not vote, but was paired in favor of the motion to recommit with Mr. Moore, of Illinois, who opposed the measure.

Mr. JAMES voted to recommit.

Mr. Brennan voted to recommit.

Mr. SMITH did not vote and was not paired.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. I will now yield to my colleague from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. Would it not be fair to assume that those who voted for the motion to recommit assumed that the members of the Committee on the Census would perform their duty and vote out an apportionment bill that would conform to the sentiment of the House as expressed by its action in recommitting the bill fixing the membership of the House at 460?

Mr. LOZIER. Oh, the gentleman from Michigan is one of the ablest Members and one of the best parliamentarians in the House. He knows how to get a committee to forthwith report back a bill under a motion to recommit. He knows that the usual procedure is to offer a motion to recommit with instructions to the committee to immediately report the bill back to the House with certain designated amendments. The gentleman can not hide behind the Census Committee. The gentleman well knows that the proper procedure would have been to have included in the motion to recommit instructions to the Census Committee to report out a bill providing for a membership of 435, if that was what was wanted by the person or group offering the motion to recommit.

Mr. MAPES. With a complex piece of legislation such as an apportionment bill, the House having expressed itself as to the number, would not a more orderly procedure be to have it referred back to the committee to perfect?

Mr. LOZIER. Certainly not! The gentleman knows that a motion to recommit under these circumstances is a motion to kill the bill. The gentleman knows that. I have too high an opinion of the gentleman's ability and parliamentary knowledge to think that he did not know that he was killing that reapportionment bill when he voted to recommit it. The gentleman knows that when you vote to recommit a bill without instructions such vote is a vote to kill the bill. I am discussing the facts. I am giving the gentleman credit for more intelligence than he claims for himself, and I recognize the very evident fact that he is a man of superior intellectual attainments.

Mr. MAPES. Under the strict construction of the rule there is no reason why a motion to recommit should be construed as a refusal to consider the subject matter at all.

Mr. LOZIER. The gentleman knows that if it had been the purpose of those voting to recommit to have the committee rereport the bill, limiting the membership to any definite number, instructions to that effect would have been embodied in a motion to recommit. The bill pending at that time provided for a House membership of 460. During the course of the debate the House had defeated the Barbour amendment, which sought to limit the membership to 435, and also defeated the Tinkham amendment, which provided that the membership should be reduced to 425. By these votes the House very clearly indicated that it favored increasing the membership to 460, and to prevent this increase a number of Representatives from California and a majority of the Representatives from Michigan made common cause with others who opposed the measure and voted to recommit the bill, and without these California and Michigan votes the motion to recommit would have been defeated. The House having voted twice against proposals to limit the membership to 435 or less, the proper and sensible course to pursue would have been to vote on the then pending bill, which provided for a membership of 460. It would have been an unnecessary and foolish act for the House to recommit the bill with directions to the Committee on the Census to forthwith rereport the bill providing for a membership of 460, because the bill that the House was then considering provided for a membership of 460.

Undoubtedly this bill would have passed the House if these gentlemen had not voted for its recommitment. By their votes they prevented an increase in the membership of the House, but at the same time they deprived their own States and other States or 27 additional Representatives in Congress and 27 additional votes in the Electoral College. By no process of reasoning can these gentlemen from Michigan and California and those who cooperate with them escape responsibility for depriving their respective States for seven years of the increased representation to which they were entitled under the 1920 census.

Mr. LEA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. I will now gladly yield to my friend from California.

Mr. LEA. I think the gentleman is erroneous in assuming that the Members of the California delegation questioned the good faith of those who voted to the contrary. As a Member, I never questioned the good faith of any Member, whether he voted for reapportionment or not.

Mr. LOZIER. I am quite sure the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] never questioned the good faith of his colleagues who do not favor the pending measure, because he is always courteous and not inclined to question the sincerity of those with whom he is in disagreement, but some of his California colleagues are less considerate, and they have been preaching for the last five years that Congress had been remiss in the discharge of its duties and had violated the Constitution in not passing a reapportionment bill, although, as a matter of fact, some of these California Representatives cast the deciding votes that killed the 1921 reapportionment bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. I will.

Mr. BARBOUR. Assuming that all the gentleman said about the Sixty-sixth Congress is correct, what about the Sixty-seventh Congress, the Sixty-eighth and Sixty-ninth Congresses, when the Census Committee absolutely refused to report a bill out?

Mr. LOZIER. I was not a Member of either the Sixty-sixth or Sixty-seventh Congress. The gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR], who has been a member of the Census Committee, knows that I came to Washington as a Member of the Sixty-eighth Congress. At that time the Republican majority had neglected for years to pass the reapportionment bill. The leaders of the House had shunted it aside—the leaders of the gentleman's own party. If they had not been opposed or indifferent to the passage of an apportionment bill, one would have been enacted long before I became a Member of Congress. Whatever odium that may attach to Congress because of its failure to reapportion representation must be chargeable to the Republican Party that had been in control of both the executive and legislative branches of Government since March 4, 1921.

Many of the outstanding leaders of the Republican Party in the Sixty-seventh Congress, by voting to recommit, helped to defeat the 1921 reapportionment bill. Here are some of the names of Republican leaders who voted to recommit the reapportionment bill in 1921, thereby preventing California, Michigan, and 14 other States from having the increased representation in the House and Electoral College to which their population, under the 1920 census entitled them: Burtness, Burton, Chalmers, Chindblom, Cooper of Wisconsin, Fairchild, Fairfield, Fenn, Fish, Frear, Frothingham, Hawley, Hoch, Lampert, Lehlbach, Luce, MacGregor, Nelson of Wisconsin, Newton of Minnesota, Sinnott, Sproul, Summers of Washington, Tilson, Tinkham, Treadway, Williamson, Winslow, Wood of Indiana, and others too numerous to mention.

In the last analysis the Republican oligarchy in Congress was responsible for killing the 1921 reapportionment bill. Some of my colleagues from California and Michigan have never been happy since they defeated that measure, and in order to get the Representatives that they declined to take in 1921 these gentlemen have forced the consideration of the bill that is being debated on the floor of the House to-day.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LOZIER. I prefer to complete my statement after which I will yield to my friend from New York if I have any time left.

Mr. RANKIN. The 1921 reapportionment bill was recommitted by only a majority of 4 votes.

Mr. LOZIER. Yes; only 4 votes, and the delegations from Michigan and California withheld those 4 votes, thereby depriving the people of their own States of the increased representation they would have received under the proposed 1921 apportionment bill.

Mr. McLEOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes.

Mr. McLEOD. In the gentleman's opinion, did those gentlemen do wrong in so voting?

Mr. LOZIER. I think they exercised exceedingly poor judgment, but I do not say that they did wrong in voting to kill the 1921 reapportionment bill. I assume they voted in accordance with their best judgment and in harmony with their conscience. They had two alternatives; one was to vote to keep the membership down to 435 and thereby kill the pending reapportionment bill, and the other was to increase the membership to 460 as provided in that bill, which would have given additional representation to their States. If they wanted to worship the number 435—if they thought more of the fetish of 435 than they did of passing a reapportionment bill that would have materially increased the representation from their respective States, I would not condemn them for voting as they did. By voting for the bill which provided for a membership of 460 these gentlemen could have materially increased both numerically and relatively the voting strength of their respective States in the House and in the Electoral College. By voting to recommit they defeated reapportionment and deprived their States of the increased representation to which they were entitled under the 1920 census. They had the right to choose between two alternatives. They chose to vote for a proposition that defeated reapportionment and deprived their States of this increased representation. If they thought they were doing right when they thus voted, then I do not blame them for their votes, but they must assume responsibility for their deliberate acts, and after helping to kill the 1921 reapportionment act they should not blame some one else for the consequences that resulted from their having in cold blood assassinated that legislation. Having voted in 1921 to strangle and chloroform reapportionment, it does not now lie in the mouths of my colleagues from California and Michigan to challenge the good faith of other Members who in 1921 favored a membership of 460, nor can they consistently challenge the good faith of those who now favor an increase in the membership of the House.

Mr. McLEOD. Did the gentleman support that bill that he is now talking about?

Mr. LOZIER. I was not a Member of Congress at that time.

Mr. McLEOD. Would the gentleman have supported that bill if he had been a Member?

Mr. LOZIER. I do not know whether I would have or not. I was not a Member of this House then, and why speculate as to what I would do or would not have done if I had been a Member of this body at that time? The gentleman well knows why I am opposing reapportionment under the 1920 census. Since I came here at the beginning of the Sixty-eighth Congress my position on reapportionment has been well known to every member of the committee and I believe to every Member of the House. The Republican majority in Congress made no effort to have a reapportionment bill reported during the Sixty-eighth Congress. In the Sixty-ninth Congress I opposed any reapportionment based on the 1920 census for several reasons. Congress, under Republican leadership and control, waited six or seven years before it seriously considered reporting a reapportionment bill. In other words, the Republican Party, although in full control of the executive and legislative branches of our Government, idled away and wasted nearly seven long years after the 1920 census before it made any serious effort to reap-portion representation under that census. The Republican Party waited until the time was near at hand to take the 1930 census. Near the close of the Sixty-ninth Congress a feeble gesture was made by the majority party to pass the reapportionment bill, but the measure had only the half-hearted support of the Republican leaders, and many of them by their votes and influence actively aided in the defeat of that measure, which in effect meant that they were opposed to any reapportionment until one could be made under the 1930 census. And after they have waited so long, I think it would be exceedingly foolish to pass a reapportionment act now, because it could not be put into operation by the States and made effective before the 1930 census is taken.

The census of 1920 was taken in January, when the roads in the agricultural sections were bad—in fact, almost impassable—and when the weather was exceedingly severe. Under these conditions anything like an accurate enumeratien in the agricultural districts was impossible. According to the Director of the Census, whose testimony appears in the hearings, the 1920 census was taken at the worse possible time to secure anything like a complete enumeration in agricultural communities.

In addition to the handicaps to which I have referred it is conceded that at the time the 1920 census was taken millions of boys from the farms, who had entered the Army had not reestablished themselves in the rural districts, but were temporarily employed in the cities and great industrial centers, expecting to return to their farm homes in February or March and take up anew their farm work. As a result, millions of our farm population, temporarily absent from the farms, were enumerated in the cities and in the great industrial centers, thereby tremendously and improperly inflating the population of the industrial States. The 1920 census was taken before there had been a readjustment of the population between the agricultural and industrial States and that census reflected the temporary shift from the farms to the industrial centers which was inevitable as a result of war conditions. In that census the agricultural population was not properly enumerated or allocated to the States to which it rightfully belonged.

Another factor that contributed materially to the inaccuracy of the 1920 census was the grossly inadequate compensation allowed enumerators, which prevented the Census Bureau from obtaining the services of competent enumerators. The census was taken near the peak of high prices and the allowance to enumerators was so ridiculously small that dependable and efficient enumerators could not be secured, or if secured they soon resigned because their compensation was far below what they could earn in most any other employment, and this fact coupled with other conditions to which I have referred made the 1920 census grossly inaccurate, and inasmuch as we are now preparing to take the Fifteenth Decennial Census there is sound reason in postponing apportionment until the 1930 census is completed. The pending bill is a mere gesture. I do not believe any Member of this House believes that it announces a sound policy or offers a workable plan for future reapportionment of Representatives among the several States.

Six years have been allowed to elapse before you gentlemen have seriously considered the enactment of reapportionment legislation, and even now you approach this problem committed to the formula that the House membership shall be limited to 435. You pay homage and reverence to this arbitrary number, this fetish, with as much awe and devotion as the untutored savage worships a crooked stick, a "tumble" bug, a spotted rock, a tiger's tooth, or a buzzard's claw in darkest Africa. After sleeping at the switch for over six years you have suddenly discovered that Congress has been guilty of a hideous crime and violation of the Constitution in not reapportioning representation under the census of 1920. Whatever guilt attaches to Congress for this failure a part of it rests on your shoulders.

It is conceded that it is now too late to enact and make effective a reapportionment under the 1920 census, and it is almost universally agreed that inasmuch as reapportionment has been deferred so long we should wait until it can be made under the 1930 census. When a reapportionment is made I want it based on a fair and complete census, in which the agricultural population is enumerated with reasonable accuracy, so that agriculture will have its proportionate part of the Representatives in Congress and in the Electoral College.

A reapportionment based on the 1920 census would be manifestly unjust to the agricultural States, because it was taken at the time when millions of young men and women whose homes were on the farm were temporarily absent and employed in the industrial States. Under such an apportionment Missouri would have lost two Representatives and two electoral votes. Other agricultural States would have suffered in like manner. If such loss came as the result of a fair and accurate enumeration, Missouri and other agricultural States would not complain.

Inasmuch as you have waited eight years since the 1920 census was taken, and in view of the fact that the Republican Party temporarily strangled, mangled, and killed the 1920 reapportionment, and as we are now on the eve of the 1930 census no great harm will result if we defer reapportionment until it can be based on an accurate census taken at a season of the year when we know the agricultural population will be on the farms and accurately enumerated, and this is undoubtedly the judgment of a large majority of the membership of this House, both Democrats and Republicans.

In demanding that a congressional reapportionment be based on an accurate census I am not remiss in my duty nor am I violating the Constitution or my oath of office; I am only demanding that the agricultural States be given a square deal and an accurate enumeration, which they did not get in the 1920 census.

Mr. McLEOD. Then it is the gentleman's theory that additional wrongs make a right?

Mr. LOZIER. It is not a wrong to refuse to recognize a census that is notoriously incomplete and inaccurate and that is grossly unfair to the agricultural population. It is not a question of additional wrongs. The gentleman is shooting wide of the mark. Will the gentleman get up in his own time and tell the House whether the 1920 census was a just and fair census? The gentleman knows or should know that the 1920 census was taken in a slip-shod manner and millions of young men and women were temporarily away from the farms, working in the factories in the industrial centers, and were enumerated in these industrial cities when they should have been counted in their real homes in the agricultural communities if the census had been taken at a time of the year when the farm population was on the farm. I am not criticizing the Census Bureau, for the officials of which I have a high regard, but it was a mistake—yes, a blunder—to attempt an enumeration of the farm population in midwinter, when the weather was extremely severe and the roads almost impassable, and when the compensation allowed enumerators was grossly inadequate and entirely insufficient to secure the services of competent enumerators.

I have a great respect for my friend, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD], who is one of the most useful Members of this House. Said Alexander on one occasion, "I have slept rather late this morning, but then I knew Antipater was awake." As Antipater was always on guard when the interests of Alexander were involved, so the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD] never sleeps when any legislation is pending that involves the interests of Michigan. I congratulate the people of his district and State on having the benefit of his services. However, candor compels me to say that he has grown a little lopsided and intellectually "groggy" on the subject of reappartionment, but he has lucid intervals when his faculties are directed to any other subject. I am sure he would not have made the blunder a majority of the Michigan delegation committed in 1921 when they, by a process of legislative hara-kiri, disemboweled the reapportionment act that would have given Michigan three additional Representatives and three additional votes in the Electoral College. But the gentleman from Michigan and his associates will never get a reapportionment bill until they cut loose from the hard-boiled reactionaries and agree to an increase in the membership of the House that will make it fully representative and enable the several vocational groups to have a voice and vote in legislative affairs.

Mr. CRAIL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. I am sorry I can not yield to my good friend from California, but I have yielded generously to my colleagues, and I think I should use the remaining portion of my time to call your attention to some other facts in connection with this proposed legislation.

This bill is a deliberate attempt to place Congress in a strait-jacket, an attempt to limit the membership of the House to 435 for all time. The bill seeks to prescribe a national policy under which the membership of the House shall never exceed 435 unless Congress, by affirmative action, overturns the formula and abandons the policy enunciated by this bill. I am unalterably opposed to limiting the membership of the House to the arbitrary number of 435. Why 435? Why not 400? Why not 300? Why not 250, 450, 535, or 600? Why is this number 435 sacred? What merit is there in having a membership of 435 that we would not have if the membership were 335 or 535? There is no sanctity in the number 435. It was adopted after the 1910 census to meet conditions that then existed in the same manner as Congress in former years fixed the membership at some other number. There is absolutely no reason, philosophy, or common sense in arbitrarily fixing the membership of the House at 435 or at any other number.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] in opposing any increase in the membership of the House quoted Mr. Madison as saying—

Though every member of the Athenian Assembly be a Socrates, the aggregate body would be a mob.

A very epigrammatic sentence, but void of reason and common sense. Athens lost her preeminence because she had not too many but too few men like Socrates in her legislative assemblies. The preeminence of Athens lasted only about 75 years. It began with her victory at the Battle of Platea, 479 B. C. It was strengthened by the confederation of Delos two years later. Her power was consolidated by Themistocles, whose farseeing naval policy contributed mightily to her commanding position. Her greatest influence was attained when Pericles was at the head of her affairs. Her glory departed in March, 404 B. C., when the Spartan Lysander sailed into her harbor Piræus, captured her triremes, destroyed her arsenals, burned her merchant ships, took possession of Athens, destroyed her strong and mighty bulwarks, while female flute players and wreathed dancers transformed the tragic demolition of the massive walls, the humiliation of proud Athens, into a Spartan festival. But, sirs, I say again, Athens perished not because she had too many but too few representative men in her assemblies. She fell from her high estate because she ceased to be a democracy and yielded to the government of a self-serving, special-privilege oligarchy. When Athens was dominated by a few men she suffered most. When she enlarged the number of her citizens who were privileged to participate in the making of her laws she prospered.

In the golden age of Pericles public opinion was respected and the popular will reflected in legislation. Attica, the State of which Athens was the capital, probably never had a population of over one-half a million, four-fifths of whom were slaves and one-half the remainder were resident aliens. The number of citizens, native males over the age of 20, who enjoyed the right of franchise was probably not in excess of 20,000. The population of the city of Athens never exceeded 200,000 and the number of those who were qualified to hold office was limited to a few favored groups.

I repeat that had Athens enlarged the membership of her legislative assemblies so all vocational groups and social classes would have had a voice and representation in the enactment of her laws, perhaps her preeminent position among the Grecian States and among the nations of the world would have been protracted for centuries. But Athens in her declining days was ruled by an oligarchy just as we will be governed if we do not enlarge the membership of the House so all sections and all vocational groups may be represented in this Chamber, and have a better opportunity to enforce their mandates and have their will reflected in legislation.

I speak regretfully when I say there is a rapidly growing group in the United States who are hostile to the fundamental principles of our Government, who look with contempt on the masses, or so-called common people, and who believe in restricting rather than enlarging the participation of the masses in legislative affairs. This group would like to see Congress abolished or reduced to a condition of impotence. They would like to see the power of the executive department enlarged until we would have a Government not of, by, or for the people but a Government by the President and by departments, bureaus, and commissions for the exclusive benefit of the special privilege classes. They would confer on the President and on bureau chiefs the right to determine what shall be our national policies and they would make Congress a mere puppet to register the will of the President and departmental heads.

These reactionary groups and individuals are opposed to increasing the membership of the House to meet the needs of our rapidly growing population. They do not want popular government in the true sense of that term. They would be supremely happy if Congress were composed of only a few men who would register the will of the President, bureau chiefs, and special-privileged classes. They would make Congress a close corporation controlled by the rich, powerful, high-born, and influential classes. I would rather have Congress a great, popular forum, in which great national problems could be debated and deliberately considered, and great, national policies formulated.

The smaller the membership of the House the easier it is to be controlled by those who seek to use it for the accomplishment of their selfish, sordid, and sinister purpose.

If, as Burke says, "Government is a contrivance of human system to provide for human wants," and if Macaulay was correct when he said, "The end of government is the happiness of the people," why should not our Government provide for an adequate and free expression of the popular will? What sound reason can be given for not enlarging the forum in which far-reaching national policies are fomulated? This House should be composed not only of representatives from every section of our far-flung domain, but in so far as reasonably possible by representatives of every vocational group in our diversified population, to the end that public questions may be considered from every possible angle and affect every class of society and every vocational group.

Mr. Webster was right when he said that ours is "the people's Government, made for the people, made by the people, and answerable to the people." Our legislative system is not a fossil but a living plant that grows and develops to the end that its fruitage may sustain and nourish good citizenship and render more efficient our benevolent governmental activities. The ideal Government should reflect and be responsive to the combined judgment and will of the masses.

Frederick the Great said, "If I wanted to punish a province I would have it governed by philosophers," and I will say if I wanted to destroy our free institutions I would create a Congress composed of a few men who believe in a governing class, a bureaucratic system, and who under cover despise the common people and look with a feeling akin to contempt on their capacity for self-government.

Dean Swift gave expression to a wise philosophy when he said "It may pass for a maxim in state, the administration can not be placed in too few hands nor the legislation in too many," meaning that in an ideal government legislation should be enacted by an assembly composed of representatives from all important vocational groups, and after legislation is enacted which represents the combined judgment of the masses, it can be best administered by comparatively few individuals.

Wendell Phillips declared that "Governments exist to protect the rights of the minorities. The loved and rich need no protection—they have many friends and few enemies," and Thaddeus Stevens said, "The freedom of a government does not depend upon the quality of those laws but upon the power that has the right to create them."

Every just government should and must reflect the public will and execute the public mandate. The smaller the legislative body the less responsive it is to public sentiment, less inclined to reflect the will of the electorate, more disposed to yield to pressure from those whose chief mission is to exploit the people and plunder the government, more likely to come under venal influences, and more eager to legislate for the benefit of a few favored classes to the detriment of the great army of so-called common people.

In the language of James Russell Lowell, "All free governments, whatever their names, are in reality governments by public opinion; and it is on the quality of that public opinion that their prosperity depends." Representative government is a farce if the legislative body consists of a comparatively few men who contemptuously ignore well-considered public opinion when unmistakably expressed at the ballot box. Ours is not a government created for the benefit of a favored few or in which legislation should be enacted for the enrichment of the few at the expense of the many.

Duclos said, "The best government is not that which renders men the happiest but that which renders the greatest number happy." A legislative assembly with comparatively few members will inevitably develop into an oligarchy and legislate to make a few vocational groups rich and prosperous at the expense of the masses. Mr. Hume, the eminent historian and philosopher, refers to the ease with which the many are governed by the few, and to quote Thaddeus Stevens again, "No government can be free that does not allow all of its citizens to participate in the formation and execution of her laws."

All governments are the efforts of men to organize society, and every undue restriction on the right of representation is an effort to overthrow liberty. The masses are the source from which springs nearly all that is good and wholesome in free governments, and all just governments reflect the tendencies and instincts of the masses. The supreme purposes of all free governments are to promote social, political, and economical justice to the end that the rights of the humblest citizen may be safeguarded as zealously as the interest of the opulent and high-born. Congress is the servant of the people—the agent, attorney in fact, or trustee of the public. Who will arrogate to himself the right to say how many agents the people may select to reflect their wishes, speak their views, and work their sovereign will? If you arbitrarily limit the right of the people to say how many representatives they shall have in the lower House of Congress you thereby impose unwarranted restrictions on them and limit their right of expression and representation.

John Bigelow in his keen and scholarly analysis of our scheme of government said:

The people of the United States very deliberately framed their Government with the view of remaining the masters of it and not of being mastered by it; and they are not yet willing to abdicate in favor of any, even the most audacious conspirator against their sovereignity.

If our Nation is to be true to the ideals and lofty standards established by our constitutional fathers it must be a reflex on the deliberate and independent opinion and judgment of the people. It will not do for a small governing group to say that the masses are not capable of having their will reflected in legislation. It is treason to assert that the people, as a whole, are not capable of knowing what legislation will best promote their interests and the welfare of the Nation, and it will be a sad day for our free institutions when a small group monopolizes the enactment and administration of our laws.

On one occasion John Bright, the great English statesman, said that the Government at Washington was the strongest Government in the world because it is based on the good will of an instructed people; and that is true.

Our Government is strong primarily because under our congressional system the several classes and vocational groups and all diversified interests have an opportunity to be heard and to have their views presented and their interests protected by the enactment of just, sound, and wholesome legislation. Every reduction, actual or relative, in the membership of the House will correspondingly reduce the opportunties of the various vocational groups to have a part in shaping legislation and will correspondingly increase the power of the privileged few of the influential or the dominant vocational class. A government that rests on the consent of the greatest number is more stable than one that is maintained by the authority of a few people. A legislative body made up of every large and important vocational group will come nearer enacting legislation in the interest of all the people than a legislative body with comparatively small membership. As was said by Daniel Webster in one of his masterly addresses—

I say to you, and to our whole country, and to the crowned heads and aristocratic parties and feudal systems that exist that it is to self-government—the greatest popular representation and administration—the system that lets in all to participate in the counsels that are to assign the good or evil to all—that we may owe what we are and what we hope to be.

In proportion to our population we have fewer representatives of the people in the House of Representatives than any first-class power in the world. The House of Commons, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, has a membership of 615 after the withdrawal of the representatives from the Irish Free State; the population of the United Kingdom is approximately 45,000,000. Each member of the House of Commons from England represents approximately 72,000 people, and a district with an average area of 153 square miles. Every representative in the House of Commons from northern Ireland represents approximately 96,000 people and a district with an average area of 402 square miles. Every representative in the House of Commons from Scotland represents approximately 66,000 people and a district with an average area of 410 square miles. Every representative in the House of Commons from Wales represents approximately 61,000 people and a district with an average area of 196 square miles.

While under the present apportionment, based on the census of 1910, a Member of the House of Representatives of the United States represents approximately 242,000 people and a district with an average area of 6,824 square miles, and if the pending bill is enacted under the 1930 census each Representative in this Chamber will represent approximately 283,000 people, and, according to the formula embodied in this bill, in a comparatively short time, each Member of this body would have to look after the interests of one-half a million people.

I assert that no Member of Congress is capable of ably and efficiently representing more than 250,000 people, especially when you take into consideration the conflicting interests of different vocational groups and the tremendous diversification of our industries. If 60 per cent of the population of a district belong to the industrial class and 40 per cent of the population of that district belong to the agricultural group, obviously the industrial population will designate the Representative from that district and control and direct his vote and influence along legislative lines that will be beneficial to the industrial classes and disadvantageous to the agricultural group.

In nearly all the States the industries are diversified. The agricultural population dominates in certain States, while in other States the industrial and commercial classes are in the majority. A relatively small membership in the House will mean that the dominant vocational group in each State and in the Nation will send to this Chamber Representatives who are pledged to vote and use their influence to secure the enactment of laws which will promote the interest and welfare of such vocational group. On the other hand, if the membership of the House is within reasonable limits, increased with our expanding population, there will be better opportunity for the vocational classes that are in the minority to have Representatives in this body and to have a voice in the enactment of laws. A House of Representatives with a large membership will better enable the several vocational groups that make up our cosmopolitan population to have a voice and vote in the determination of our national policies, while a House with a smaller membership by a process of geometrical progression automatically and disproportionately decreases the influence, voice, and vote of the minority groups of our population.

The popular branch of the French Parliament has 626 members. The population of France is approximately 41,000,000, and each member of the lower house of the French Parliament represents an average of 66,000 people. In Italy, which has a population of approximately 37,000,000 people, the lower house has a membership of 508; each member represents approximately 71,000 people. In Germany, which has a population of approximately 55,000,000, the lower house has a membership of 423 and each member represents approximately 130,000 people. In Spain, which has a population of approximately 20,000,000, the lower house has a membership of 417 and each member represents approximately 48,000 people. In every civilized nation on the globe the popular legislative assembly has a much larger proportionate membership than our House of Representatives, although our diversified industries and great wealth should suggest a much larger membership in the popular branch of our National Congress.

The national wealth of the United Kingdom is approximately $120,000,000,000 and each member of the House of Commons represents approximately $195,000,000. The national wealth of Canada is approximately $22,000,000,000 and each member of the House of Commons of the Canadian Parliament speaks approximately for $90,000,000 of national wealth. The national wealth of France is approximately $60,000,000,000 and on an average each member of the French Chamber of Deputies represents $103,000,000 of wealth. The national wealth of Germany is $40,000,000,000 and on an average each member of the Reichstag represents about $81,000,000. The national wealth of Italy is approximately $35,000,000,000 and the average member of the Italian Chamber of Deputies represents about $62,000,000 of national wealth. The national wealth of Japan is approximately $23,000,000,000 and the average member of the Japanese Parliament represents about $48,000,000 national wealth. While the national wealth of the United States in 1925 was estimated to be $320,000,000,000, and each Member of the lower House of Congress, on an average, represents $737,000,000 of national wealth.

It is, therefore, very evident, all things being considered, that the membership of the House of Representatives is relatively and proportionately smaller than that of any similar legislative assembly in the world, and this is especially true when you take into consideration our enormous wealth, our diversified industries, our far flung public domain, our almost limitless natural resources, our complex industrial and economic structure. Ours is the largest, wealthiest, and most powerful nation on the globe. It is the greatest business corporation in the world. In reality the membership of Congress constitutes a board of directors charged with the formulation of national policies and the enactment of laws to conserve the interests and promote the welfare of all the people of the United States. The business of the Nation is of such tremendous magnitude and is so extremely complicated and is increasing so rapidly that the lower House of Congress can not continue to function efficiently and properly discharge its constitutional duties unless the membership of the House is moderately increased from time to time as our population increases and our social, industrial, and economical life expands. There are many reasons why the membership of the House should not be arbitrarily limited to 435. As I have said there is nothing sacred in the number 435. This number is not determined by any logical or scientific process of reasoning. This limitation on the membership of the House is not based on any sound public policy. By no logical process of reasoning can the proponents of the pending bill sustain their contention that for all time the American people shall be represented in this Chamber by 435 Members and no more.

Congress was made for the American people, to speak their will, reflect their wishes, and execute their deliberate judgment. Who, I pray, gave the present Members of this body power and authority to limit the membership of this House and by legislative fiat declare the number of Members of this body by which the American people may in the future work their will? Who constituted you the judges as to how many servants the sovereign people may have or need in the future to honestly and efficiently legislate? How can you gentlemen with your finite vision fix a definite Procrustean standard by which the people of the United States in legislating must forever hereafter be governed? How can you tell in advance what size House will best serve the demands of future generations? Is the judgment of the men who now constitute the membership of this House so infallible and well matured that you can dogmatically assert that the American people need 435 Members in the lower House, no more, no less, to initiate and consummate legislation that will embody their approved policies and work their legislative will? Whence this ipse dixit, this infallible formula, this hard-and-fast dictum that at no time in the future will the people need more than 435 Representatives to speak for them in the popular branch of our legislative system? When did the American people, who own this Government, constitute you a judge of their future needs? Who authorized you to put the American electorate in a straight jacket which will prevent them from increasing the number of their agents and servants in this body, or make it exceedingly difficult so to do? When and where did you acquire the oracular wisdom which enables you to accurately foresee the future needs of the people of the United States? Why should this Congress impose its fallible will and immature judgment on all future Congresses? What would have happened if those who framed our Constitution had written therein a provision limiting the membership of the House to 65, or to 100, 150, or 200? I will answer and say that such a limitation would have placed the American people in a straight-jacket and created an oligarchy or formed a governing group which would have slowly, yet surely, undermined representative government and driven us dangerously close to a monarchial form of government.

But our constitutional fathers had the foresight, wisdom, and vision to understand that with the increase in population and with the development of our social, civic, and industrial and economic life it would be absolutely necessary from time to time to increase the membership of the House. They wisely limited the membership of the Senate, because the Senate is the voice or representative of the States as States; but the framers of the Constitution adopted a formula by which the membership of the House could be enlarged as the population increased or the needs of the people demanded. Have you more wisdom than those who formulated our organic law? Will you attempt to put the American people in legislative shackles and dogmatically say that they do not need and shall never at any time in the future have more than 435 Members in the lower House of Congress? While this measure can be repealed if it becomes a law, still the main object of this bill is to bind future Congresses and definitely establish a national policy.

When our Constitution was being framed there were those who leaned strongly toward a monarchial form of government and who desired to limit the power of the common people or masses to work their will or have a part in the enactment of legislation and in the administration of our Federal affairs. These men favored a House with a small membership in which a few strong and powerful men could and would control legislation. This group of men were in reality opposed to popular government and sought to limit in every possible way the participation of the masses in our governmental affairs. They favored a Government dominated by the educated, the wealthy, and the high-born. But this reactionary group, led by Alexander Hamilton and others, did not succeed in impressing their monarchial views on the convention that prepared our Federal Constitution. The men who really believed in representative government incorporated in our Constitution a provision for expanding the membership of the House. They realized that our population would increase and that the relationship between the people and their Government would become more intimate and complex and that there would be a multiplication of departments, commissions, bureaus, and other governmental agencies to such an extent that an enlargement of the membership of the House from time to time would not only be wise but necessary.

Since the foundation of our Government it has been the established policy of our Nation to enlarge the membership of the House after each decennial census, because such increase in the membership of the House was considered necessary in order to more efficiently accomplish the outstanding purpose for which this Government was created. This rule was never deviated from but once. Under the apportionment based on the 1840 census, the membership of the House was reduced from 242 to 232.

If some of the wise men who are now Members of the House and who are constituting themselves judges as to the future needs of the American people had been members of the Constitutional Convention they would no doubt have imposed their imperious will and immature judgment on future generations by writing into the Constitution a provision definitely limiting the membership of the House to some arbitrary number, thereby shackling the American people and making it increasingly impossible for our congressional system to function efficiently. In fact, there were a few reactionary members of the Constitutional Convention who believed that the First Congress, with a membership of 65, would be an unwieldy body, perchance a mob. But these men, led by Alexander Hamilton, did not write our Federal Constitution. Hamilton had much to do with securing the ratification of the Constitution, but practically nothing to do with writing it. Early in the sessions of the convention the views of Mr. Hamilton were rejected and those of Mr. Madison approved, and thereafter Mr. Hamilton had but little to say or do in the preparation of this epoch-marking, history-making document.

In all periods of our national history there have been a few "hard-boiled" reactionaries and bureaucrats who were tinctured with monarchical tendencies and who argued that the membership of the House was too large and that it was unwieldy and could not function efficiently. But their prophecies and dark forebodings have come to naught. I have heard some of my colleagues say that the membership of this House should be reduced at least one-half. Those who give expression to this sentiment are not thoughtful students of our free institutions. They remind me of poll parrots thoughtlessly repeating something they have heard some one else say. They would not give expression to such sentiments if they understood the genius and spirit of our institutions.

If you are going to destroy the representative character of the House and turn it into a little club or rich-man's bureau in which a few master minds will dominate their colleagues and determine national policies, why not go a step further and abolish Congress, abrogate the Constitution, adopt a monarchial form of government and make our President a king with autocratic power to both reign and rule? I assert that the House of Representatives with a large membership will best reflect, interpret, and declare the popular will and is the surest safeguard of our free institutions.

The Federal Constitution promulgated in 1787 provided for the taking of a census in 1790 and every tenth year thereafter, and until the population was ascertained under the First Census the number of Representatives should not exceed 1 for every 30,000 population. But each State, of course, should have at least one Representative; and until the first enumeration the membership of the House was fixed at 65. Under the 1790 apportionment the membership was increased to 105 or 1 Representative for every 33,000 people. In 1800 the membership of the House was increased to 142, or 1 Member for every 33,000 people. In 1810 the membership was fixed at 186, or 1 Member for every 35,000 people. Under the apportionment of 1820 the membership of the House was increased to 213, or 1 Representative for every 40,000 people. Under the 1830 apportionment the House membership was fixed at 242, or 1 Representative for every 47,700. Under the 1840 census the membership was reduced from 242 to 232, which was on the basis of 1 Representative for every 70,680 people. In 1850 the membership was increased to 237, or 1 Member for every 93,423 people. In 1860 the basis of representation was 127,381, which gave the House a membership of 243. In 1870 the basis of representation was 131,425, which again increased the membership of the House to 293. In 1880 the membership was fixed at 332, which was 1 Representative for every 151,911 people. In 1890 the basis of representation was 173,901, which gave the House a membership of 357. In 1900 the membership was fixed at 386, which was 1 Representative for every 194,182 people. In 1910 the apportionment act gave the House a membership of 435, which was 1 Representative for every 211,877 people. No apportionment has been made since that based on the census of 1910.

The Jefferson formula in apportioning representation among the several States was to divide the population of each State by 30,000 and add the quotients. This system prevailed for 50 years, and under it no attention was paid to fractions. The formula under which major fractions were recognized was first employed in the 1840 apportionment based on the 1840 census.

It is interesting to know that President Washington vetoed the first reapportionment bill enacted by Congress on the ground that it was unconstitutional because it recognized the principal of major fractions in allocating Representatives to the several States. This veto message was based largely on the brief and argument of Thomas Jefferson, who contended that under a proper construction of the Constitution fractions could not be considered in apportioning Representatives to the several States.

While the Jeffersonian formula for apportioning Representation was followed for 50 years, the correctness of this rule was vigorously assailed by Mr. Webster in the Senate in April, 1832, and by Senator Everett in May of that year. In his very able and logical argument Mr. Webster justified the major-fraction formula in apportioning representation among the States in proportion to their population, and while Mr. Webster did not succeed in having the major-fraction formula made the basis of the apportionment act of 1832 it was actually adopted in the apportionment act of 1842, which was based on the 1840 census. The arguments of Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Webster in favor of their respective methods of apportioning Representation are found in the fifth edition of Story on the Constitution, pages 495–512, and their careful study by every Member of this House is worth while.

When the text of the Federal Constitution was first submitted to the American people for ratification it was understood that if the Constitution was ratified a series of amendments would immediately be submitted to perfect the instrument. These proposals were declaratory and restrictive amendments to the Constitution. There were 12 of these amendments. In view of the strenuous efforts on the part of certain Members of the House and of the reactionary forces throughout the Nation at the present time to prevent an increase in the membership of the House, it is significant that the first of the 12 constitutional amendments proposed by Congress at its first session in 1789 related to the subject now under consideration in this House. That amendment was expressed in the following terms:

> After the first enumeration, required by the first article of the Constitution, there shall be 1 Representative for every 30,000, until the number shall amount to 100; after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall not be less than 100 Representatives nor less than 1 for every 40,000 persons, until the number of Representatives shall amount to 200; after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall not be less than 200 Representatives nor more than 1 Representative for every 50,000.

In the language of Judge Story—

> This amendment was never ratified by a competent number of the States to be incorporated into the Constitution. It was probably thought that the whole subject was safe where it was already lodged, and that Congress ought to be left free to exercise a sound discretion, according to the future exigencies of the Nation, either to increase or diminish the number of representatives.

And so say I. Sound public policy persuasively suggests that the limitation embodied in the pending bill shou'd not be approved and that Congress should be left entirely free to exercise a sound and reasonable discretion, according to the future exigencies of the Nation, to fix the membership of the House at such number as may be necessary to give all sections and vocational groups fair and just representation in this Chamber. This is especially true when we consider that the membership in the Senate is fixed on an entirely different basis than is employed in determining the membership of the House. In the Senate a majority of States may make their will effective, because the Senate as a body speaks not for the people but for the States as States. In the House, under the system of proportional representation, a majority of the people may make their will effectual in one branch of the legislative power. The Senate speaks for a majority of the States. The House speaks for a majority of the people; and when a bill passes both Houses it represents the combined will of a majority of the people—speaking through the House—and a majority of the States—speaking through the Senate.

Those who are so viciously opposed to any increase in the membership of the House lose sight of the fact that we must either increase the size of the House or the constituencies must be enlarged. The adoption of one or the other of these alternatives is inescapable. I insist that the representative character of the House will be materially improved by expanding the membership within reasonable bounds with the inevitable increase in our population. The representative character of the House will not be improved by enlarging the size of the districts and maintaining the membership at 435. The constituencies are now large enough. The average Member of Congress now has a constituency as large as he can efficiently serve.

Under our scheme of government, if Congress is to be truly representative each Member of the House, in so far as is reasonably possible, should be acquainted with his constituents or at least with a very considerable portion of them. This is essential in order that the Representative may know the viewpoint of his constituents, their needs, their problems, and their demands; what national policies they favor; what will best promote their economic well-being; what laws will contribute to their civic betterment and welfare and what laws will handicap them or withhold from them the social justice and equality of opportunity that is the constitutional right of every citizen.

Every Member of this House should have more than a passing acquaintance with the several cross sections of population in his district. He should familiarize himself with the factors and conditions which might help or hinder the people he represents. He should inform himself thoroughly as to the conditions and needs of his constituents, so that he will be able to speak for them, present their cause, press their claims, and represent them in the true sense of the term. Even now most districts are too large to enable a Member to get acquainted with a majority of his constituents, and often the districts are so large that he can not familiarize himself with the needs of the various vocational groups in his district, reconcile their conflicting demands, and adequately protect their diversified interests.

The more you enlarge the districts the larger the constituencies; the further you remove the Representative from contact with his constituents the less responsive he is to their will. The smaller the district the better acquainted a Member is with those he represents and the more readily he responds to their demands and the more efficiently he reflects their will. Moreover, it is not only necessary for the Member to know his constituents, but it is just as important that the constituents know their Representative.

In order that the people of a district may exercise intelligent judgment and make a wise choice in the election of their Representative they must know the man who seeks a commission to serve them. They must know him as a man, as a neighbor; know his public and private life; know whether or not he is capable and sincere and know whether he has the required amount of stamina to reflect their wishes and protect their interests. In view of our ever-expanding population, the people can not have this intimate knowledge of the qualifications of candidates for Congress if you adopt the policy of increasing the size of the constituencies and retain the membership at 435.

If you should need an agent or attorney to represent you, speak for you, and protect your interests, prudence would suggest that you employ one with whom you are acquainted and with whose private, public, and professional life you are familiar, either from actual contact or by reputation. A Member of Congress is an agent or attorney in fact for his constituents. He can not satisfactorily represent them unless he has talked with them, heard their story, listened to their statements, ascertained their viewpoints, and become saturated with the spirit that actuates those he represents. In like manner the closer a Member of Congress is to his constituents the more efficiently he will serve them and reflect their will. A Member representing 200,000 people can know and serve his constituents better than a Member who represents 500,000 people. The smaller the district the better acquainted the people will be with their Representative and the easier it will be to check his actions and retire him to private life if he is derelict in his duty.

By enlarging the size of the constituencies and holding the membership of the House at 435 the less responsive Congress will be to the popular will. By maintaining the present membership of the House you make it increasingly easy for the great corporations and special-privilege classes to control legislation and dominate the economic life of the Nation. If the membership of the House is not reasonably expanded with the increase in our population, in a few years this Government will be completely dominated by the sinister and cynical influences that make merchandise of patriotism and avariciously plunder the public. I do not deny that in after years there may come a time when wisdom will suggest that the membership of the House be not increased following each decennial census, but we have not yet reached that point and in my opinion that time is far off. When our Federal Constitution was adopted we had thirteen States. These States, in 1790, had a population of 3,929,214. The Constitution fixed the membership of Congress at 65 until the taking of the first census. That was on the basis of 1 Representative for every 60,449 people.

New Hampshire with a population in 1790 of 141,885 was given 3 Representatives, or 1 Member for every 47,295 people, while under the present apportionment New Hampshire, with a population of 430,572, has only 2 Representatives (1 less than she had in 1790). She now has 1 for every 215,286 people.

Massachusetts, with a population in 1790 of 378,787, was given 8 Representatives, or 1 for every 47,348 people. While under the present apportionment Massachusetts, with a population of 3,366,416 has 16 Representatives, or 1 for every 210,401 people.

Rhode Island, with a population in 1790 of 68,825, was given 1 Representative, while under the present apportionment, Rhode Island, with a population of 542,610, has 3 Representatives, or 1 for every 187,536.

Connecticut, with a population in 1790 of 237,964, was given 5 Representatives, or 1 for every 47,592, while under the present apportionment Connecticut, with a population of 1,114,756, has the same number of Representatives she had in 1790. She now has 1 Representative for every 222,951.

New York, with a population in 1790 of 340,120, had 6 Representatives, or 1 for every 56,686 people, while under the present apportionment New York, with a population of 9,113,614, has 43 Representatives or 1 for every 211,943 people.

New Jersey, with a population in 1790 of 184,139, was given 4 Representatives, or 1 for every 46,034 people, while under the present apportionment New Jersey, with a population of 2,537,167, has 12 Representatives, or 1 for every 211,430 people.

Pennsylvania, with a population in 1790 of 434,373, was given 8 Representatives, while under the present apportionment Pennsylvania, with 7,665,111 people, has 36 Representatives, or 1 for every 212,919 people.

Delaware, with 59,096 population in 1790, was given 1 Representative, while under the present apportionment Delaware with a population of 202,322 still has but 1 Representative.

Maryland, with a population in 1790 of 319,728, was given 6 Representatives, or 1 for every 53,288 people, while under the present apportionment Maryland, with a population of 1,295,346, still has 6 Representatives or 1 for every 215,557 people.

Virginia, with a population in 1790 of 747,610, was given 10 Representatives, or 1 for every 74,761 people, while under the present apportionment Virginia, with 2,061,612 population, has 10 Representatives (the same number as in 1790), or 1 for every 206,161 people.

North Carolina, with a population in 1790 of 393,751, was given 5 Representatives, or 1 for every 78,550 people, while under the present apportionment North Carolina, with a population of 2,206,287, has 10 Representatives, or 1 for every 206,287 people.

South Carolina, with a population of 249,073, was given 5 Representatives, or 1 for every 49,814 people, while under the present apportionment South Carolina, with a population of 1,515,400, has 7 Representatives, or 1 for every 216,485.

Georgia, with a population of 82,548, was given 3 Representatives, or 1 for every 27,516, while under the present apportionment Georgia, with a population of 2,609,121, has 12 Representatives, or 1 for every 217,426 people.

Congress has been very conservative in adopting a basis for representation in the House. If we had the same basis of representation now that was adopted for the first Congress, the membership of the House would be approximately 1,700. Subsequent Congresses, as to the size of the House, have been much less radical than the framers of our Constitution and we can safely trust Congress at all times in the future to adopt a basis of representation that will be reasonable and proper.

In calling your attention to the fact that the House of Commons had a membership of 615, I intended to state that there is less reason for the House of Commons having a large membership than there is for increasing the membership of the House of Representatives. The British Empire, while nominally monarchial in form, is nevertheless governed by Parliament through ministers chosen by Parliament. The House of Commons does not enact all laws by which the British Empire is governed. Many of the laws and regulations are mere orders promulgated by the ministers. I refer to orders in council or orders issued by the ministers and which have the force and effect of laws as though enacted by Parliament. The real details of the administration of the British Empire are generally worked out in council, and all orders in council have the effect and force of law. The primary function of the British Parliament is to formulate and declare national policies and to enact general laws, leaving to the ministry the making of administrative provisions. Yet Great Britain, with a population of about one-third our population and with about one-fourth of the wealth of the United States, has 615 members in the House of Commons and approximately 1,000 members in the House of Lords.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. I regret that I can not yield now, but I must complete this statement. It is argued that the House with a membership of more than 435 would not function and that it would be unwieldy. In answer to this I say that the House of Representatives, with a membership of 435, functions more efficiently than the Senate with a membership of 96. The House of Representatives functions more efficiently than any other parliamentary body in the world. Under its rules and practice the House can at all times speedily and effectively work its will. Ours is a government by political parties. The majority party in the House controls all the committees, and with this legislative machinery the House can dispose of legislation with unprecedented celerity. No one who knows anything about proceedings in this House will say that it would function more efficiently if it has only 200 Members, and with this legislative machinery a House of Representatives with a membership of 500 or 600 would function just as expeditiously and efficiently as with the present membership.

But some of my colleagues are still afraid that a House with 500 or 600 Members will be "too big." Why, gentlemen, this is a big country, and why should we fear to have a House comparable in size with our greatness as a Nation? Ours is the greatest Nation the sun smiles upon in his steady stride through the far-flung universe; ours is the greatest and most benevolent Government conceived in the minds of men since the morning stars sang together and the curtain went up on human history. Our wealth of farms, fields, factories, forests, mills, mountains, and plains far exceeds that of any other nation. Ours is a complex and exceedingly complicated industrial and economical system. Our interests and activities are tremendously diversified and antagonistic, and the government of 125,000,000 people is a big job. There are so many economic cross currents and political rip tides that the enacting of laws for the government of 125,000,000 people is no easy task. Five hundred or six hundred men or even more are not too many men on whose shoulders the government of the mighty Nation rests. In 25 years the population and business of this Nation will have grown so enormously that Congress will have at least 700 Members, and in 50 years 1,000 Members of Congress will not be too many.

Under the well-established and smoothly working rules by which the House of Representatives operates, the addition or subtraction of 100 from the present membership will not militate against the expeditious disposition of legislation, although any substantial reduction in the membership will make the body less representative, less responsive to popular will, and more subject to the pernicious influence of a corrupt lobby. Under the present machinery of the House, legislation approved by the leaders can and is put through by the leaders with a celerity seldom equaled and never surpassed in the history of representative government. The leaders of the majority may be slow in reaching a decision as to what legislation they will enact, but after a decision is once reached the approved legislation is almost invariably considered at once and enacted. Debate can be limited to a few minutes or hours, and this to all intents and purposes is the same as no debate. So there is absolutely no basis for the claim that a larger House could not function efficiently.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. I regret I can not yield further. I want to call the attention of my colleagues to a quotation from a book written by my friend the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], one of the most versatile and scholarly men in the House. I have not always agreed with him. I think he is often wrong, and if you will permit the expression, I think he is frequently "economically unsound," but no one will challenge his versatility and profound learning. In his very valuable work on "Legislative assemblies" he discusses the question as to whether or not a large legislative body functions more efficiently than a small one. He sums up the arguments in favor of a large legislative assembly, as follows:

> "Large houses are likely to secure representation of a greater variety of social interest by having in their membership men of all the professions and many pursuits. A much more extensive knowledge of local conditions and local opinion is available. Venal influences can not turn a large body from the path of duty. Bribery and corruption have less chance; logrolling is harder; all secret influences are hampered. In speeches and votes personal friendships are less likely to embarrass or swerve. Many more citizens can profit by a share in the educating effect of legislative service, and in turn schooling in public affairs is much more widely diffused by them throughout the community. More voters know their representatives and therefore take personal interest in the work of the legislature. State-wide acquaintance is fostered. Large bodies move more slowly and therefore with less danger from hasty change. There are more men among whom to divide the work of committees."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield me a little more time to finish this apropos quotation from this most excellent treatise of the gentleman from Massachusetts? It goes to the heart of this question, and I want the proponents of the pending bill to hear these words of wisdom from the gentleman and prophet from Massachusetts.

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman seven minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ELLIOTT). The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for seven minutes more.

Mr. BEEDY. Do I understand the gentleman is reciting this to prove that Mr. LUCE is wrong? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOZIER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] is sometimes wrong, but when he wrote this admirable volume he was right; dead right! But if he has any intention of voting for this pending legislative monstrosity he is as wrong in his attitude toward this bill as he was right when he wrote this book, and I would be constrained to appeal from Philip drunk on partisanship to Philip sober, who, in the volume mentioned above, so convincingly states the reasons in favor of a large membership in the popular branch of the Government of a free people. Our distinguished colleague in the same volume sums up the arguments in favor of a legislative assembly with a smaller membership.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Is that in the same book?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes; and on the following page. After giving the arguments pro and con the learned author then gives his own views in the following language:

> Such a contradiction of arguments so numerous makes it gross presumption for any one man to speak dogmatically. Appreciating the need of modesty where so many thoughtful men have failed to reach anything like agreement, I venture a conclusion of my own with no other hope than that as an opinion it may count for one. It is to the effect that for the purpose of embodying the common will in statutes of general purport concerned with principles and policies, the larger the House the better; and that for the purpose of transacting the business of government, the administrative business now so unwisely imposed on representative bodies elected by popular vote, the smaller the House the better. When the time comes that these two distinct functions are separated, with the legislature restricted to principles and policies and with the making of rules and regulations transferred to some sort of administrative agency, then the type of house found in New Hampshire and Massachusetts or at Washington will prove the safer and wiser.

The learned author says that for the purpose of embodying the common will in statutes of general purport concerned with principles and policies, the larger the House the better. And that is true. After all, our structure of government is built around the Congress. It is the body primarily designated by the Constitution to express the will of the people and to determine national policies. Congress alone can enact laws. Congress alone can initiate legislation, and those who wrote the Federal Constitution made the House of Representatives the more important branch of our legislative system because it expressly provides that all legislation involving the levy of taxes and the collection of revenue must originate in the House of Representatives and can not originate in the Senate. In other words, under the Constitution the power to enact tax legislation is vested exclusively in the House. This is a wise provision, because every battle for human freedom has been fought around the standard of taxation, and in order that the masses may control taxation the House of Representatives should have a membership sufficiently large to give all important vocational groups a voice and vote in this the popular branch of our legislative system, to the end that Congress may reflect the will of the people and determine national policies in harmony with an enlightened public sentiment.

The supreme purpose of all law is to promote social justice, and the Congress of the United States was established to the end that the common will of the people might be established by statutory law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members speaking on this measure may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, the actual trail to the far West, its hardships and difficulties, are well known. The story of the covered wagon has made them so. The legislative trail to the far West is not so well known. It, too, had its hardships and difficulties.

So that the legislative trail may be better known, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD data regarding the legislative history of the Lewis and Clark expedition, the objections to the passage of the Oregon donation act, and the objections to the homestead act, as revealed in the debates in Congress.

The misgivings expressed in the congressional debates about the wisdom and possible effect of these measures were never realized. On the contrary, these measures made for the development and splendor of our country. So may it be with pending measures for the further development of the West—the misgivings may never be realized.

The data which I desire to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was prepared in the legislative reference service of the Library of Congress by Miss Rita Dielmann, who is entitled to great credit for the painstaking way in which she has gleaned through the RECORD.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
Washington, March 30, 1928.

Hon. N. J. SINNOTT,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
Room 347, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to your letter of March 17, asking for information as to the objections made in Congress to the Lewis and Clark expedition, the Oregon donation act, and to the homestead law, I submit the three following typewritten studies:

The legislative history of the appropriation for the Lewis and Clark expedition.

A statement of the objections in Congress to the Oregon donation act.

Objections to the homestead act as revealed in the debates in Congress.

Very respectfully,

H. H. B. MEYER,
Director Legislative Reference Service.

THE LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF THE APPROPRIATION FOR THE LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION

On January 18, 1803, President Jefferson addressed a confidential message to Congress on the renewal of the act for maintaining trading houses with the Indians. He asked for an appropriation of $2,500 "for the purpose of extending the external commerce of the United States." (Annals of Congress, 7th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 24–26.)

The legislative history of the act for "extending the external commerce of the United States" discloses no opposition to the bill or to the appropriation. The Annals of Congress contain no record of debate. The bill granting $2,500 for extending the external commerce of the United States became a law February 28, 1803. (Annals of Congress, 7th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 27, 32, 81, 82, 91, 207, 522, 534, 543. Appendix, p. 1566.)

Something of the state of the public mind and of Congress on exploring the Northwest may be gleaned from Jefferson's correspondence.

As early as December 4, 1783, Jefferson wrote to Gen. George Rogers Clark:

"Some of us have been talking here in a feeble way of making the attempt to search [the country from the Mississippi]; but I doubt whether we have enough of that kind of spirit to raise the money." (F. G. Young, The Lewis and Clark Expedition, p. 16.)

On February 27, 1803, Jefferson wrote to Doctor Barton asking for notes on botany, zoology, and Indian history:

"You know we have been many years wishing to have the Missouri explored, and whatever river heading with it that runs into the western ocean. Congress, in some secret proceedings, have yielded to a proposition I made them for permitting me to have it done." (The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington ed., vol. 4, p. 470.)

On February 28, 1803, Jefferson wrote to Casper Wistar asking him to treat his letter confidentially:

"I have at length succeeded in procuring an essay to be made of exploring the Missouri and whatever river heading with it that runs into the western ocean. Congress by secret authority enables me to do it." (Ford edition VIII, p. 192.)

To Meriwether Lewis, April 27, 1803:

"The idea that you are going to explore the Mississippi has been generally given out. It satisfies public curiosity, and masks sufficiently the real destination." (Ford edition VIII, p. 193.)

To Benjamin Rush, February 28, 1803:

"I wish to mention to you in confidence that I have obtained authority from Congress to undertake the long-desired object of exploring the Missouri and whatever river heading with it that leads into the western ocean." (Ford edition VIII, p. 219.)

Professor Cox points out that the expedition was planned and the appropriation granted before the Louisiana Territory was actually purchased. Hence the expedition was managed with considerable secrecy and deception. The act conveying the appropriation bore a misleading title and the expedition purported to be a scientific and literary one in order to allay any disquietude of British fur traders and Spanish officials. (I. J. Cox, The Early Exploration of Louisiana, pp. 16–18.)

Lewis showed some eagerness to present the results of his explorations to Congress, and when he had nothing to show for the appropriation granted in February, 1803, except the construction of his boat at Pittsburgh, he asked President Jefferson to permit him to make some little side expedition before the Eighth Congress opened in special session on October 17, 1803. To this departure from the main object of the expedition Jefferson did not consent. (I. J. Cox, p. 20.)

On August 11, 1803, Jefferson wrote to Isaac Briggs, a Government surveyor:

"Congress will probably authorize the exploration of the principal streams of the Mississippi and Missouri." (I. J. Cox, p. 39.)

Jefferson forwarded to Lewis a map of the Missouri, and added:

"The acquisition of the country through which you are to pass has inspired the country generally with a great deal of interest in your enterprise. The inquiries are perpetual as to your progress. The Federals alone still treat it as a philosophism, and would rejoice at its failure. Their bitterness increases with the diminution of their numbers and the dispair of a resurrection. I hope you will take care of yourself and be a living witness of their folly." (I. J. Cox, p. 22.)

By the middle of November, 1803, Jefferson spoke of the interest in the expedition as general. On November 16 he wrote to Lewis:

"I have proposed in conversation, and it seems generally assented to, that Congress appropriate ten to twelve thousand dollars for exploring the principal waters of the Mississippi and Missouri. (The Writings of Thomas Jefferson, memorial edition, vol. 10, p. 433; I. J. Cox, p. 22.)

Professor Cox remarks:

"The result of Jefferson's quiet personal work among the members of the Eighth Congress appeared in a report dated March 8, 1804, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures." (I. J. Cox, pp. 40–41.)

February 18, 1804, Mr. Moore, Representative from Virginia, offered a resolution instructing the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to employ persons to explore such parts of the province of Louisiana as he may think proper. * * * Passed, ayes 53. No debate. (Annals of Congress. 8th Cong, 1st sess., vol. 18, p. 1036.)

On March 8, 1804, the House heard the report of Mr. Samuel L. Mitchill, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures:

"By a series of memorable events the United States have lately acquired a large addition of soil and jurisdiction. * * * It is highly desirable that this extensive region should be visited, in some parts at least, by intelligent men. Important additions might thereby be made to the science of geography [and] * * * the Government would thence acquire correct information of the situation, extent, and worth of its own dominions. * * *

"There is no need of informing the House that already an expedition, authorized by Congress, has been actually undertaken and is going on, under the President's direction, up the Missouri. The two enterprising conductors of this adventure, Captains Lewis and Clark, have been directed to attempt a passage to the western shore of the South Sea. * * *

"The committee submit the following opinion:

"That it will be honorable and useful to make some public provision for further exploring the extent and ascertaining the boundaries of Louisiana; and

"That a sum not exceeding $——— be appropriated for enabling the President of the United States to cause surveys and observations to be made on the Red River and the Arkansas, or either of them, or elsewhere in Louisiana, as he shall think proper for these purposes."

The report was referred to the Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next. (Annals of Congress, 8th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 1124–1126.)

The House of Representatives was absorbed in the debate on the civil government of Louisiana and failed to pass the appropriation bill for the exploration of Louisiana in that session.

On March 13, 1804, Jefferson wrote to William Dunbar, a scientist, of Mississippi, that he expected Congress to authorize him to explore the greater waters on the western side of the Mississippi and Missouri to their sources, and that preparations would be made at Natchez and New Orleans under Dunbar's care, but that Congress was hurrying their business so for adjournment that he expected them to leave some details unfinished. (Washington edition, IV, pp. 540–541.)

On May 14, 1804, Lewis and Clark passed up the Missouri, crossed to the Pacific, and reached St. Louis September 23, 1806.

On February 19, 1806, President Jefferson communicated to Congress a report of the Lewis and Clark expedition with a letter from Captain Lewis. (Annals of Congress, 9th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 1036–1147.)

It was almost a year before the House of Representatives appointed a committee (January 2, 1807) to inquire what compensation ought to be made to Lewis and Clark and their companions for their services in exploring the western waters.

Mr. Dawson, of Virginia, said he was induced to invite the House to consider such compensation from the communication of the President which held out the idea that the sum which the House had appropriated in 1803 was but a part of what might be necessary. (Annals of Congress, 9th Cong., 2d sess., p. 246.)

On January 23, 1807, the committee reported a bill which was read twice and debated on February 16. The Annals of Congress give no report of this debate. The consideration of the bill was resumed on February 20.

Mr. Lyon, Representative from Kentucky, opposed the provision that land warrants granted to the explorers might be received at the land office at the rate of $2 an acre.

Representatives Tallmadge, of Connecticut; Joseph Clay, of Pennsylvania; Ely, Quincy, and Cook, of Massachusetts; and D. R. Williams, of South Carolina, supported the position taken by Mr. Lyon. It was contended that double pay was a liberal compensation and that this grant was extravagant beyond all precedent. It was equivalent to taxing more than $60,000 out of the Treasury, and might be perhaps three or four times that sum, as the guaranties might go over all the western country and locate their warrants on the best land, in 160-acre lots.

A motion to recommit the bill carried with 66 ayes "after considerable debate." The bill was read and passed on February 28, 1807.

The Senate received the bill the same day, reported it on March 2, and passed on it March 3. (Annals of Congress, 9th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 96, 98, 383, 501, 591, 658, 659.)

The act of March 3, 1807, authorized the Secretary of War to issue land warrants to Lewis and Clark for 1,600 acres each, and to each of their associates 320 acres. The land warrants might be located on any public lands of the United States west of the Mississippi or be receivable at the rate of $2 an acre in payment for public lands. The Secretary of War was authorized to double the pay of Lewis and Clark and their associates during the time they served on the expedition to the Pacific Ocean. The bill appropriated $11,000 for that purpose. (Annals of Congress, 9th Cong., 2d sess., p. 1278. [Rita Dielmann, March 26, 1928.])

A statement of the objections in Congress to an act entitled: "An act to create the office of surveyor-general of the public lands in Oregon, and to provide for the survey, and to make donations to settlers of the said public lands." September 27, 1850. (9 U. S. Stat. 496.)

The debate shows that there were two principal objections to the bill:

1. As to persons—

Objection to the discrimination against American settlers already in Oregon in favor of new settlers;

Discrimination against Americans in favor of emigrants;

Objection to granting land to half-breed Indians on more favorable terms than to white American citizens.

2. As to lands—

Favoritism to Oregon over other States and Territories of the United States, giving the bill the nature of special legislation.

Too rapid exhaustion of the public lands.

Objection to the use of public lands for military reservations.

1. As to persons—

Mr. Hubbard, Representative from Alabama, objected to "giving away lands in large tracts without any price to Indian half-breeds when Congress had refused to sell public lands to the worthiest citizens unless they paid more than double its value." (Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st sess., p. 1093, May 28, 1850.)

Senator Dawson, of Georgia, raised objection to the provision of the bill permitting emigrants to take land in Oregon on declaration of intention to become citizens. "* * * the information will go all over the continent of Europe. Foreigners will throw themselves into your country, and as soon as they land make a declaration of intention to become citizens. Before the three years expire the whole of your immense lands will be gone. They will turn loose their whole population, and especially their pauper population." [They have rendered no service to the country, paid no taxes, sacrificed nothing, and scarcely a dollar will be returned to the Treasury. American citizens must pay for purchasing land for the benefit of foreigners. The States of the Union pay a great proportion of the expenses and receive none of the benefits of the public lands.] (Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st sess., p. 1845, September 17, 1850.)

Senator Underwood also opposed granting lands "to quasi citizens, who may emigrate from the Old World and settle in this and make their declaration to become citizens.

"Now, I am not willing to give that bounty to those who hereafter may come to the country. I am willing to let those who are now in the country have the benefit [of a grant] because of the difficulties they have had in getting there and in settling themselves in a wild country; but to hold out a bounty in behalf of those who may come to the country from Europe in preference to our own citizens, giving them equal advantages, and thus opening the doors of the poorhouses of all Europe to flood us with their paupers, is a proposition that I can not agree to. It offers too strong an inducement for foreign corporations to provide the means of emigration for these people who are to receive a bounty when they come here." (Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st sess., p. 1846, September 17, 1850.)

2. As to lands—

Mr. Cobb, Representative from Alabama, in opposing the bill argued that the public lands were being disposed of too rapidly. They would be exhausted. He opposed a grant larger than 160 acres. (Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st sess., p. 1094, May 28, 1850.)

Senator Yulee, of Florida, opposed the bill on the grounds of special privilege to Oregon:

"This bill proposes a gratuity of half a section of land to every person who will go to live in Oregon. This introduces an entirely new policy. It offers a stimulus to the settlement of a particular Territory which was not allowed to any other Territory of this Union, and has not been allowed to any State of this Republic at any time. Heretofore the highest benefit that we have allowed to any settler has been to give him a preemption—a first right to purchase at the Government price of a dollar and a quarter the land upon which he settles in the new State or Territory, and even that was limited to a quarter section. This bill proposes to give half a section to every one who will go to Oregon to settle there. Now, if this section is to remain in the bill, I shall certainly expect, as a matter of fairness and in order that other Territories and States where there are public lands may be placed upon the same footing as Oregon, that the same inducement to settle in these States and Territories shall be held out. Otherwise, nothing can be more unfair than that all the migration should be directed to Oregon, and that the other States and Territories should be left without any such stimulus to their population.

"* * * As a matter of policy, it seems to me that this provision is a very unfair one. I submit to the Senate whether there is any reason—whether it is a wise policy to stimulate migration to the other side of the Rocky Mountains? It is to be apprehended that the migration has been much beyond what the natural inducements of the country would justify, thus far, and I learn that a very large number of the emigrants are anxious now to return, and will return during the fall, if they can possibly obtain the means to return to this side of the Rocky Mountains. * * *

"We know that the emigration overland already this year is stated to be near 50,000, and that 10,000 of those persons are said to be settlers of Oregon. There are attractions enough, either imaginary or real, to draw to that country all the surplus population that can be spared from the Atlantic States.

"I ask whether it is a wise policy to hold out inducements to the people of the Atlantic States to transfer themselves to the Pacific in greater numbers than the natural attractions of the country there would induce? We have the Territory of Minnesota and other new Territories nearer to the Atlantic States and which would keep our population more compact, but for the settlement of which no inducements are held out by legislation. And when we consider the fact that the migration to the Pacific Territories far surpasses, without other than natural inducements, the migration which has ever taken place to any other Territory of the United States and is altogether unsurpassed and unprecedented, I can conceive of no propriety or wisdom in a policy which would induce us to stimulate still further that transfer of our population to the Pacific by offering inducements which have never been offered heretofore for the settlement of any new Territory."

[The bill does not provide for similar grants in California and Nevada, and no such provision has been made concerning the public lands of any other Territory.] "I object to this special legislation * * * ; if it is desirable to stimulate the settlement of public lands in the new Territories, let it be done by a general bill, which will open them for settlement everywhere." (Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st sess., pp. 1841–1842, September 17, 1850.)

Senator Bell opposed the bill because Oregon already offers "greater inducements to settlers than any other portion of our unsettled domain. The riches to be found in the immense forests accessible to navigation and exportation from the ports of Oregon, and the immense demand for lumber now existing in California and which must continue to exist there while perhaps this Government stands; this alone will form a most attractive inducement to any enterprising and honest man who may desire to better his fortunes. That is not all. They have perhaps a population of one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand in California, not the one-hundredth part of whom subsist by the cultivation of the soil but who depend on the adjacent countries for their continual subsistence. * * * The flour, I understand, which now supplies California is drawn from the coast of Chile, and if I am not misinformed in regard to Oregon it is most productive in wheat. * * * Thus there is no portion of the country that is at this moment better situated or offering higher inducements to emigrants than the Territory of Oregon. * * * Let us not adopt this general policy of stimulating settlements by the giving away of our richest and most valuable lands." (Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st sess., p. 1842, September 17, 1850.)

Senator Walker from Wisconsin:

"* * * it seems to me that the arguments [in favor of the bill] refer merely to the present moment, and the selfish interests of those who exist at the present day * * * I say to those gentlemen that the time will come when people will go to Oregon without this bounty, and when they get there, mark my words, they will not thank Senators for having given these lands in whole sections to the individuals who have gone there before them. Then, sir, those who go there seeking for a home will look back on this legislation with disapprobation and regret. Sir, if you desire to legislate for the permanent interests of Oregon and for the permanent interests of the whole country, do not adopt the policy of granting this land in large amounts to individuals; but on the contrary, let the grants be as small as the ultimate interests of the country will demand; so that, when the population becomes heavy and dense, the lands of the country shall be as equally distributed as the then present and the now future interests of the country may require." (Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st sess., p. 1843. September 17, 1850.)

Senator Atchison:

"I think the giving of donations of land now, for the purpose of inducing further settlements in that Territory, will fail to secure the object. It is a well-known fact that a common laborer in the Territory of Oregon gets at this time higher wages than anywhere else, except it be in California. A field hand gets $4 a day, and the commonest mechanic gets $8 a day, and everything in that Territory bears a proportion to that. Then there is no necessity to hold out any inducement to new settlers, in the shape of land, in order to lead them to Oregon." (Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st sess., p. 1847. September 17, 1850.)

Senator Douglas from Illinois opposed exempting lands to be set aside as military reservations from the provisions of the act. He wished to make the act apply only to lands not occupied, cultivated, and improved prior to the passage of the act. He stated that the Secretary of War had authorized the Delegate from Oregon to assure the people that their farms and improvements would never be taken for military purposes. He argued that military reservations were often too large and prevented the settlement of the country. In closing he said, "I dread to run the risk of giving to a military officer the right to oust these settlers."

Mr. Downs followed similar argument. (Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st sess., pp. 1739–1742, September 3, 1850.)

OBJECTION TO THE HOMESTEAD ACT AS REVEALED IN THE DEBATES IN CONGRESS

(NOTE.—A homestead bill was introduced in the House of Representatives on March 27, 1846, by Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee. The subject was before Congress repeatedly from that time to the final passage of the bill in 1862. The Thirty-sixth Congress passed an act which was vetoed by President Buchanan on June 22, 1860. The homestead bill became a law on May 20, 1862.)

The objections to the bill are:

I. CONGRESS HAS NO CONSTITUTIONAL POWER TO DISTRIBUTE PUBLIC LANDS

They are the property of the people of the United States in their capacity as a corporation * * * Congress exercises delegated power, and has no right to dispose of any part of the public domain or public property except according to the powers delegated. (Senator Dawson, of Georgia, Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st sess., January 30, 1850, p. 265.)

I wish to ask the friends of this bill, who are calling it a people's bill, whether they do really design to give these lands to the people, or whether they design to take away that which belongs to the whole and confine their beneficence exclusively to a part, to the express exclusion of the rest? (Mr. Averett, from Virginia, Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 2d sess., January 23, 1851, and May 10, 1852, pp. 313 and and 1312.)

Mr. Fuller, Representative from Maine, objected to the bill as illegal, unjust, and partial in its provisions, and if he were before a tribunal differently constituted he would move to dismiss the bill. He denied the right of partition. He denied that this Government held the public domain by such tenure as was susceptible of such partition. He asked by what right a certain specified class of persons, aliens, foreigners, or American citizens of limited age, of particular condition in domestic and pecuniary affairs, should here come and ask this Government gratuitously to assign them any portion of the public domain, the common property of the people of the United States, to the exclusion of a much greater portion, having equal rights and equal privileges?

If there was any subject of legislation on which the American people were more tenacious than another, it was against any principle of legislation which made an invidious distinction in the bestowment of governmental favors, pensions, and patronage.

He was opposed to the schemes now pending before Congress, by which to rid the General Government in the shortest possible time of the public domain. (Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., March 30, 1852, p. 926.)

Mr. Averett of Virginia:

I rise as one of the Representatives of the rural districts of these United States, claiming an equality of right in the public domain, as the property of all; to enter my solemn protest against any measure, no matter under what pretense it comes before us, that tends to give to any class in this community, rich or poor, an exclusive right in that public domain. (Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., April 18, 1852, pp. 1018, 1020.)

The clause of the Constitution which conferred upon Congress the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, did not confer unlimited power in regard to the disposition of public domain. (Mr. Millson of Virginia, Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., April 29, 1852, p. 1208; Mr. Beale of Virginia, Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., May 6, 1852, p. 1277.)

Congress has no more right to give away public property for charity than to establish charitable institutions in any State. (Mr. Howard of Texas, Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., May 6 and 10, 1852, pp. 1279 and 1315; Mr. Clark of Iowa, Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., May 6, 1852, p. 1282.)

The clause which gives Congress power to dispose of and make needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States applied to the territory ceded to the United States by the old States. The United States held that territory under solemn compact that it should be appropriated to defray the expenses of this Government and for no other purpose whatsoever. (Mr. Averett, of Virginia, Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., May 10, 1852, p. 1312; Mr. Millson, of Virginia, Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., April 28, 1852, Appendix, 524; Mr. Dent, of Georgia, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., February 21, 1854, p. 459; Mr. Smith, of Virginia, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., February 21, 1854, p. 461.)

The bill is directly at war with the constitutional principles I have been accustomed to hold sacred. I had supposed that the regulation of the social relations of the citizen were left by the Federal Constitution to the States and that of commerce and foreign affairs to the General Government. I had supposed that, for the protection of the family hearth, the regulation of the household duties, and the descent and transfer of property we were to look to the States and not to the Federal Government. * * * The effect of the bill will be to bring the General Government to bear directly upon the people of the States, making itself deeply and sensibly felt in all the relations of life, while the State law, in its peculiar province, will be inoperative. Against such annihilation of State influence I earnestly protest. (Mr. Perkins, of Louisiana, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., March 6, 1854, p. 544.)

When the public lands were ceded by those States which had claims to them, they were supposed to be a great national estate, to be administered justly, prudently, and wisely by the Federal Government, with a view to the benefit of all the States of the Union; and in this view it was necessary that we should establish some system under which they should be sold. (Senator Pearce, of Maryland, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., July 17, 1854, p. 1771.)

Public lands ceded by the States to the Government are held by compact between the States and the Government. These public lands can not be given away. (Senator Toombs, of Georgia, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., July 19, 1854, p. 1816.)

The States ceded their lands as property that should be used as a fund for the common benefit of all the States in proportion to the charges upon these States. (Senator Mason, of Virginia, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., July 19, 1854, p. 1817.)

This Government has no right to tax the people and buy land, and divide that land, and give it away to the worthless. The Government has the right to acquire property, and when that territory has been acquired it has the right to devise the means of disposing of it under the Constitution of the United States. * * * disposing of the public land for the public benefit requires it to be sold at such rates as we believe to be promotive of the public interests; but as a homestead, as a gift, is contrary to the power of the Government * * * if you pass this bill which ties up the public lands for five years, and which authorizes the principle which will enable you to tie them up forever, State rights are destroyed. (Senator Green, of Missouri, Congressional Globe, 36th Cong., 1st sess., May 9, 1860, p. 1994–1995.)

II. THE BILL MAKES AN UNFAIR DISTINCTION BETWEEN CLASSES OF CITIZENS

I do not regard those persons who have no property—nothing to keep them at home—as the most meritorious class of the community. I have a great many constituents, honest, industrious men, who will not find it practicable to leave their homes and emigrate to the West. Yet these men pay taxes and contribute to the support of the Government. (Senator Clingman, of North Carolina, Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., May 6, 1852, p. 1281; Mr. Clark, of Iowa, Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., May 6, 1852, p. 1282.)

It is not just to give land free to persons who have risked nothing for winning the lands, when the soldiers who served in the war are selling their land warrants at $20 to $23 each. (Mr. McNair, of Pennsylvania, Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., May 10, 1852, p. 1313; Mr. Smith, of Virginia, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., February 21, 1854, p. 461; Mr. Colquitt, of Georgia, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., March 2, 1854, p. 523.)

I am opposed to the principle of this bill which, disguise it as you may, is at last but taxing one portion of the people for the benefit of another; taking money out of the pockets of a portion of the people and placing it in the pockets of others by legislation. (Senator Adams, of Mississippi, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., April 19, 1854, p. 944; Senator Clingman, of North Carolina, Congressional Globe, 35th Cong., 1st sess., May 22, 1858, pp. 2304, 2306.)

I say, decidedly, that the whole system of giving away the public land in my day has been unjust in every respect. There has been no justice; there has been no equality; there has been no good sense; there has been no fairness in the system.

The truth is that a man who can not sustain himself is a drone; he is not worthy of protection. Measures like this, that give your lands away, will destroy enterprise in that class to whom you give them. It will make them drones in the common hive. (Senator Hayne, of South Carolina, Congressional Globe, 35th Cong., 1st sess., May 22, 1858, p. 2304; Mr. Reid, Congressional Globe, 35th Cong., 1st sess., May 22, 1858, p. 2306; Senator Crittenden, of Kentucky, Congressional Globe, 35th Cong., 1st sess., May 22, 1858, p. 2307.)

Mechanics do not want to abandon their business and turn landowners. (Senator Clingman, of North Carolina, Congressional Globe, 36th Cong., 1st sess., p. 1294, March 22, 1860.)

I am not willing to pass a bill here which excludes every slaveholder from moving into a Territory; because no man who owns a negro is going to move on 160 acres. We have no pauper population in the South. Those who do not own slaves own land, or are respectable, industrious mechanics, attached to their homes and the institutions of their particular section. They are not going to move off. The only effect of the bill is to fill that country with paupers. We are under no obligation to provide for your paupers. We are under no obligation to provide for the pauperism of Europe. (Senator Wigfall of Texas, Congressional Globe, 36th Cong., 1st sess., April 4, 1860, p. 1539.)

The necessary effect of the law would be to transplant, by the allurements of land gratuities at the public expense, people from the nonslaveholding States to preoccupy these lands in the Territory to the exclusion of those from the slaveholding States; and I believe that if the policy should be adopted it would be followed up on the part of the people of the free States by bringing to the aid of the law emigrant-aid societies to force out that sort of population. (Senator Mason, of Virginia, Congressional Globe, 36th Cong., 1st sess., April 11, 1860, p. 1656.)

The bill is unfair to those who settled without such inducements and cleared the wilderness and bore the hardships of pioneer life. It gives those who come after an advantage over those who went before. The pioneers are ignored and those who settle now, who can come by means of railroads, are given free grants.

It is unfair to the soldiers who fought against Mexico. (Senator Rice, of Minnesota, Congressional Globe, 36th Cong., 1st sess., May 10, 1860, p. 2032.)

III. THE GRANT OF LAND TO SETTLERS GIVES THE IMMIGRANT FROM EUROPE A PREFERENCE OVER AMERICAN CITIZENS

"* * * when the foreigner goes to any State where those public lands lie and takes his land he is to have it free from all charge, whereas the native American has to pay." (Senator Douglas, of Illinois, Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st sess., January 30, 1850, p. 264.)

You offer an insult to every soldier who holds a land warrant given him as a reward for serving his country when, by this bill, you give 160 acres of land to the foreign pauper for nothing but simply because he has none. (Mr. Averett, of Virginia, Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., April 1, 1852, p. 1018.)

I think we have already sufficient inducements for emigration to this country, as they are now flocking here from various parts of Europe; and if you shall hold out this further inducement, we shall be overflooded with a population from Europe. (Mr. Moore, of Pennsylvania, Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., May 10, 1852, p. 1318; Mr. Dent, of Georgia, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., February 21, 1854, p. 459.)

This bill will not benefit the poor classes; it will not benefit the old States; it will benefit the new States but little. It will benefit Europe most and the population which will come thence upon us. They are the men who will settle upon these lands. (Mr. Dowell, of Alabama, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., March 2, 1854, p. 527; Senator Clayton, of Delaware, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., July 10, 1854, pp. 1663–1664.)

Senator Adams, of Mississippi, objected to taxing the native born and adopted citizens of this country for the benefit of foreigners. He opposed granting land to those who had no participation in the acquisition of the territory, who had paid no taxes, who had not defended the country, and had no interest in the Government. (Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., April 19 and July 12, 1854, pp. 944, 1702.)

The deserters from your battle fields and the men who fought against those who won your territories might come and take possession of your lands, to the exclusion of those who were more worthy. (Senator Butler, of South Carolina, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., July 12, 1854, p. 1703.)

This Government, after having for more than 40 years sold to her own children, native American citizens, the public lands at a fixed price, now proposes to give lands free of charge to all, including foreigners. Americans purchased lands, endured the hardships, and made improvements which enhance the value of adjacent lands. Now, this bill proposes to invite foreigners to come and settle free of charge upon those lands. You propose by this policy to introduce foreigners and allow them to enjoy for a period of five years all the privileges of society and protection of citizenship, without contributing one cent toward the support of the Government in the way of taxation while the lands of the native American citizens lying within the State are being taxed. (Senator Clay, of Alabama, Congressional Globe, July 12, 1854, 33d Cong., 1st sess., p. 1704.)

The bill will only increase native Americanism. * * * If we are to convert this Government into a charity asylum, let us lavish its bounty upon citizens rather than foreigners. (Senator Clay, of Alabama, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., July 12, 1854, pp. 1705–1706.)

IV. THE BILL OFFERS THE WRONG KIND OF INDUCEMENTS TO EUROPEAN SETTLERS

The granting of public lands is a premium to the patriots of Europe; it is a great national charity for Europeans who have neither sacrificed their lives for its protection, nor paid taxes for its purchase; it is an inducement for those who resist oppression in Europe to cease their struggle and settle down in America. (Senator Dawson, of Georgia, Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st sess., January 30, 1850, pp. 264–265.)

It is well known that in Europe a man having 160 acres of land is regarded as a large proprietor; and if the news goes forth to Europe, and to Asia, and to all parts of the world that in this country we give 160 acres of the public domain to American citizens, to naturalized foreigners, and to those who may come here and be naturalized, they will instantly bridge the Atlantic and Pacific, and in 10 years your public domain will be swallowed up by those who, I fear, may some day change our laws, our institutions and even, perhaps, our religion. (Mr. Etheridge, of Tennessee, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., March 3, 1854, p. 534.)

While I would not interpose any obstacles to the wilderness being settled up, I do not sympathize with the policy that seeks to settle it up too quickly by inviting emigration. I look with despair upon the day when the vast wilderness will be settled up, for depend upon it that with that day comes the end of the Republic, and anarchy and chaos. (Mr. Boyce, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., March 3, 1854, p. 536.)

This bill offers a bonus to those men in Europe who are unwilling to remain there under the hazards of the approaching war to emigrate to this country. It tells those men who, because they do not wish to stand by their king and country, if you will flee to the United States we will set you up with a nice little farm of 160 acres. (Senator Thompson, of Kentucky, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., April 19, 1854, p. 946.)

VI. THE HOMESTEAD LAW WOULD CAUSE TOO RAPID EXPANSION

The effect of the bill would be to depopulate the old States. If the old States do not lose their population, then, of course, our people can get no benefit from the bill at all. If no man would leave the old States for the purpose of availing himself of the opportunity of locating the quarter section of land which the bill allows him, then the benefit of its provisions is confined exclusively to the new States. But, if our citizens do leave us to avail themselves of these privileges, then we are sufferers, both in the loss of our people and in the loss of the land, which is the common property of all States. (Mr. Millson, of Virginia, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., March 2, 1854, p. 526; Mr. Simmons, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., March 2, 1854, p. 521.)

By this bill you propose to give 160 acres of land, provided it is occupied and cultivated. It is not possible for a poor man to cultivate 160 acres of land. Instead of peopling the West, over which is rolling the great tide of civilization, you are providing against its settlement. You dot it over with individuals, one to every 160 acres. The really poor man will stand upon his land for five years without the means to cultivate it. (Mr. Perkins, of Louisiana, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., March 6, 1854, p. 544; Mr. Crittenden, Congressional Globe, 35th Cong., 1st sess., May 22, 1858, p. 2308.)

Instead of this land empire being a gradual outlet and receptacle for our increasing population, under a law of gradual progress which human legislation can not control, migration would be unnaturally stimulated, by holding out incentives for a rush and scattering of population over an immense surface, followed by a recoil, and all its disastrous consequences. An immigration, forced on under such circumstances, will disarrange the progress of the public surveys which heretofore has always been accommodated to the existing actual necessities of settlers, and will likewise, for the same reason, enormously increase governmental expenses for the protection of far-off pioneers. (Senator Johnson, of Arkansas, Congressional Globe, 36th Cong., 1st sess., May 10, 1860, p. 2036.)

VII. TO GIVE AWAY PUBLIC LANDS IS A WILD SCHEME OF SOCIALISM

Next year the manufacturers, the mechanics, and artisans will come to us and say, "You have given away the public lands in which we were jointly interested; we do not understand farming; as you have given away our property, now make us equal by giving us money with which to buy bread, fuel, and raiment." (Mr. Howard, of Texas, Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., May 6, 1852, p. 1279.)

Disguise it as you will, it is the commencement of a division of the property and the making of all equal. (Senator Adams, of Mississippi, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., July 12, 1854, p. 1702; Senator Mason, of Virginia, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., July 19, 1854, pp. 1814, 1817.)

This is an agrarian system which would enable a central power to tax the whole people—the industrious, the energetic, the active, those who work and those who save—to give to the low, the worthless spendthrifts who never made a dollar, who will never save a dollar, but scatter all you give them. (Senator Green, of Missouri, Congressional Globe, 36th Cong., 1st sess., May 9, 1860, p. 1992.)

VIII. THE PUBLIC LANDS CAN NOT BE GIVEN AWAY, BECAUSE THEY ARE PLEDGED AS SECURITY FOR THE PUBLIC DEBT

Senator Badger. (Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st sess., January 30, 1850, p. 264.)

Mr. Beale, of Virginia. (Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., May 6, 1852, p. 1277.)

Senator Thompson, of Kentucky. (Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., April 19, 1854, p. 946.)

Mr. Morrell, of Vermont. (Congressional Globe, 37th Cong., 2d sess., December 18, 1861, p. 136.)

After the war began the question of credit was an urgent one. Senator Crittenden urged holding the public lands as the best means of maintaining the credit of the United States. (Congressional Globe, 37th Cong., 2d sess., p. 138.)

I do not think it wise, when we rely upon loans for the means to defray the expenses of the Government, that we should dispose of any of the available property of the Government out of which means could be had to enable us to repay those loans. To the extent that the Treasury would be replenished by the receipts arising from the sales of the public lands, the taxes upon the people will have to be increased if we give away the lands and dispose of them without adequate consideration. (Senator Carlisle, of Virginia, Congressional Globe, 37th Cong., 2d sess., May 2, 1862, p. 1916.)

IX. THE PRICE OF LAND WILL BE DIMINISHED

Mr. Averett, of Virginia. (Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., May 10, 1852, p. 1320.)

The Government holds double the quantity of land held by all her citizens; when she makes the public domain free as air to foreigners, as well as citizens, private lands must be depressed in value. It will injure the landholders not merely by depressing the price of their land but by cheapening all its products. You will lower the profits of agriculture and injure the agricultural class, which you affect to benefit. (Senator Clay, of Alabama, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., July 12, 1854, p. 1705.)

X. THE POLICY OF GIVING AWAY PUBLIC LANDS IS A SECTIONAL ONE TENDING TO DISUNION

I look upon this bill as the most agrarian measure that has been offered since I have been in Congress. It bears upon its face, to my mind, indications, I will not say of the approaching dissolution of this Government, but it looks as if the American representatives of States had come at last to consider that this great and glorious partnership of ours, which has stood so long and which has been the admiration of the world, is hereafter to be a partnership without effects and assets; how long it shall endure when there is no longer a single link of common interest to bind the States, I know not. (Senator Clayton, of Delaware, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., July 10, 1854, p. 1665.)

A person who is a citizen of an old State may acquire land free of charge only by becoming a citizen of a new State. This is, therefore, one enactment in favor not of the people of the United States but for the citizens exclusively of the States within which the lands lie. Although the people from every section of the country may go to obtain the benefits of these provisions, it is not as the citizens of their States that they are entitled to get the lands, but when they take them they must cease to be citizens of their State and must become citizens of the State in which the land lies. (Senator Pratt, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., July 20, 1854, Appendix, p. 1104.)

The nonslaveholders of the South, ninety-nine times out of a hundred, are landholders. This bill is not intended to provide for them. * * * The effect of the bill is to free-soil the territory of the country. * * * It may be coming to that complexion; I know not; but I shall not, by any vote of mine, hasten the catastrophe. (Senator Wigfall, of Texas, Congressional Globe, 36th Cong., 1st sess., April 4, 1860, p. 1536; Senator Green, Congressional Globe, 36th Cong., 1st sess., April 5, 1860, p. 1556; Senator Crittenden, of Kentucky, Congressional Globe, 36th Cong., 1st sess., April 19, 1860, p. 1798.)

XI. THE HOMESTEADERS WOULD BECOME TENANTS OF THE GOVERNMENT FOR FIVE YEARS

I am opposed to tenure by bounty. It is a new tenure. I may designate it a tenure by bounty upon the public lands within one of the sovereign States. Anyone who settles upon the public lands, under such a tenure, has not a responsibility to the State in which he lives, equal to the responsibility of other citizens. You make him a Federal tenant. (Senator Butler, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., July 19, 1854, p. 1812.)

XII. THE RESULT OF THE HOMESTEAD ACT WILL BE TO THROW THE PUBLIC DOMAIN INTO THE HANDS OF A FEW MONOPOLISTS, AND TO PLACE IT BEYOND THE REACH OF THE HONEST CULTIVATOR

Whenever property is given away the possessor esteems it at little value and is willing to transfer it for a very moderate compensation. (Mr. Howard, of Texas, Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., May 6, 1852, p. 1279; Senator Walker, Congressional Globe, 33d Cong., 1st sess., July 14, 1854, p. 1747.)

XIII. WHEN THE SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS DOES NOT YIELD REVENUE FOR THE EXPENSES OF GOVERNMENT, THE QUESTION OF RAISING THE TARIFF WILL COME UP

Senator Dawson, of Georgia. (31st Cong., 1st sess., Congressional Globe, January 30, 1850, p. 265.)

In this bill Congress sets up as a friend of the poor and at the same time lays a duty and tax upon everything that men, women, or children eat, drink, and enjoy, at the rate of 30 cents in the dollar and charge 7½ cents for collecting that tax. (Mr. Averett, of Virginia, Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., April 8, 1852, p. 1020; Mr. Beale, of Virginia, Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 1st sess., May 6, 1852, p. 1277; Mr. Clingman, Congressional Globe, 35th Cong., 1st sess., May 22, 1858, p. 2304; Senator Wigfall, of Texas, Congressional Globe, 36th Cong., 1st sess., April 4, 1860, p. 1538.)

In addition to the data assembled by Miss Dielmann I desire to insert in the RECORD extracts concerning the homestead law from History of the People of the United States, by McMaster:

HISTORY OF THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES—M'MASTER

(Vol. VIII, p. 108)

In the House Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, became the champion of the landless, introduced a homestead bill, and strove manfully in its behalf, till in the spring of 1852, when Congressmen were soon to be nominated, 70 Members of the House, fearing the consequences of opposition, absented themselves, and the bill passed. Then went up from some of the old States a cry of opposition. It would draw population from them, leave them to pay the debt incurred in acquiring the public domain, depreciate the value of their lands, for who would buy a farm in North Carolina when he could get one for nothing in Alabama or Missouri, and would tempt the scum of society of the Old World to come and squat on our public domain and scatter seeds of political pestilence on the frontier—and in a little while the agrarian laws of Rome would be reenacted in America. This wholesale robbery of the old States for the benefit of the new should be denounced by every honest man the land over. Will not the good sense of the Senate strangle this political monstrosity?

Besides the injury done to the old States by depriving them of their property in the public lands and draining off their population, the agrarian character of the bill is most objectionable. It is the most flagrant act of depredation on the public domain yet attempted by demagogues. Property and usefulness are the fruits of industry and self-dependence, not of Government bounties and land plundering. There is no way of demoralizing any class more certainly than by means of gratuities. Undoubtedly many citizens would rather have a farm given them than buy it. But they are greatly mistaken if they think they are the people of the United States. The people approve not of such agrarian and Utopian schemes. Congress has no power to dispose of the public land save for national purposes. If it may donate land to the landless, it may give money to the poverty-stricken and take the value of 160 acres out of the Treasury and bestow it on each individual of the favored class. Instead of giving land to the homeless, the bill will unsettle the homes of many honest persons who have bought their farms with hard earnings by bringing them into competition with other farms received as an alms by men too indolent and improvident to acquire them as others have.

Also extracts from the message of President Buchanan, June 22, 1860, vetoing the homestead law. President Lincoln took a different position and signed the homestead law in 1862.

[Extracts from the veto message of President Buchanan, June 22, 1860]

I return, with my objections, to the Senate, in which it originated, the bill entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain, and for other purposes," presented to me on the 20th instant.

* * * * * * *

IV. This bill will prove unequal and unjust in its operation, because, from its nature, it is confined to one class of our people. It is a boon expressly conferred upon the cultivators of the soil. While it is cheerfully admitted that these are the most numerous and useful class of our fellow citizens and eminently deserve all the advantages which our laws have already extended to them, yet there should be no new legislation which would operate to the injury or embarrassment of the large body of respectable artisans and laborers. The mechanic who emigrates to the West and pursues his calling must labor long before he can purchase a quarter section of land, while the tiller of the soil who accompanies him obtains a farm at once by the bounty of the Government. The numerous body of mechanics in our large cities can not, even by emigrating to the West, take advantage of the provisions of this bill without entering upon a new occupation for which their habits of life have rendered them unfit.

* * * * * * *

That land of promise presents in itself sufficient allurements to our young and enterprising citizens, without any adventitious aid. The offer of free farms would probably have a powerful effect in encouraging emigration, especially from States like Illinois, Tennessee, and Kentucky, to the west of the Mississippi, and could not fail to reduce the price of property within their limits. An individual in States thus situated would not pay its fair value for land when, by crossing the Mississippi, he could go upon the public lands and obtain a farm almost without money and without price.

* * * * * * *

The people of the United States have advanced with steady but rapid strides to their present condition of power and prosperity. They have been guided in their progress by the fixed principle of protecting the equal rights of all, whether they be rich or poor. No agrarian sentiment has ever prevailed among them. The honest poor man, by frugality and industry, can, in any part of our country, acquire a competence for himself and his family, and in doing this he feels that he eats the bread of independence. He desires no charity, either from the Government or from his neighbors. This bill, which proposes to give him land at an almost nominal price, out of the property of the Government, will go far to demoralize the people and repress this noble spirit of independence. It may introduce among us those pernicious social theories which have proved so disastrous in other countries.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JACOBSTEIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I do not think we get anywhere by rehashing the legislative history of 1921 and calling each other names. Nothing is gained by impugning the motives of each other. As I was not a Member of the House in 1921, I can not be charged with having had any selfish motive in any particular position I may have taken on the census bill, or the reapportionment bill, since that time.

Moreover, in view of the fact that my own State—New York—stands a good chance of losing one Member in a reapportionment based on a membership of 435, it surely can not be said that I have any private motive in favoring the passage of this bill.

Furthermore, the passage of this bill is likely to affect the party to which I belong disadvantageously; and from this standpoint, too, it can frankly be said that my interest is purely nonpartisan. I am for this bill, because it provides a solution to a difficult situation which may confront us in 1930. For without it we are liable to get a repetition or recurrence in an aggravated form of the very situation which has been described in the debate here this afternoon.

I am willing to subscribe to everything that has been said by the gentleman from Michigan, by the gentleman from California, by the gentleman from Mississippi, and the gentleman from Missouri, so far as the deadlock is concerned.

Now, what is the deadlock? Why, gentlemen, many of the gentlemen who voted to recommit the bill in 1921 wanted reapportionment. Is not that so? Michigan, California, and other States wanted reapportionment, because they realized they were entitled to more membership in the House. But what was the situation? Because they opposed increasing the size of the House, because they wanted to confine the House to 435 Members, they were put in a position where they voted against reapportionment.

Is there anything that is going to happen between now and 1930 to change that dilemma? On the contrary, the situation will become more aggravated, because while in 1921 it would have taken only 483 Members to have satisfied every State in the Union, in 1930 it is going to take 535 Members.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. If the gentleman from Mississippi will pardon me, I am going to take about 15 minutes in explaining my views on the bill. Then I shall be glad to yield for questions which will help elucidate the bill, and I will be glad to yield first to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. I was just going to say that the gentleman has said those who voted to recommit the bill in 1921 were in favor of reapportionment.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I think many of them were.

Mr. RANKIN. He should also state that those who voted against recommitting the bill were in favor of reapportionment.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. That is true in part, too. I will simply say this: There are gentlemen here who want reapportionment but do not want a larger House. Let us agree on that first. I have talked to the membership of this House. I am a member of the committee and I know the feeling of my colleagues. There are many Members of the House who want reapportionment but do not want an increase in the size of the House.

Then there are Members of the House who do not want any reapportionment unless the membership of the House is increased to a point where it will prevent their States from losing a singe Member. That number is 535, approximately. Then there is a small group that want no reapportionment, because their States would lose their proportionate ratio of the House voting strength no matter how large the House may be. It is a question of simple mathematics. Even if you raise the size of the House to 535, the States whose population has not increased proportionately will lose out in the reapportionment. Their votes in this Chamber would be less proportionately, because the population in their States is either stagnant or declining.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But their salaries would be the same.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Yes. My friend from New York says their salaries would be the same. Therefore you have a deadlock. You have a deadlock because you have a block of votes here which will vote against a bill for reapportionment that provided for more than 435, but not enough to protect every State in the Union. Now, it is not likely you are going to get a bill for 535, and, therefore, you will have the States of Missouri, Mississippi, and a lot of other States that are going to lose joining hands with those who do not want more than 435, and, therefore, you are likely to get no legislation in 1930.

The rest of us are not interested in taking votes away from Mississippi and in taking votes away from Missouri, nor are we interested in giving votes to Michigan, Florida, or California. I for one am interested merely in upholding the Constitution. I want representative government. That is all. I do not care who wins or who loses.

There is bad sportsmanship here. Why are we afraid to take chances on what is going to happen in 1930? The man who is a good sport will say, "All right; whatever the population under the census of 1930 proves to be I will take my chances on that, and if my State loses, all right, and if my State gains, all right." In passing let me repeat that my State can not gain, and according to the estimates thus far made it is likely to lose one if not two seats in the House.

Of course, it is clearly apparent that the States whose population has increased faster than the average for the country will gain and those whose population has relatively declined will lose proportionately. This is true no matter what the size of the House may be. It we raise the House to 535, no State will lose its present quota but others will increase their quota. So that their relative voting strength depends on the percentage gain or loss in population in 1930 over the 1910 basis. The following table shows the population in 1910 and the probable (estimated) population in 1930, with the percentage of gain or loss. This will give us a background and a picture of what to expect by way of reapportionment in 1930:

[2] Population Jan. 1, 1920; no estimate made.
[2] Population State census 1925, no estimate made.

The population of the United States has increased from 91,000,000 in 1910 to approximately 125,000,000 in 1930. Imagine a country increasing by 30,000,000 and not having a reapportionment, which is the situation we may have in 1930. We have skipped once and may do so again. Now, any man who has good statesmanship in him and who is not interested merely in politics, or who is not interested in preserving a few votes for his State, will take a statesmanship view of this question and say, "We do not want this deadlock to occur; we want reapportionment, and we believe in representative government." How can we accomplish this? By taking the vote now, to-day or to-morrow, when there is no direct or immediate selfish interest involved. If you wait until 1930 your own particular seat may be at stake. I am not charging any man here with that kind of selfishness or saying that he is going to vote that way, but if you wait until 1930 you will have a very vexatious problem, and gentlemen whose States are going to lose are going to find it difficult to vote for reapportionment.

Now, 17 States may lose in 1930, according to the population estimates made by the Bureau of the Census. Seven States, representing over 200 Congressmen and representing 34 Senators, and you can readily understand what little chance you will have of getting a bill through this House that does not satisfy everybody, and everybody means a House of 535 Members. I doubt if any Member seriously contemplates that size of a House. That would be so unwieldy as to defeat the purpose of representative government.

The following table represents the States which would lose one or more Members with the House on the basis of preliminary estimates of population for 1930 and assuming the House to retain its present 435 membership:

Mr. KETCHAM. Before the gentleman leaves that point, will he state how many States are involved in the situation as it is under the census of 1920 and how many more States will be involved under the census of 1930?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Why, of course, the disease is an aggravated disease. I wish I could use your medical terminology, Doctor Sirovich, but you have here a germ disease which becomes more and more malignant. In 1920 only 11 States would have lost seats in the House with a membership of 435. In 1930 17 will lose seats.

Mr. SIROVICH. The gentleman stated it was a monstrosity.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. It is a malignant disease like a cancer, and it is going to grow and eat into the body politic and is going to become more dangerous and more serious as time goes on. Our duty is to check it now by enacting this legislation.

Let us not do as England did 100 years ago, drift along until they had no representative government and almost had a revolution in 1832 as a result of the rotten borough system. Let us avoid that. How? By to-day or to-morrow when the vote is taken simply pass a bill which does what?

The proposition has been misrepresented here, sometimes intentionally and sometimes unintentionally, but the bill is very simple and I think very fair, very just in its operation. What does it do? It provides, first of all, we are going to take a census at a time favorable to the agricultural population. In the Census Committee I argued all the time that the rural sections should get a square deal in the taking of the census. May 1 is the most favorable time for an agricultural census of population. That is the date provided for in the census bill reported favorably by the committee.

So, after the census of 1930 is taken, we say to the Bureau of Census, "According to the formula we prescribe for you, tell us what the population is in the various States of the Union, and then having found the population of the various States of the Union, tell us how many Representatives Alabama and Wyoming and all the other States of the Union are entitled to."

The Director of the Census has no discretion in the matter. Any clerk operating in that department under the direction of the Director of the Census has a very specific and a very definite formula to work with. Every authority that appeared before our committee agreed that this method prescribed is accurate.

This method admits of no discretion on the part of the Director of the Census, be he Republican or Democrat. He takes the formula and says that according to the census of 1930 Alabama is entitled to so many, New Jersey to so many, New York to so many, Wisconsin to so many, and he submits this report to the Congress on the first day of the session in December, 1930, and then Congress must act.

If the second session of the Seventy-first Congress does not act, and fails to do its duty by March 4 of the following year, then the figures or the statements submitted to us, the Congress of the United States, are submitted to the secretaries of the various States of the Union by the Clerk of the House and these figures become the reapportionment figures until Congress chooses to act.

Congress neither surrenders nor abrogates any of its powers. Congress is free at all times to act. It can order a reapportionment any time it sees fit to do so. There is just this difference: So long as a future Congress fails to take affirmative action, then under the provisions of this bill the reapportionment herein provided is to remain in force and effect. That is, on the basis of the 1930 census, until 1940, and then on the 1940 basis, and so forth. The method of major fractions is prescribed, and this I will explain in detail in a few minutes.

There is nothing very mysterious about this. Is there anything unfair about it? We, the Congress, are telling the Census Bureau how to operate. We give it a very accurate, a very specific formula. It is not as mysterious as the gentleman from Mississippi tried to make it out to be. I think I can explain it to you in five minutes, and I am going to take the five minutes in order to do it, because I find so many Members are unable to explain it to those who really want to know, not because it is obscure but because it has not been explained in simple language. Every authority that knows anything about mathematics at all agree that the formula here laid down for the Director of the Census is a formula so accurate and so definite and so specific that there is no discretion left to the executive departments. There is not in this bill the discretion that is given to the Tariff Commission, which has to decide what the costs of production are here and abroad, nor the discretion that is given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has to very delicately adjust freight rates, nor the power given to the Treasury Department, which issues regulations involving the levying of internal taxes and import duties too. There is no discretion in this bill. The Director of the Census absolutely goes through certain motions prescribed by Congress.

We say to the Director of the Census, "After you have taken the census of the population of 125,000,000, or whatever it may be, tell us how many are in Pennsylvania, how many in New York, how many in New Jersey, and then with that population, using the method of major fractions, allocate the representation to the States, and submit the statement to Congress in December, 1930."

Now, what is this method of major fractions? I am going to take a minute to explain it.

Every Member of this House is holding a seat here according to a mathematical method which was used in the Census Bureau. It was not specifically written in the bill, but was used in tabulations presented to the Census Committee. The gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Missouri were right. The reapportionment bill of 1910 and 1920 did not specifically say that we were going to use the method of major fractions, because after a bill comes out on the floor here it merely tells how many Members each State would have. But obviously there must be some method in allocating the Representatives to the several States on the basis of the population of those States and of the country as a whole.

How do they get that Membership? New York received 43 in 1910 because, according to the method of major fractions, that is what she was entitled to. How do you get 36 in Pennsylvania, Mr. CASEY? Because under major fractions that is what Pennsylvania is entitled to. It makes no difference whether the Director is a Democrat or a Republican. You can not make it any less nor any more. It is simple, accurate, and air-tight.

How do we work it? I will now illustrate what we mean by this method of major fractions prescribed in the bill. First, take the population of each State—I will take the population of New York, my own State, for instance, a population of 11,000,000, and you divide that by 1½, 2½, 3½, 4½, 5½, 6½, up the scale and so on. You do the same for Pennsylvania and for Mississippi, and for every other State. That is, you get a series of quotients by dividing the population of each State by 1½, 2½, 3½, 4½, 5½, and so forth. Now you arrange these quotients in order of size, as shown here in this table [pointing to it].

The following table illustrates the manner in which the method of major fractions operated in the 1910 reapportionment:

Quotients arranged in order of size	Size of House	State receiving the last assigned Representative	Cumulative number of Representatives for each State
6,072,623	49	New York	2
5,110,074	50	Pennsylvania	2
3,759,061	51	Illinois	2
3,643,574	52	New York	3
3,178,081	53	Ohio	2
3,066,044	54	Pennsylvania	3
2,602,553	55	New York	4
2,597,695	56	Texas	2
2,255,436	57	Illinois	3
2,244,277	58	Massachusetts	2
2,195,556	59	Missouri	2
		Intervening figures omitted for sake of convenience.
217,011	425	Virginia	10
216,766	426	Nebraska	6
216,070	427	Indiana	13
215,918	428	Pennsylvania	36
215,626	429	Idaho	2
215,034	430	Florida	4
214,321	431	New York	43
212,777	432	Illinois	27
212,473	433	Missouri	16
212,106	434	Maine	4
211,883	435	Iowa	11

You put the highest one at the top and the lowest at the bottom. There is no partiality, no discretion in arranging these quotients. They are put down in order of size—from highest to lowest, regardless of the State. There is no politics in mathematics.

Mr. BEEDY. Where do you stop?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. That depends on the number of Representatives you want in the House. It makes no difference. It can not affect the results.

Now, according to the Constitution every State in the Union is entitled to one Congressman. That takes care of 48, one for each of the 48 States. Forty-eight are assigned, according to the Constitution, and who is to get the forty-ninth? Suppose the House only wanted 49 Members. Who would get the forty-ninth Member. Why, New York, because it has the largest quotient, the largest number of people in the United States living in any one State and not represented in the House except by the original assignment of one. When you divide by 1½, 2½, 3½, and so forth, it gets the largest quotient, and so New York is entitled to the forty-ninth Member. Suppose the House wanted 50 Members. Who gets the fiftieth Member? Why, the next largest quotient happens to be Pennsylvania, so Pennsylvania would get the fiftieth Member, and would have two Members. One under the Constitution and one according to population.

If you had a bill saying they wanted 51 Members of the House, who would get the fifty-first Member? Well, that is simple. Consult this table. Go down, and you find the next largest quotient happens to be Illinois, and so you go down the list. Where do you stop? If you want a House of 435 then when you reach 435 you will stop. In 1910 we stopped at 435. In the Fenn bill now before us we are proposing this method of tabulation on the 1930 census and for a House of 435.

I have explained now how the method of major fractions operates. There can be no dispute about it. The results must be the same, assuming a House of a given number, and the population census of 1930 as a base. Now, how many people does a Congressman represent.

A MEMBER. Three hundred and twenty thousand.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. That is not in the law. No law ever stated so. If you stop at 435 then each Congressman would have a representation of midway between the quotient for 435 and 436. That is called the divisor—in 1910 it was 211,877 per congressional district—and no change has occurred since then in law, because there has been no reapportionment since 1910.

Now, take that number and divide it up into the States of the Union. Take the divisor and divide it into the population of your own State and you get the number of Representatives your State is entitled to have. That is, take the population of your State in 1910. Divide it by the divisor 211,877 and you get the seats or districts your State is entitled to have. But suppose in the division process you have a fraction, say, one-fourth, one-half, three-fourths. What will you do with it? Well, according to the method of major fractions, your State would be assigned an additional seat if the fraction was one-half or greater than one-half—that is, every major fraction receives a whole seat in the House. Try it out for your own State on the basis of the 1910 Census and see if it is not just as I have described it to you. Take the population of your State for 1910, divide it by 211,877, and I am sure you will find your State received credit for the fraction, if it equaled or exceeded one-half. If it was less than one-half it received no credit. The minor fraction was discarded. That was true for every State, as shown in the following table:

Mr. ACKERMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Why do you put some of the figures in that column in red and some in black?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. The red indicates the States that have less than a major fraction. Every State in red ink is a State that had less than one-half and, of course, received no credit for this minor fraction. Those in black show the major fraction, and you will observe each State having a major fraction (see table above) received an additional seat in Congress for that major fraction. Please notice that Rhode Island, which had in 1910 a quotient of 2.56, received 3 seats in Congress; Maine had 3.50 and got 4; Mississippi had 8.48 and got 8; New Mexico had 1.49 and got only 1.

This table only enables one to prove that the method of major fractions operates with exact uniformity and fairness to all States. In the reapportionment process it is not necessary to construct this table with fractions. It is necessary only to proceed as I outlined the steps in the beginning—by arranging the quotients in order of size and picking off the top ones first, and down the column until your quota of 435 is exhausted.

Rhode Island on the 1920 table has 2.49 and got only 2. It lost out because it failed to secure a major fraction. Its relative population declined.

Mr. CASEY. And if it had been 2.51 it would have gained a Representative?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Yes. The point is simply this: The reason why I bring these charts to you is not to show you that I know something about mathematics, because you could have worked this out as well as I, but the point of the chart is this: The gentleman sitting in the gallery, Dr. J. A. Hill, the Assistant Director of the Census, would merely have to follow this mathematical procedure, without variation or deviation. It does not make any difference what his politics happen to be. He can not change the results. I am a Democrat. If the Republicans are in power they could not change the results after the population census data has been collected. I do not think they would; but they can not alter the results once you adopt your policy. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] said that the Census Bureau is one of the finest bureaus in the Government, that the people who work there are very intelligent, and that all they need is a little more money to carry out their activities. Then it is a matter of sheer mathematics.

It has worked with accuracy before, and it will work with accuracy again. Whether you believe in the bill or not, please do not use this mathematical method as an alibi. I can understand why some gentlemen do not want 435, but do not try to discredit the bill upon the theory that this method of computation is not understandable. If there is any Member of this House who can not explain this system to his constituents, he does not deserve to be here.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Under the method of equal proportions, would the State of Maine get three instead of two?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. The gentleman from Mississippi has asked a question that I am going into in a minute. In his own remarks he called attention to the fact that there was another method known as the method of equal proportions, which method has never been tried. We never tried it in our history from 1790 down to the present time. Mathematically it is just as accurate as this. I would just as soon vote for it. I will say this: Will you vote for the bill, Mr. RANKIN, if it contains the method of equal proportions?

Mr. RANKIN. No; I am not going to vote for this bill.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I do not believe the gentleman is in favor of any reapportionment.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, yes; I am.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Unless we give you 535 Members, so that no State, including your own, would lose any.

Mr. RANKIN. No. I possibly would eliminate the gentleman from New York. I am in favor of reapportionment of Congress, and I think the gentleman's method on the floor of the House is unparliamentary and undignified.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I did not mean to be discourteous to the gentleman from Mississippi. It was furtherest from my mind. I think, however, the opposition to this bill should be a fair opposition. If you do not believe in reapportionment because you are going to hurt your State, say so, but do not say we ought not to have it, because the mathematics will not work or because you can not explain it, or because it is unfair. From 1790 to 1830, inclusive, we used the method of rejected fractions. All fractions were discarded. Then in 1840 we used the method of major fractions. From 1850 to 1900 we used the Vinton method. In 1910 we came back to the method of major fractions. In 1920 the bill reported to the House was founded upon major fractions.

There are other mathematical methods. You can say the method of equal proportions is equally good. That method happens to favor the rural, small States, and I would as soon vote for that. In fact, I am willing to vote for it in order to give the small rural States an advantage. I would just as soon vote for the bill in that way. We advocate major fractions because it is better known, tried out, and officially adopted in the last reapportionment of 1910.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. LUCE. Applying this situation to my own State, I see that under the system of major fractions, if the size of the House were increased from 435 to 460, that would mean an increase of 5.74 per cent, but that the difference in representation would be 13.33 per cent, or more than twice as much.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Just what is the point of the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. LUCE. If the size of the House were increased from 435 to 450 or 460 Members, that would be an increase of about 5.74 per cent, but it would result in an increase in representation from my State of 13.33 per cent, which is more than twice as much. I am wondering if the gentleman is quite certain that the system of major fractions is as accurate as the system of equal proportions.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Accurate in what way?

Mr. LUCE. I have just given the gentleman an illustration.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. What is the gentleman's test of accuracy? If we say to Mr. Stewart, the Director of the Census: Take the census of the population, and after you have the population here is a formula——

Mr. LUCE. Oh, I am not speaking about that. I am speaking about the mathematical accuracy of it.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Even those who advocate the method of equal proportions, whether they be from Harvard or Yale, have to admit that this method of major fractions is accurate. The only difference is that you use a different principle or different basis. I do not like to bore you with mathematics.

The method of equal proportions simply gives to each individual a representation in Congress based upon the percentage that he bears to the population of his own State, and on that basis, you, Mr. LUCE, in Massachusetts, count for more than I do in New York, because I am one of 11,000,000 and you are one of 3,500,000. Therefore you count for more in Massachusetts than I count for in New York, and if you take the percentage basis, which is that of equal proportion, then the smaller States get a larger representation. There is no question about that. All the mathematicians agree on this proposition. If you want to give the small States, the rural States, a little advantage over the larger States, if you want to be generous, then use the method of equal proportions. But the one is just as accurate as the other. Addition is just as accurate as division. Subtraction is just as accurate as multiplication. Both methods are definite, both accurate; but major fractions has the advantage of having been tried and proven workable. It is known to all who know anything about statistics. The method of equal proportion is satisfactory from a theoretical viewpoint. So far as I am concerned it is acceptable.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. In one second.

Mr. ROMJUE. It is on that point, if I understand you. Under the major-fraction formula do the larger States get less or more?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. The larger States gain more under major fractions than under equal proportions.

Mr. ROMJUE. And the smaller States get less. Do they not?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Of course. One is the reverse of the other.

Mr. ROMJUE. Take, for example, the State of New York under the major fractions.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. We would get 42. We now have 43. Under equal proportions we might get only 41.

Mr. ROMJUE. Now, I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. What is the point of the gentleman's question? I recommend the major fractions for only one reason in this bill. This bill provides only in the case of an emergency. In 1930, if Congress acts, as I hope it will act, courageously, it will consider equal proportions and major fractions, and if I am here, I will accept equal proportions. But now that you are delegating a ministerial function to the Department of Commerce (the Census Bureau) is it not wise to use that method that was used in 1840 and 1910 and recommended in 1920, the method of major fractions?

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. I wish the gentleman would explain the problem of equal proportions.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. It is worked in the same way, except that this list of quotients is arrived at by dividing the population of each State by the square root of 1×2, 2×3, 3×4, and so forth. The rest of the process is the same as I explained it for major fractions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. If I had the time, I would be very glad to explain.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. KETCHAM. A good deal of argument has been advanced to the committee relative to the question of the loss to the large State or the small State. Referring to the gentleman's table, I find that only few States would gain, and that only few States would lose, so that after all we do not need to get excited about it.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. You are quite right. In 1920 the only States that would have been affected by the method of equal proportions are shown in the following table:

States	Major fractions	Equal proportions
Vermont	1	2
New Mexico	1	2
Rhode Island	2	3
Virginia	10	9
North Carolina	11	10
New York	43	42

Otherwise both methods yield the same results for all the other States. It will be observed that the three larger States—New York, North Carolina, and Virginia—fared better under major fractions, and the three smaller States—Vermont, New Mexico, and Rhode Island—fared better under equal proportions. I have shown on this chart what you get under the different methods. There is very little difference.

This is emergency legislation. If you want to break a deadlock in 1930, you want to act now. In 1930 you will have conflicting emotions and politics injected into the situation, and you will then have an even worse situation than you had in 1920. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, if a Member can still say it without being laughed at, I want to say that this matter is fundamental with me. I also favor a House of 435 Members. I believe that there is a clear-cut, mandatory constitutional provision that requires this House to carry it into effect.

Believing that, and believing that the membership should remain at 435, I am going to vote for this apportionment regardless and let the chips fall where they will.

I hate to see any Member lose his seat. In order to be a good Democrat, I perhaps had better make that apply only to this side of the House. [Laughter.] I hate to see any State have the misfortune to lag behind in population. But, gentlemen of the committee, individuals and States in my opinion pale into insignificance as compared with the broader and higher constitutional mandate.

I frankly admit that this bill is a club. I do not like that feature of it. But it is necessary. If we do not act now, I can visualize the same argument, the same divergence of views, and the same inaction that will prevail after the 1930 census. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina yields back two minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THURSTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not desire now to take up the discussion of the different methods that were explained here by my colleague and good friend from New York [Mr. JACOBSTEIN], but I want to direct attention to another feature of the result that will follow from a reapportionment which will reduce or restrict the membership of the House.

Inasmuch as it has been contended that the House of Representatives is now composed of too many Members, and that business can not be handled in an expeditious manner, I desire to submit some information along this line, and thought perhaps the committee would be interested in ascertaining the number serving in the lower house of the principal nations of the world; so I have obtained a statement from the legislative reference division of the Library of Congress, which is attached and which sets forth the number of members in the lower house in Great Britain, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, and the United States; and while I desire to call your attention to the number of members in the lower house of each of the nations mentioned, I more particularly desire to have you examine the table, which shows that a Representative in our Congress, on the average, now represents 269,278 people, or from two to six times as many as a member represents in the lower house of any of the nations mentioned and, excepting Canada only, in area each Member in our House of Representatives represents from fifteen to twenty times the area represented by a member in the lower house of the nations above mentioned. As to wealth, a Member of the House of Representatives in the United States represents three-quarters of a billion dollars, whereas a member in the English Parliament represents property worth less than one-third of that amount. A member of the French Chamber of Deputies represents one-seventh of that amount, and the members of the lower house in other countries far less in proportion.

While some Members have contended that the membership of the House should be reduced, a careful examination of the table will show that all of the major nations of the world have a far greater number of legislators in proportion to their population, area, and national wealth, than we have in the United States, so if this subject is to be considered and determined in view of facts as gathered from experience of the other great nations, as distinguished from conclusions, the statements submitted by those in favor of a smaller membership have few, if any, real facts upon which their conclusions are to be based.

As the citizens of all of the nations mentioned, excepting the United States, are mostly of the same homogeneous origin with little or no ethnic differences, whereas our citizenship is composed of practically all of the different races of the world, thereby greatly multiplying our problems and manifestly requiring greater diversity in ideas and knowledge of government, so, on these grounds, it is apparent that the service required of a Member in the United States is much broader and calls for more consideration and legislative knowledge than would be required of a member in a like body in any of the nations mentioned.

And in passing, it might be noted that the membership of the House committees was increased during this session, thus more time being taken from one-half to two-thirds of the Members.

So it may be asserted that the field of legislation considered by the Congress of the United States covers a much larger field than that considered by any of the major legislative bodies of the world, and in view of the foregoing it would appear that the membership in the House of Representatives in our Congress might be increased with good results and for the general betterment of our people.

In average wealth represented, number of constituents, and in area in which distance must be considered, the table submitted, and which recites facts, clearly proves the case of those opposed to a proportional reduction in the membership in the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

In considering the number of Members in the House of Representatives thought should also be directed to the current practices and tendencies in the Senate to devote a major portion of the time of that body to international affairs, political matters of a nonlegislative character, and investigations covering a wide scope of activities, and it is not my purpose to criticize the activities of that branch of the Congress in relation to the subjects mentioned, but reference is made solely for the purpose of emphasizing the fact that our citizens are becoming more inclined to expand their contact with the Members of the lower branch because of the lack of time on the part of the Senate to attend to the same, and the Members of the House understand that the contact of the average citizen with his Member of the House has greatly multiplied in the last few years because of the increased activities of the Federal Government in fields not heretofore entered, and the older Members of the House state that the volume of their correspondence has increased manyfold within the last 10 or 15 years; and in some respects a Member of the House is the agent of his constituent in his contact with the Federal Government; so if a Member is to be allowed sufficient time to attend to legislative duties the number of Members in the House should not be reduced, as it is doubtful if the Members can properly serve a greater number of constituents than they now represent.

This bill proposes to retain the present membership at 435, which, of course, will increase the ratio of constituents and also reduce the membership from several States and correspondingly increase the membership of other States.

A table is herewith submitted showing the changes under the estimated population of 1930.

Twelve States would gain, 17 States would lose, and in 19 States no change would be made in the representation.

ANTICIPATORY FEATURES

It is understood that all prior legislation upon this subject was had after the census figures were available to the Congress, so the method or plan of apportionment used was of no material consequence, and this anticipatory measure is an innovation in apportionment history, and while not in words but in effect infers that the Members of the Seventy-third or subsequent Congress will fail to enact such reapportionment legislation as may be necessary.

While I do not desire to enter into a lengthy discussion of the constitutional phases of the matter, yet I do wish to direct the attention of the membership to the portion of the bill, section 1, line 4, which provides that—

The Secretary of Commerce shall transmit to the Congress a statement showing the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed, as ascertained under such census, and the number of Representatives to which each State would be entitled under an apportionment of 435 Representatives—

Made in the following manner: By apportioning 1 Representative to each State—as required by the Constitution—and by apportioning the remainder of the 435 Representatives among the several States, according to their respective numbers, as shown by such census, by the method known as "the method of major fractions," a phrase that has not been legally construed or defined, so that the bill without intervention of the Executive—and I am sure the Members appreciate the distinction—directs subordinate officials, the Secretary of Commerce and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, to exercise not only a discretionary function but also a constitutional function, as section 1 of Article I of the Constitution provides that—

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives—

And this bill proposes that one of the coordinate branches of the Government shall have the authority to usurp a specifically designated power vested in the Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. THURSTON. At this time there is in effect a statute of the United States, passed in 1912, which provides the manner in which the Members of the House of Representatives shall be apportioned, and this bill provides that, if the Seventy-third Congress fails to reapportion the membership, the powers herein proposed shall be exercised by the Secretary of Commerce and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and thereby repeal an act of the Congress. The idea is a novel one indeed.

I believe that the Supreme Court of the United States has directly held that, in effect, the President can not repeal an act of Congress, but this bill proposes to vest subordinate officials with such authority.

If the plan proposed is legal or sound, the legislative branch of the Government by such enactments may reach such a state of impotence that our acts will induce our citizens to believe that the continuance of the legislative branch of our Government is unnecessary, and can be entirely dispensed with, as anticipatory legislation can be enacted that will vest all future authority in an executive official.

Another interesting feature of this bill is the one which, of course, provides that a bare majority in both Houses would be required to pass the bill, and if it receives Executive approval; no matter what situation might thereafter arise, without Executive approval it would take a two-thirds vote of each House to repeal a measure proposing a change, and thereby the legislative branch functioning under an ordinary majority would be surrendering its power unless it was able to obtain a two-thirds majority, so the difference between 51 per cent, the usual majority, and 66 per cent, the strength required to override a veto, or 15 per cent, the net difference which is now vested in the Congress, would inure to the executive branch; and this situation would not be unusual in the field of ordinary legislation, but the bill proposed is one that would affect the prerogatives and the very existence of the legislative branch.

The proposed surrender of legislative authority on this subject need not be made if the Congress will wait until the census figures are available before a reapportionment is ordered.

The Congress has been criticized for not making a reapportionment based upon the 1920 census, though it was understood that there had been a large movement of population to the industrial centers on account of war activities that had not returned to their permanent place of abode, and it is not generally known that the 1920 census was taken in the month of January, and as the census enumerators are paid for the per capita returns made, 4 cents for each person counted, it was generally conceded that a large number of persons were not enumerated in the country districts on account of inclement weather and bad road conditions prevailing at that time of the year, and it will be pleasant news for all concerned to learn that the bill reported out by the Census Committee for passage provides that the taking of the 1930 census is to commence on the 1st day of May, so that it will now be possible to obtain a fair and accurate enumeration of both the urban and rural populations of the United States.

If each Member here has not publicly expressed his opposition to the further encroachment of Executive power, doubtless he has done so in private conversation, and it will be interesting to note the position of the Members when a vote on this measure is reached.

The Members who favor a further increase of Executive power can heartily support this measure; however, if the Congress expects to retain and command the respect of the American people this and like measures will receive little consideration. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. CRAIL].

Mr. CRAIL. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues of the House, this debate has convinced me that human nature is very much the same in Congress as it is back home or out on the street. It is difficult to eliminate the human equation, the personal interest from our consideration of legislation and our vote thereon. It is very much easier for us to give favorable consideration and affirmative vote on matters which benefit or which do justice to our home State, our home district, or to ourselves personally. Coming over this morning my good friend and colleague told me he hoped this bill would not prevail, because it took away from his State and added to my State. That was his reason, frankly expressed, for his opposition to this legislation.

I have much sympathy for those who feel that this legislation adversely affects the States which they represent or adversely affects their personal fortunes. Fortunate it is that this legislation is anticipatory in character and that the Members who feel that their personal fortunes are adversely affected will have at least four years' time in which to readjust themselves to the new conditions which will have to be met by them. However, we can not let personal interest conflict with our solemn, sworn duty.

Our Government is established upon the principle of political equality of all citizens, and every man and woman in this country is supposed to have equal representation in the popular branch of our legislative department. The shibboleth to which our Revolutionary ancestors rallied was "no taxation without just representation," and so it was that the fathers of this Government wrote into the same article of our Constitution, into the same section, and into the same sentence a statement that direct taxes shall be borne and Representatives in Congress shall be apportioned among the several States according to the number of persons therein.

The fathers of our Government were so determined about this that they wrote the explicit mandate into the Constitution that the enumeration for reapportionment should be made every 10 years. To argue that there is not a direct, specific, mandatory provision in the Constitution for decennial reapportionment is but to quibble. That this is so is best evidenced by the fact that for 130 years, the first 130 years of the existence of our Government, the Congress did not hesitate and did not fail to reapportion promptly every 10 years.

Most of us can see the things close at hand better than we can see those things that are far away, and therefore I am going to refer to the condition which exists in my own district and in my own county as an illustration of why the fathers of our Government were wise in their mandate that the popular House of the legislative branch of our Government should be reapportioned every 10 years. By the 1910 census, which was the last census under which a reapportionment was had, the city in which I live, Los Angeles, Calif., had a population of 200,000 people. It has grown tremendously since that time, until it now has a population of 1,300,000 people, and it is estimated that in 1930, when this reapportionment will be made, it will have a population of 1,500,000 people.

There are two districts in Los Angeles County. The district which my colleague represents has a population within 200,000 as large as my district. I have the official figures as of May 1 of this year on the number of registered voters in Los Angeles County. In the ninth district, which is represented by my colleague, there were on May 1, this year, 338,227 registered voters. In the tenth district, which I have the honor to represent, there are approximately 50,000 more registered voters, or a total of 384,198 registered voters, a grand total in the county of Los Angeles, Calif., of 722,525 registered voters.

It is estimated that by the time of the general election this fall there will be 400,000 registered voters in the tenth district and 350,000 registered voters in the ninth district, or a total of 750,000 registered voters. Statisticians say that there are approximately four people for every registered voter. Multiply the registered vote in Los Angeles County by 4 and you have approximately 3,000,000 people. There are 38 States in this Union which do not have a population of 3,000,000 people. Under reapportionment there would be considerably less than 300,000 people in each congressional district. The two congressional districts which we have in Los Angeles County should not exceed 600,000 people. If reapportionment is not made, as required by the Constitution of this country, there will be literally 2,400,000 people in Los Angeles County who are not represented in the popular House of our Congress. There are 28 States in this Union which do not have a population of 2,400,000.

Take my district with its 1,500,000 people and its one Representative. If reapportionment is not had there will be 1,200,000 people in that district who are not represented in this House. There are 18 States in this country which do not have a population of 1,200,000. And when I say that these people are not represented, or will not be represented, I mean exactly what I say, because the Representative from that district of 1,500,000 people does not have any more votes in this House than does the Representative from the district of the average population of this country of less than 250,000. Moreover, Representatives are all on the same basis here according to their length of service, and a Representative of 1,500,000 people does not have any more clerk hire to take care of the wants and demands of his constituents than does the Representative from the average district. He does not have any more office space. He does not have any more CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS for distribution, nor any more Congressional Directories for distribution. He does not have any more appointments to the Naval Academy at Annapolis. He does not have any more appointments to the Military Academy at West Point. Benefits of Government are largely distributed according to congressional districts, and it is literally true that 1,200,000 people in my district will have no representation in this House of Congress unless we reapportion.

I like to cite the State of Iowa as an illustration. Nobody can take offense, because I was born and raised in Iowa, and Iowa is represented in Congress by as fine a group of men as any State in this Union. Under the last census Iowa had a total population of less than 2,500,000 people. It will probably not have so many in the census of 1930. Iowa has 11 Members of Congress and Los Angeles County, with several hundred thousands more people in it than the whole State of Iowa, has only 2 Members of Congress. The Iowa State Society of Southern California claims that there are 400,000 former Iowans living in southern California. I believe this is true, because literally there are hundreds of thousands of former Iowans who attend the Iowa picnics, which are held twice each year. The point is that those former Iowans, although they live in California and owe their allegiance to the State of California, are still represented in this House of Congress by men from Iowa, some of whom have never even seen the State of California and who know little of its needs or its aspirations.

If a just and fair reapportionment were made the tenth district of California, which I represent, would be cut into five congressional districts and the ninth district of California, which is also in Los Angeles County, would be cut into four congressional districts.

The Fenn bill which is before us is a splendid measure. It more nearly meets the composite view of the Members of this House on reapportionment than any other bill which could be devised. Of course, as long as we have individual thought and individual expression there will be differences in opinion as to detail. The Fenn bill is a good bill, it is practical, and it should be adopted.

Under the provisions of this bill the membership of the House will be retained as now, at 435. A larger membership would be intolerable. There are so many of us now that the work of the House is cumbersome, inefficient, and difficult. Special rules have been devised which bind and gag and largely make impotent efforts of individual Members, and this is necessary in order that so large a group of men may function at all.

The founders of our Government realized that the legislative branch of the Government could function better if it was composed of only a small group of Members. The original thirteen States had a total of 65 Representatives in Congress, or an average of 5 Representatives to each of the States. If there were an average of 5 Representatives to each State at the present time, this House would have a total membership of 240, which would be much more sensible and much more workable than the present membership of 435. The House could not do a wiser thing, a more patriotic thing than to reduce its membership to 240 Members, but I assume that that is out of the question. However, we should not take the easy, though foolish, course of increasing our membership so that no State will lose a Representative.

By 1830 the membership of the House had been increased to 242. That the Members of the House then thought that they had reached the limit of expansion and that the House could not adequately function if there was a larger membership is attested by the fact that in 1840 a reapportionment was made which reduced the membership from 242 to 232, and for the next 40 years reason prevailed, and although nine new States were added, there was no perceptible increase in the number of Representatives during all of that time. So that when the reapportionment was made in 1870, there was only one more Representative in Congress than there was in 1830.

Objection is made to this bill because it is anticipatory and therefore not necessary, but this is a very salutary provision, because if the rule is laid down before the census is taken, no Representative can know which State will be adversely or favorably affected by the method of apportionment which is adopted. In any event, only one or two or three States can be affected by the method of apportionment which is adopted. This bill provides for the method of major fractions. I have given it considerable study and I believe it to be the best and fairest method that can be adopted; but if the method had to be adopted after the census were taken, some Members would be complaining that the method of equal proportion would be better, or that the method of rejected fractions would be better, or that the method of minimum range would be better. It takes a high-powered mathematician to know the differences between these methods, and to tell the truth it would take a microscope to tell the difference in the results obtained by the different methods. The method is not of great importance. The important thing is that we adopt now some particular method.

The objection is raised that this bill delegates legislative powers to the executive branch of this Government. There is nothing in this contention. The Congress of 1850 did the same thing. I do not claim to be a greater student of our form of government than the rest of you. We all know that it is the duty of Congress to say what shall be done and how it shall be done, and that it is the province and the duty of the executive branch of this Government to execute or administer the mandate of Congress after Congress has decided what should be done and how it should be done; and that is what this bill provides. This bill provides that there shall be a reapportionment of Representatives among the States under the census of 1930 and directs that this reapportionment shall be made by the method of major fractions. It does not delegate any legislative powers to anybody. It simply directs the executive branch of the Government to administer or carry into effect the provisions of the bill. What shall be done and how it shall be done is declared by Congress, and the power is retained by Congress to change its mind; to change the method by which the apportionment shall be made; to change the number of the Representatives which shall be apportioned among the States. The power is retained in Congress to go ahead in 1930 and any other time and reapportion itself if it wishes so to do. The bill only provides that in the event that Congress does not itself reapportion in 1930 that an automatic reapportionment shall be made under the census which shall be taken by the Census Bureau under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and under a method which has been fixed by the Congress itself.

There is no merit to this claim that Congress is giving away its legislative powers.

I am not impugning motives when I say that the opposition to this bill is organized and carried on by Representatives of States which have an unfair number of Representatives in this House and whose State delegations will be reduced by constitutional reapportionment. Every Member who has spoken in opposition to the bill represents a State which would lose Members by reapportionment. I have before me the report of the minority on the Committee on the Census in opposition to this bill. I notice that the ranking member of those who express opposition to the bill is the able and adroit Member from the State of Mississippi, which State would lose two Representatives under reapportionment. It is next signed by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, which State would lose two Representatives under reapportionment. The next signer is a gentleman from Missouri, which State would lose three Representatives under reapportionment. It is signed by my friend from Kentucky, which State would lose two Members under reapportionment. It is signed by the member of the Census Committee from New York City. New York would lose one Member under reapportionment. It is signed by my good friend, the gentleman from Louisiana, which State would lose one Member by reapportionment.

The fact that these States lose Representatives under reapportionment does not mean that they are going to be unfairly treated. These States are going to have their just and fair apportionment. What it does mean is that the States which are not now fairly and justly treated as to representation in Congress shall be fairly and justly treated also.

This is not the first time that sovereign States have lost representation in Congress under reapportionment. In 1830, 4 States out of 25 lost by reapportionment. In 1840, 15 States out of 26 lost by reapportionment. In 1850, 8 States out of 31 lost by reapportionment. In 1860, 13 States out of 33 lost. During this period the State of Virginia lost 10 Representatives in Congress and the State of New York lost 9 Representatives in Congress.

During this period 15 States out of a total of 26 States lost Representatives by reapportionment. A full majority of the States lost. This bears witness to the high sense of duty and admirable patriotism of the statesmen of that period. Under this bill only 17 States out of a total of 48 lose Representatives. During the period which I have mentioned the States named lost 59 Representatives. Under this bill only 23 Representatives are lost.

As I have stated, one of the nicest things about this bill is that it gives the Members of the States which will lose representation at least four years in which to adjust themselves to the changed conditions.

If this bill fails of passage, I doubt very much that we will have reapportionment in 1930 or ever again. What then will become of representative government?

I have told you how my State would profit by reapportionment. I do not advocate the passage of this bill on such a selfish ground. Let us not consider this bill or pass it because it benefits some States or because it takes away from others, but let us consider it and let us pass it on the broader, higher grounds of right, justice, and fair play, and because it is in obedience to the solemn mandate of the Constitution of our country.

We hear a great deal lately about the lack of respect for our institutions and the violation of our laws. Our time-honored Constitution has been ignored, violated, mocked at, and nullified. It has become a national disgrace. This condition has not been improved by the fact that the Congress, which is composed of the lawmakers themselves, have for eight long years ignored, disobeyed, and violated those plain provisions of the Constitution which make it obligatory upon us to reapportion Representatives in Congress every 10 years.

My colleagues, we are the lawmakers of this land. The people expect much of us. We love our country. We revere its flag. Shall we not then respect its Constitution and ourselves set the good example by obeying its laws? [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask how the time stands?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has 23 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Connecticut has 23 minutes remaining.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I will say in the beginning that I am for reapportionment. I want to support the bill and I expect to vote for the bill, but I would like to say to my colleague that if Appendix C in Report 1137 is correct, there certainly is a gross discrimination in this bill. I have calculated it and according to this in Michigan, if they receive 17 Members, a Member will represent approximately 220,000 people. In Florida, if we receive five Members, a Member will represent approximately 299,800. In Maine, if they receive three they will represent approximately 266,000 persons.

Mr. HUDSON. How many does the gentleman represent now?

Mr. GREEN. We will have according to this statement 1,489,000 in the State of Florida in 1930, and we would have only five Members according to this tabulation. In order for Florida to have 17 Members of the House, she would have to have 6,097,000, while Michigan, with 4,744,000, is entitled to 17.

Now, gentlemen, something is wrong. I wanted the gentleman from New York, Doctor JACOBSTEIN, who is so good at figures, to explain this, but the gentleman did not yield. I would like some member of the committee to explain why it is that in my State we would have to represent 299,800, in Maine they have to represent 266,000, and in Michigan they can represent 220,000, and likewise in California.

Gentlemen, something is wrong. I am going to vote for the bill, but I appeal to you to make it right.

Mr. FENN. May I ask the gentleman from what he is reading?

Mr. GREEN. It is Appendix C of Report No. 1137. If this report is correct, it is a most unusual condition. I hope this is an error.

Mr. LEA. What is that taken from?

Mr. GREEN. Page 11, Appendix C. Michigan, with 4,754,000, will receive 17 Members, which is a basis of 220,000. In Florida, where we have approximately 1,500,000 people, we will receive 5 Members, just 1 more than we have now, and 1 Member will represent over 299,000.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. How many does the gentleman represent now?

Mr. GREEN. We have four Members and over 1,500,000 population.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. You would rather have it handled in this way?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I am sure those figures are not right.

Mr. GREEN. But I believe that the people of the States, whether they are in a Democratic or Republican State, whether they are in the North or in the South, are entitled to equal representation in this body.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The Constitution guarantees that.

Mr. GREEN. And we want and expect our rights. I hope this is an error.

Mr. LEA. It is manifestly a mistake of computation.

Mr. GREEN. I hope the gentleman is right about it; but I trust the Census Committee will investigate it, to the end that representation in this body will be absolutely in accordance with population. In Florida, it appears to me, we should receive at least six Members under a reapportionment.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CHINDBLOM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11725) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of May 16, 1928 (the Senate concurring), I return herewith the bill (H. R. 9568) entitled "An act to authorize the purchase at private sale of a tract of land in Louisiana, and for other purposes."

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 17, 1928.

PURCHASE OF TRACT OF LAND IN LOUISIANA

Mr. MARTIN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a concurrent resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 38

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the action of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and of the Vice President in signing the bill (H. R. 9568, 70th Cong., 1st sess.) to authorize the purchase at private sale of a tract of land in Louisiana, and for other purposes, be rescinded and that in the enrollment of such bill the number "58" be stricken out and the number "158" be inserted in lieu thereof.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

WAR DEPARTMENT RESERVE SUPPLIES OR EQUIPMENT

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

Herewith is returned, without approval H. R. 7752, a bill to limit the issue of reserve supplies or equipment held by the War Department.

This bill provides that no issues of reserve supplies or equipment shall be made where such issues would impair the reserves held by the War Department for two field armies or 1,000,000 men, except supplies or equipment becoming obsolete, deteriorated, or useless.

For several years the annual appropriation acts for the War Department have included a provision that under the authorizations therein contained no issues of reserve supplies or equipment shall be made where such issues would impair the reserves held by the War Department for two field armies or 1,000,000 men. The authorizations to which this provision directed itself were those embraced in the annual appropriation acts for the War Department covering the issuance of uniforms, equipment, or matériel to the National Guard, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the civilian military training camps from the surplus or reserve stocks of the War Department. Bill H. R. 7752 goes far beyond the scope of the provision which has appeared in the annual appropriation acts for the War Department. It virtually sets aside these reserve supplies and equipment and precludes their issue for any purpose where such issues would impair the reserves held by the War Department for two field armies. In cases of emergency happening within any of our States, involving the loss of life or property, the War Department has been the principal Federal agency to render assistance. The ability of the War Department to respond in these cases is necessarily measured by the availability of the supplies and equipment necessary to proper relief. If the War Department be precluded from using these reserve supplies and equipment in case of actual and imperative call, its effectiveness as an agency to relieve distress is diminished. It is my understanding that the War Department thinks this measure too restrictive.

I do not understand that it was the intention of the Congress to place any restriction on the use of these reserves in real emergencies where the aid of the Federal Government is necessary to relieve the suffering and distress of the people. Rather do the reports on this bill indicate that it was the intention of the Congress simply to enact into permanent legislation the provision which has appeared in the annual appropriation acts. If this proposed legislation carried out only this intention, I would have no objection to offer to it, but for the reasons stated I am returning the bill without my approval.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 17, 1928.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

The message was ordered to be printed, and the President's objections entered in the Journal.

HAVERT S. SEALEY AND PORTEUS R. BURKE

Mr. MARTIN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 3470, with Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 3470 and agree to the Senate amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title to the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3470) granting relief to Havert S. Sealey and Porteus R. Burke.

The Senate amendment was read and agreed to.

SUNDAY OBSERVANCE

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on my record as a Member of Congress and to have printed in connection therewith some remarks of others both complimentary and uncomplimentary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, no man can fight for a truly great principle here without making himself the target of those he opposes. The greater his efforts, the greater the opposition. In Congress, as in war, we must fight, surrender, or retreat. Why join the Army but to fight, and why come to Congress except to get into the thickest of the contest? Why fight in war or in Congress except for the right? The justice of one's cause does not protect him from the awful bombardment of the enemies of truth and right.

In fact, I am always strengthened in my faith in my efforts when there is an awful bombardment set up by the opposition. In all my efforts here I have gained the good will of some and created the enmity of others. I naturally feel I have merited and have the good will of the best people and that those who would destroy me would feel the same way about anyone battling for the right. My endeavors for farm relief have brought down on me the wrath of those who wish to exploit the farmers. My humble efforts for Sunday legislation made me the object of the hatred and the bitter abuse of those who hate everything which interferes with their exploitation of men, women, and children or their desire to destroy Sunday as a day of rest.

My efforts in behalf of the white women of the South and Nation gained me no friends from those who put the selfish desires of either white or black men ahead of the best interest of the whole people. The enemies I have made, though, in every contest are those who are the enemies of my people. I have only helped to bring them into the open. Thousands of newspaper items and letters have denounced me. Even more of the best people have praised me. The good things my people say in my behalf help me to bear the evil thrusts and enable me to gird myself for a mightier contest.

This world we are living in
Is mighty hard to beat—
You get a thorn with every rose,
But ain't the roses sweet?

Mr. Speaker, I wish to perpetuate in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD just a few of the truly wonderful things that have been said about me. I shall have printed a few of the uncomplimentary things that others have said of me. Many are unprintable and there are others I do not feel deserve a place in the RECORD. I prefer compliments rather than abuse, and shall, therefore, present to the public more roses than thorns. I appreciate as one of the very greatest compliments I ever received an article carried by the Atlanta Journal during March of last year, and penned by the beloved Bishop Warren A. Candler, of Georgia, in language as follows:

WISE WORDS IN SUPPORT OF A WISE MEASURE

By Bishop Warren A. Candler

Hon. WILLIAM C. LANKFORD, who represents the eleventh congressional district of Georgia in the Federal House of Representatives, introduced a wise measure when he offered his bill to prohibit in the District of Columbia Sunday theaters, Sunday baseball, and all forms of commercialized amusements on the Sabbath day.

While the bill failed of adoption by the Sixty-ninth Congress, it is to be hoped that it will be passed by the Seventieth Congress.

In a speech delivered in support of the measure, Mr. LANKFORD said many wise things which deserve the approval of all patriotic citizens. Among other points made by him in favor of the bill, he is reported to have said:

"I believe that our Nation can never be greater than our citizenship, our citizenship never greater than our homes, our homes never greater than the children reared therein, and our children, who are to preserve this Nation if it is to endure, can never be greater than is the faith of their fathers and mothers in God and in the teachings of His Word.

"I believe that the example of flagrant Sunday desecration in the Nation's Capital and the turning away from God, of which Sunday desecration is a part and parcel, are more insidious and more dangerous to our Nation and all the people thereof than the invasion of a foreign army or the bombardment of a hostile fleet.

"I believe the city of Washington should be the Nation's model of righteousness rather than its Sodom of ungodliness."

Of course, in certain quarters his bill will be denounced as a "blue law," and his utterance condemned as fanatical. That kind of cant is always applied by some to any and all efforts to preserve the Christian Sabbath and protect it against the attempts of greedy covetousness to overthrow it in order to get gain from the schemes of corrupt commercialization. But Mr. LANKFORD'S contentions are amply justified by the history of our country, and they are sustained by the wisest and purest statesmen of our own and other lands. He is in good company when he seeks to maintain one of the most indispensable pillars of social order and stable government.

Blackstone, the celebrated commentator on the common law, says:

"Profanation of the Lord's day, vulgarly (but improperly) called Sabbath breaking, is a ninth offense against God and religion, punished by the municipal law of England. For, besides the notorious indecency and scandal of permitting any secular business to be publicly transacted on that day in a country professing Christianity, and the corruption of morals which usually follows its profanation, the keeping one day in seven holy, as a time of relaxation and refreshment, as well as for public worship, is of admirable service to a State, considered merely as a civil institution. It humanizes by the help of conversation and society the manners of the lower classes, which would otherwise degenerate into a sordid ferocity and savage selfishness of spirit; it enables the industrious workman to pursue his occupation in the ensuing week with health and cheerfulness; it imprints on the minds of the people that sense of their duty to God, so necessary to make them good citizens, but which yet would be worn out and defaced by an unremitted continuance of labor without any stated times of recalling them to the worship of their Maker."

The renowned British statesman, Hon. William E. Gladstone, was not a fanatic, and in a speech before the House of Commons, opposing the opening of museums on Sunday, he said:

"From a long experience of a laborious life, I have become most deeply impressed with the belief—to say nothing of a higher feeling—that the alternations of rest and labor at the short intervals which are afforded by the merciful and blessed institution of Sunday are necessary for the retention of a man's mind and of a man's frame in a condition to discharge his duties, and it is desirable as much as possible to restrain the exercise of labor upon the Sabbath, and to secure to the people the enjoyment of the day of rest."

Concerning the same matter the Earl of Beaconsfield (Disraeli, who was a Jew) said:

"Of all divine institutions, the most divine is that which secures a day of rest for man. I hold it to be the most valuable blessing ever conceded to man. It is the corner stone of civilization, and its fracture might even affect the health of the people. The opening of museums on Sundays is a great change, and those who suppose for a moment that the proposal could be limited to the opening of museums will find they are mistaken."

That noble and saintly man, Dean Stanley, while the subject was engaging the attention of the British people, said:

"I believe there are very few in this country who would not feel that it was immense gain to the solidity, the seriousness, the elevation of the English character, that on at least one day in the week there should be an interruption in the perpetual course of amusements and entertainments which, however innocent, tends to dissipate and distract the mind, and from which it was a great advantage to every thinking man to be from time to time disengaged and delivered."

The famous John Bright said in a speech before the House of Commons:

"The stability and character of our country and the advancement of our race depend, I believe, very largely upon the mode in which the day of rest, which seems to have been specially adapted to the needs of mankind, shall be used and observed."

The most eminent of Amercian statesmen have held and expressed similar views with respect to the observance of the Sabbath.

Hon. Thomas F. Bayard, who represented for many years the State of Delaware in the Senate of the United States, who sat at the head of the Cabinet during Mr. Cleveland's first administration, and who served as the ambassador of our country to the British Government, was a man of the most sober and sane judgment. He said:

"I most sincerely approve of the civil institution of the Sabbath. I heartily desire to see its observance under statute law, and the stronger law of habitual and universal custom and popular acquiescence."

Justice Strong, of the Supreme Court of the United States, made the following declaration concerning our Sunday laws:

"There is abundant justification for our Sunday laws, regarding them as a mere civil institution, which they are, and he is no friend to the good order and welfare of society who would break them down or who himself sets an example of disobedience to them.

"They appeal to each citizen as a patriot, as an orderly member of the community, and as a well-wisher to his fellow men, to uphold them with all his influence and to show respect for them by his conduct and example."

That superb Virginian, the late Judge John Randolph Tucker, went on record in these strong words:

"Ah! my friends, break down the fence of Christianity, and liberty and law and civilization will perish with it. I wish to testify my belief, that the institutional custom of our fathers in remembering the Sabbath day to keep it holy, as the conservator of their Christian religion, is the foundation of our political system, and the only hope of American freedom, progress, and glory. Just in proportion as man is governed by his sense of right and duty, or by the religious principle in some form or other, he is capable of and fitted for duty. But, on the other hand, in proportion to his disregard of moral law, or the law of conscience, does the need of external power increase. Liberty must grow less, and power tend to despotism. When the constitution and laws of a country, therefore, protect religion they conserve that internal power over the man which saves liberty and makes despotism impossible."

Justice McLean, of the Supreme Court of the United States, made the following emphatic and unequivocal declaration:

"Where there is no Christian Sabbath, there is no Christian morality; and without this, free institutions can not long be sustained."

Mr. LANKFORD may well ignore the flippant talk of whippersnappers about "blue laws" when he considers the nature and lofty utterances of these eminent men.

We shall hear doubtless the stock misinterpretation of the words of Jesus by which men of lax views seek to justify infraction of the Sabbath laws. They will say, as they have said a thousand times and more, that "the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath."

True the Sabbath was made for man, and not by man. God made it in mercy to man. It is a divine and perpetual institution.

It was made for man, for universal mankind, and is therefore something more than a local or transient institution for some lands or some sections. It is designed for observance everywhere and always.

When, by any means, men are deprived of it they are robbed of an inestimable treasure and an immeasurable blessing.

The late Dr. David Swing, of Chicago, was a liberal of liberalists, but even he perceived and proclaimed these great truths. In language both beautiful and forcible he said:

"Be Sunday ever so valuable as a day of positive worship of God, it possesses the additional value of being a blessed season for man, not as a Christian or as a deist, but for man as a rational, and emotional, and toiling, and resting creature.

"A Sabbath for man is something so vast that in order to measure the idea it would be necessary to measure first the idea of man. Could we estimate the being for whom the day of rest was made, could we learn how much love and thought his home demands, could we find the value of his self-introspection, the value of his meditations, could we appraise man's imaginations, and fancy, and poetry; could we learn how deeply his soul needs an altar and a hymn, and understand the mystery of the death which awaits him, we might out of such rich premises learn the value of his seventh day—that day of intellectual and physical liberty."

Mr. LANKFORD merits praise for framing and introducing his bill, and his defense of it was most creditable and cogent.

It is a wise measure wisely advocated by the Congressman from the eleventh district of Georgia.

I am most appreciative of an item recently carried by the Atlanta Constitution and written by that prince of authors and beloved evangelist, the Rev. Sam W. Small, as follows:

A GEORGIA MEMBER WHO HAS NATIONALIZED HIMSELF

Barring Senator GEORGE in the rôle of a presidential possibility, the Georgia Member of Congress who has breezed into the national spotlight and got himself applauded and abused from land's end to land's end, is Hon. WILLIAM CHESTER LANKFORD, of the eleventh congressional district.

The reason of his prominence, accompanied by so great popularity and unpopularity, is that he is the author and persistent pusher of a bill to provide a decent, orderly, American-style Sunday rest day in the Capital City of the Nation.

Because of that the Seventh-day Adventists, aided and abetted by the National Anti-Blue Law Association, the Free Thinkers, and the Association for the Promotion of Atheism, have turned all their guns of opposition and denunciation upon the bald and bland and biblical "gentleman from Georgia."

The Adventists in particular have stirred up their 262,000 members in all parts of the land to circulate petitions praying the Congress not to pass the Lankford bill. The petitions are signed by almost anybody who is solicited, and, as probing has shown, represent scarcely any thought or convictions on the subject of whether a weekly rest day law is needed in the Federal district or not.

These perfunctory petitions come to Washington by almost every mail from the paid agents of the associations above named. They are presented in either House by the Member to whom sent and are stacked in the committee rooms like so much firewood and forgotten. The members of the committee know how the petitions are "framed" and put no value upon them.

The Lankford bill is fashioned upon the most conservative lines and its purpose is simply to prevent the degradation of Sunday from a protected rest and worship day into a continental fest day, commercialized for the personal profit of the purveyors of sports, shows, and recreations that are scarcely decent at any time.

The bill is not propounded as a religious, or sectarian, or blue law measure. It impinges no liberty of conscience, denies no freedom of religion, violates no principle of the Federal Constitution, and injures no man in the equal rights to which he is lawfully and naturally entitled.

Most of the States of the Union have now, and have had from their foundation, much more drastic Sunday observance laws than the Lankford bill proposes for the Capital City of a boastful "Christian nation."

But Judge LANKFORD has certainly had the vials of 57 varieties of wrath poured upon him from pulpits, polytheistic purlieus, and jazz parlors. The sincere Seventh-day Adventist people have been decently indignant and take no part in the foul abuse heaped upon the Congressman. It is the uncircumcized heathens of the ball parks, the race tracks, the sensational shows, and the omnium-gatherum and morally dangerous dance halls who are uttering vile anathemas upon the Georgia Congressman.

On the other hand, he is approved and encouraged by the clean and Christian men and women of the Nation who feel the humiliation of a sneering world looking upon "a wide-open Washington." They hope the good people of Georgia will hold Judge LANKFORD on the job until he succeeds in giving the Nation "a clean Capital City."

On two Sundays last year I made speeches at the Lutheran Reformed Church at Hagerstown, Md., and learned to love very much their minister, Dr. Conrad Cleaver, and his lovable people. I wish to quote a brief but most highly appreciated statement from my esteemed friend, Doctor Cleaver, as follows:

To the Hon. W. C. LANKFORD: Daniel in the lions' den was scarcely to be compared to you in fighting for a Lord's day to be kept in Washington, D. C. May Daniel's God preserve you and give you a like victory.

About two years ago, while going out West, I had the good fortune to have as a traveling companion, for about two days, Dr. Samuel Judson Porter, pastor of the First Baptist Church in Washington, D. C. He was going West to spend some time at a camp meeting at Marfia, Tex., where he tells me he has spent several delightful vacations. I was on a trip to spend some time with my wife and two children, who were in New Mexico on account of the illness of my little son, Cecil.

Doctor Porter and myself soon found that we lived in Washington, and, therefore, were able to pass the time discussing matters familiar to both. A strong friendship ripened between us, and it has been my pleasure to hear him preach on several occasions since. I am truly grateful to him for a recent letter as follows:

MY DEAR SIR: I am writing to thank you for the two addresses which you delivered in our church on behalf of Sunday observance in the District of Columbia. Also I want you to know that our church and congregation appreciate your efforts in this direction and offer you their heartiest encouragement.

On the occasion of your Sunday evening address before our people, a member of the President's Cabinet was present, and expressed himself most favorably in commending your speech.

With every good wish and with assurance of highest personal esteem, I am,

Yours sincerely,

SAMUEL JUDSON PORTER.

A letter received a short time ago from Dr. W. S. Abernethy, pastor of Calvary Baptist Church, of Washington, D. C., the church home of President Warren G. Harding, and which has a membership of 3,000, is very highly appreciated by me, and is as follows:

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I feel that you ought to know how one minister, at least, in Washington, regards your efforts to give the District of Columbia a Sunday observance law. When I remember that there are but two States in the Union that have no law of this kind on the statute books, and that here in the Nation's Capital there is nothing to interfere with the commercializing influences, which are rapidly degrading the Lord's day, I am profoundly thankful that we have in Congress a man like yourself who realizes the danger, and is putting forth such heroic efforts to change the situation.

May you have success in your undertaking. We do not want it to appear that a Sunday observance law is an effort to compel people to go to church. That is furthest from your thought. We do, however, believe that the Lord's day is worth preserving. I personally want to thank you for what you are doing.

Very sincerely,

W. S. ABERNETHY.

The laboring forces of America, through their very efficient headquarters here, keep in close touch with legislation and other matters pertaining to their interest. Labor, their official organ here, with its store of information, is in position to advise the working classes concerning the record of each and every Member of Congress. For these reasons I prize most highly an article from the "Question box" of that splendid paper, as follows:

(J. C. W., Waycross, Ga.)

Congressman WILLIAM C. LANKFORD has represented the eleventh district of Georgia in the House of Representatives for 10 years. He has an exceptionally fine labor record, having voted with the workers on every issue which has come before Congress in the last decade.

Mr. LANKFORD is the son of a section laborer, and he was reared on a farm. Labor is in a position to testify that he has never forgotten the interests of either the farmers or the industrial workers since he came to Washington.

He should be renominated in the coming primary. Congress needs more men of the LANKFORD type.

Hon. Charles I. Stengle, editor of the National Farm News, of Washington, D. C., is an ex-Member of Congress, and in closest touch with legislative procedure, as well as all matters of interest to the farmers of the Nation, and I wish to thank him for his kind letter of recent date, from which I quote, as follows:

I want to assure you of my sincere hope that your campaign for reelection may be very successful. You deserve well at the hands of your constituents and I trust they will fully appreciate the good work you have done.

The Fellowship Forum, published in Washington, a leading fraternal periodical of the Nation, recently carried in its question-and-answer column the following:

Explain the nature of the Lankford Sunday bill. Has it anything in it that favors Roman Catholicism? Is Mr. LANKFORD a Roman Catholic?

The Lankford bill is a bill to limit the activities of commercialized amusements, especially baseball and pool rooms, on Sunday and to reduce to a necessary minimum all business on that day. We do not consider that it is favorable or unfavorable to Roman Catholicism. Mr. LANKFORD is a Protestant and a member of the Masonic fraternity.

I shall not attempt to quote any considerable number of the many, many letters, newspaper items, and petitions which I have received commending my work as a Member of Congress. I am purposely not quoting any from my own district, although I have more complimentary items from my good people than from all the rest of the Nation. Many of these I prize most highly and shall always preserve as a sacred token of the good will of those I have endeavored to serve. It is my purpose now to merely indicate just how some of the people who do not live in my district show their appreciation of my efforts here.

Here is a letter written by a good lady of Philadelphia, who, by the way, is evidently of the Quaker belief:

Congressman LANKFORD.

HONORABLE FRIEND: I have read that you have introduced a bill in Congress for a "Sunday day of rest." Let us hope it will pass and be a law for the whole Nation.

To have a quiet Sunday would indeed be a gift from heaven. I would like to thank thee for thy wisdom and goodness. I am an old American woman of many generations, 63 years old.

We will never meet in this world, but some day in the "Golden Hands" we will meet, and I will tell God about thee and the good deed you did for the American people. I say with all my heart God bless Congressman LANKFORD and add all good gifts to his life, health, happiness, and honor. I thank you.

I had rather have a good letter like this from some good person than to have the praise of all the Sunday haters and all the atheists of all the earth.

Here is a letter which I appreciate very much and which was written me on February 2, 1926, by the chairman of the board of directors of the Marine Trust Co., of Atlantic City, N. J.:

Hon. WM. C. LANKFORD,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as far as the 22d of January. After I retire each night I try to keep up with the proceedings in the House and Senate, but as they are talking in two Houses and I am reading in one bed, I can not keep up with both.

In the last year there has been no speech made in Congress equal to that which you delivered on the 22d of January about the "right of States and usurpation of these rights by the modern method of reference to committees."

I am writing to ask if you can tell me what price we can get 2,000 copies of your speech, because at our board meeting this morning I spoke to the members of our board and they agreed with me that we will mail a copy of your speech to every one of our depositors, and we will pay you to get for us 2,000 copies. We want to stamp on each one "With compliments of the Marine Trust Co." Will you advise me how to bring this about?

I was born in 1860 and the furthest I can remember back in my life was at Twenty-second and Callowhill Streets, Philadelphia, where a man hit me for shouting "Three cheers for General McClellan!" who was running against Lincoln, so you see I came from a Democratic family, which in these days means nothing; but it surprises me that the best speech of Congress for the last year should come from Georgia, and I salute you with appreciation.

Very truly yours,

WM. RIDDLE.

I appreciate very much the following statement carried by the Christian Statesman, of Pittsburgh, Pa.:

CHAMPION OF THE SABBATH

In Congressman WILLIAM C. LANKFORD, of Georgia, the Sabbath has a real friend and an able champion. It was his high appreciation of this institution and the marked disregard of it at our National Capital that had led him to introduce the bill now before Congress to secure a Sunday law for the District of Columbia.

The following extracts from Mr. LANKFORD'S address before Congress show his ability in defending the bill, and also reveal conditions in Washington which led him to introduce it and which call for its passage.

"Very few people realize that in the Capital of the greatest Christian nation on earth there is no Sunday observance law. Washington, the Nation's Capital, should be the country's model of righteousness rather than its Sodom of ungodliness.

"It is contended that we are intolerant and opposed to religious freedom, if we favor a reasonable Sunday observance law for the Nation's Capital.

"It is a new idea that present-day movie shows and Sunday baseball are religious institutions and that anyone who suggests there should be a law to prevent the operation of these on Sunday is guilty of religious intolerance.

"Where is the religious intolerance that would prevent a crew of men operating a steam shovel or an electric hammer on a building site or partly constructed building next door to a church during services on Sunday?

"Most people do not understand that religious liberty means the infliction on the public of the profanity of the pool room, the vulgarity of the modern movie theater, and the obscenity of the ordinary dance hall on every Sunday of the year.

"The great trouble is there are some folks who mistake freedom of religion for freedom to destroy all things moral and religious."

It is of great advantage in this campaign to have such an able advocate and stanch defender of the Sabbath, looking after the interests of the bill in Congress, as Mr. LANKFORD.

I now wish to quote from the Lord's Day Leader, of New York, issue of May and June, 1926, a statement for which I am truly grateful:

HON. WILLIAM C. LANKFORD, WHO INTRODUCED THE SUNDAY REST BILL FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

It affords us more than passing pleasure to write this sketch, which can not do full justice to the one who is its subject, Hon. WILLIAM C. LANKFORD. This Member of Congress hails from the State of Georgia, which is the largest State in the Union east of Illinois.

Comparisons are sometimes invidious, but it is no more than fair to say no one who in recent years has introduced in Congress a Sunday rest bill for the District of Columbia has shown a deeper interest in the purpose of his bill, and certainly no one in either the upper or the lower House of Congress has given as much time toward securing hearings for the bill and more concentrated attention and untiring labor toward its passage. Mr. LANKFORD is a man of deep convictions, of unimpeachable character and sterling integrity, unafraid to do his duty and to stand by his principles. We are proud of him and we are giving this sketch to our readers in the hope that it will encourage them to get behind this movement for the early enactment of the Sunday rest bill for the District of Columbia. We might say that we have never known him to falter or fail in his efforts to secure every proper advantage for the progress of the bill through the House of Representatives.

INTERESTED IN OTHER PROPOSED LEGISLATION

In addition to the Sunday observance bill Mr. LANKFORD is giving special attention at this session of Congress to a bill to secure the construction of post-office buildings in towns with postal receipts of less than $10,000; his idea being that a town with half the postal receipts just mentioned should have a small building so arranged as to be added to from time to time as the receipts increase. It is pointed out by Mr. LANKFORD that real estate can be bought and standardized buildings constructed more cheaply in a small town than in a larger one, and it would be a real economy to erect such buildings, enlarging them from time to time.

Mr. LANKFORD is also the author of a bill, and working to secure its passage, for the construction of a statue in the District of Columbia consisting of a group of figures of Presidents Abraham Lincoln and U. S. Grant and Gens. Robert E. Lee and T. J. (Stonewall) Jackson as a memorial of the good feeling and love now existing between the North and South and various parts of the Nation.

Since he came to Congress Mr. LANKFORD has at all times given special attention to legislation in behalf of the producers of the Nation and at the present time is the author of two bills now pending to enable the producers, by extension of the parcel-post system, to sell their products directly to the consuming public. In addition to these matters, Mr. LANKFORD is vitally interested in and working to secure the enactment of legislation for the creation of a new Federal district in Georgia, the development of harbor facilities, the prevention of erosion of the coast lines in his district, and the construction of a canal from the Atlantic to the Gulf of Mexico across the southeastern part of Georgia and the Peninsula of Florida, together with various other matters of local interest in the State of Georgia.

The farm and labor interests of the country have approved Mr. LANKFORD'S record in Congress and recognize him as one of their best friends. He has never left Washington while Congress was in session and keeps in close touch with all the proceedings.

Last summer the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of the House, of which I am a member, spent some time in the West visiting various irrigation projects and studying conditions generally. We were royally entertained by the good people of that great section, and at least twice each day we were graciously invited to partake of the good food of that western country and were the recipients of the pleasures of most splendid public receptions. Of course, there were speeches on the program by the entertainment committees, the citizens present, and members of the congressional delegation. The newspapers made splendid mention of our trip from day to day. Among the many nice things said about the committee and myself, I am truly appreciative of the article carried by the Klamath News, of Klamath Falls, Oreg., under date of August 28, 1927, from which I quote as follows:

LANKFORD GREAT SPEAKER

Congressman LANKFORD, of Georgia, was the closing speaker and he is a wonderful talker. No Chautauqua lecture, very few sermons ever delivered in Oregon, surpassed this brilliant southerner's speech at last evening's banquet. He told his listeners of the great fervor and love the South holds for the West; how the Congressmen from down South stand firmly with the men from out West in many places of legislation. He stated that the location of Mason and Dixon's line was where the cold light bread began on the north and the hot biscuits began on the south, politely calling attention that during the banquet hot biscuits had been served. In his southern eloquence he then proclaimed that the Mason and Dixon's line must be located up about Canada some place.

He closed his after-dinner talk with a few well-selected illustrations teaching the lessons of manhood, good citizenship, and religion.

The Eatonton Messenger, of Eatonton, Ga., on Friday, April 25, 1928, after criticizing some other Georgia papers for their stand on Sunday-observance legislation, made the following observations:

The bill of Mr. LANKFORD is not a freak bill. It is in no wise fanatical in its purposes. It seeks to regulate business in Washington City, for which city Congress makes the laws or ordinances just as the city councils of Columbus or Brunswick do for those cities, so that the Sabbath day may be appropriately observed as a day of rest and religious worship separate from the other six days of the week.

It does not go further than to provide that business occupations, except those that have to be carried on for the public, shall not be conducted on Sundays. There is nothing about it resembling what is sometimes termed an awful "blue law" by persons who do not appear to approve of any law that restrains them in doing as they please, regardless of law or the rights of other people.

A day of rest once a week in this country is a necessity for people who work, not to mention the other purposes to which the Sabbath has been set aside, and as Washington is the capital of the country, Washington should set an example of the Christian Sabbath; and if conditions in that city are as they are said to be the bill of Congressman LANKFORD is a very good one, indeed, and should be passed. It does not seem to contemplate anything more than the different States, including Georgia, have already done. Our esteemed contemporaries should remember that the Seventh Day Adventists have shown they were fallible when several times in the past they fixed the day for the world to come to an end.

I next wish to quote from one of the periodicals published in New York City, and devoted to the interest of the movies and theaters, an article which was intended as a criticism. Here is the item:

W. C. LANKFORD, Congressman from Douglas, Ga., near Atlanta, where the Ku-Klux originated, is opposed to Sunday movies, Sunday baseball, and everything except religious services on the Sabbath Day in the District of Columbia. Before the committee hearing the "blue law" pros and cons there he did not fail to tell the residents of Washington how they ought to spend their Sundays.

LANKFORD is the author of the "blue-Sunday bill" now pending in Congress, which provides "that it shall be unlawful in the District of Columbia to keep open or use any dancing saloon, theater (whether for motion pictures, plays, spoken or silent, opera, vaudeville, or entertainment), bowling alley, or any place of public assembly at which an admission fee is directly or indirectly received, or to engage in commercialized sports or amusements on the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday.

And this is what that Georgian had to say—and more, too—to the committee, while several hundred Washington business men and women, representatives of social and civic organizations, gathered to oppose his bill:

"I'M GUILTY OF INTOLERANCE

"It is a new idea that the present-day movies and shows and Sunday baseball are religious institutions, and that anyone who suggests that there should be a law to prevent the operation of these on Sunday is guilty of religious intolerance.

"I confess that I am at a loss to know just how I am guilty of religious intolerance when I propose a bill which would allow people of all and every denomination to go to church, if they wish, on Sunday, and only seek such provisions as will protect all in this enjoyment of religious liberty and freedom. Where is the religious intolerance which would prevent a crew of men operating a steam shovel or an electric hammer on a building site or partly constructed building next door to a church during services on Sunday? Where is the religious intolerance in a law which would not let a negro unload a large quantity of coal next door to a church, and thus disturb the assembly of people gathered for religious services? Where is the intolerance in a bill which makes for the most complete religious liberty and allows all and everyone to worship God according to the dictates of his or her own conscience? My purpose and hope is only to secure in a fuller sense the enjoyment of religious liberty. Most people do not understand that religious liberty means the infliction on the public of the profanity of the pool room, the vulgarity of the modern movie or theater, and the obscenity of the ordinary dance hall on every Sunday of the year.

"The great trouble is that there are some folks who believe that freedom of religion is freedom from religion. They mistake freedom of religion for freedom of crime.

"The bill which I introduced provides for one day of rest out of every seven. If I provided for no rest day at all, there would rightly be much opposition. It would be cruel and savage in the extreme to force all to work every day without any rest, and yet I am held up as an advocate of an unreasonable thing when I attempt to make by law one day of rest out of every seven.

"'AGIN' EVERYTHING

"Because I am not willing for my people to pay taxes to build negro bathing beaches and artificial bathing pools here, and because I object to my people being forced to help maintain a negro university here in the District of Columbia contrary to law, I am said to be guilty of racial intolerance. It all depends on whose definition of intolerance we are to use. I do object to the public being forced to educate a crowd of negroes in Washington when many of the white boys and girls of the South and other parts of the country are denied sufficient educational advantages. It has even been urged here that at public expense there be established a beauty parlor for the negroes of the District of Columbia, so that the negro girls could take lessons in using rouge and perfume, etc. Well, if objecting to this kind of thing is intolerance, then I am very intolerant.

"I believe in letting the negro be the negro and the white man be the white man. I believe in letting the negro having his section of town to live in and the white people have theirs. I certainly believe in the negro having his own waiting room, his own car or separate seats on street cars and railroads, and his own schools, but I believe in the white people having also their own separate depot and transportation and educational facilities. Nothing could be fairer. Oh, but many say that there should be no distinction and that all be treated alike. Segregation treats all alike."

Some two or three years ago I made certain criticisms of the efforts of the negroes of the country to shove themselves in where they are not wanted, and urged that this action on their part brought about ill will between the races rather than good feeling, and thus injured both.

Most of the negro papers carried my speech without comment. Some carried only quotations which left out much of the real argument of the speech. The Afro-American, of Baltimore, Md., carried the following item:

REPRESENTATIVE LANKFORD (DEMOCRAT, GEORGIA) URGES JIM CROW STREET CARS, TRAINS, AND STATIONS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

WASHINGTON, February 14.—Representative WILLIAM C. LANKFORD (Democrat, Georgia) told Congress last week he not only approved of President Lowell's stand of excluding negroes from Harvard but also excluding them from the white schools in the North.

Representative LANKFORD also took in the occasion to discuss the race problem, urging Jim Crow street cars, trains, libraries, and parks for the city. Among other things he said were:

"The so-called 'Jim Crow' law, which makes whites and negroes ride in separate coaches on trains, use separate seats in street cars, and use separate waiting rooms at the stations, is a most excellent law for both races.

"The best thing the negro race could do for itself would be to say: 'Give us separate cars, separate waiting rooms, separate parks, separate schools, separate libraries, and separate sections of town to live in. We do not want to offend the white people in the least. They are our friends. We are theirs.'

"I believe the negroes teach their children here to be as offensive to the whites as possible. The old and the young of the Negro race here are doing well their part of building up a contempt of the white race for the negroes.

"The negroes of the North are destroying the chance they have by attempting to force themselves where they are not wanted and by being insolent and offensive. Many negroes in the South would not under any circumstances come in at the front door of a white home unless specifically requested to do so. They do not want to use a white waiting room or ride on a train in the white coach if it offends the white man or white woman or white child in the least. These kind of negroes are the saving power of the Negro race."

Representative LANKFORD complained that there was no space in Union Station where colored people were prohibited.

"Millions and millions of the people's money have been spent and are spent each year on dozens of most beautiful parks here in Washington, and most splendid music is furnished—for whom? For only the whites who want to associate with negroes.

"Oh, the disgrace of the negro situation here in Washington! We have here in Washington a so-called reformatory for girls. It is filled up with negro girls and a few white girls. In other words, if a white girl makes a mistake or does some wrong for which she should be corrected she is forced to live with a bunch of negroes in order that she, a white girl, may be made better. The gang in authority in Washington who causes this to be done ought to be forced to eat with negroes, sleep with negroes, live with negroes, smell negroes, and work at hard labor with negroes in a penitentiary for and during the full end and term of their natural lives."

Mr. Speaker, the Negro race, by endeavoring to get more than it is entitled to, will eventually lose many of its rights. By infringing on the rights of the white race they built a resentment which will later deprive them of the rights of the negro.

In many sections where each race does not have well-defined rights and each stay strictly within them extreme hatred will arise and negroes will be driven from their homes, and even deprived of the right to live by the sway of race riots. The occasional lynching of a guilty negro will not hurt the Negro race, but the all-consuming flame of race hatred which is being kindled slowly but surely in many sections of the North, where the negro is attempting to push the white man aside, will hurt the Negro race.

The negroes are entitled to their own schools, churches, libraries, public gatherings, parks, bathing beaches, waiting-room accommodations, and railway and other transportation conveniences unmolested by the white folks, and the white people are entitled to the same conveniences without the interference of negroes.

The negro can not be white, neither will any considerable portion of the white race, either North or South, long consent to act the negro. The limitations fixed by the Almighty are steadfast and everlasting, and negro will remain negro and white will remain white. There should be rendered unto the negro the things that are his and unto the white man the things that are his. The white race, in all justice, will do this and only this, and the sooner the better.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Investment Bankers Association of America, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, W. VA., May 16, 1928.

Hon. CHARLES G. DAWES,

Vice President United States:

The board of governors of the Investment Bankers Association of America at its regular meeting held at White Sulphur Springs, W. Va., May 16, 1928, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we condemn the principles embodied in the Norris bill (S. 3151) now pending in the Senate of the United States as imperiling the security of the property rights and the protection which property rights now have under the Federal Constitution, and which they always have enjoyed under the Federal Constitution even if Congress were hindered by no constitutional limitation. We feel that it would be unwise in the extreme to take away from the Federal courts their power to prevent invasion of rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution and leave the protection of such rights to the State courts. Past experience has proved that access to the Federal courts for the protection of rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution and to protect nonresidents against local prejudice is essential to investors' safety. It is a right which in the past investors have relied upon for the safety of their investments, and to now take away that essential right would be unfair to investors who in good faith relied upon the right at the time they invested their money."

HENRY R. HAYES,

President Investment Bankers Association of America.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a communication in the nature of a memorial from John P. Turner, chairman committee on legislation American Veterinary Medical Association, remonstrating against the proposed increase in the tax on veterinarians, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARRISON presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, which was ordered to lie on the table:

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
Jackson.

I, Walker Wood, secretary of state of the State of Mississippi, do hereby certify that the within and attached is a true and correct copy of House Concurrent Resolution 20, acts of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi of 1928, the enrolled act, of which is now on file and a matter of record in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Mississippi this the 12th day of May, 1928.

[SEAL.]

WALKER WOOD,
Secretary of State.

House Concurrent Resolution 20, memorializing Congress to pass the Tyson and Fitzgerald bills regarding disabled emergency officers

Whereas of the nine classes of officers who served in the World War, eight classes, namely: Regular officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps; provisional officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps; and emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, have been granted by Congress the privilege of retirement for disability when incurred in line of duty, leaving only the disabled emergency officers of the Army without such retirement privileges; and

Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States measures known as the Tyson bill (S. 777) and the Fitzgerald bill (H. R. 500), to correct this apparent injustice to the disabled National Guard and other emergency officers of the World War; and

Whereas such proposed legislation is equitable and seeks to do a long delayed justice to a class of worthy disabled officers of the World War entitled because of their service, their wounds, and disabilities incurred therefrom to the same consideration and privileges as men of their rank who performed like service, but were of the Regular Army; and

Whereas an overwhelming number of the Members of Congress since the armistice have promised to correct this injustice to disabled emergency Army officers by the enactment of legislation designed to adjust the unfair condition imposed upon this one remaining class of officers: Be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of Mississippi urge upon its legislators in the National Congress the importance and desirability of speedily passing such legislation; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to each Senator and Representative in the Congress from the State of Mississippi.

Adopted by the house of representatives February 24, 1928.

Adopted by the senate April 16, 1928.

Mr. VANDENBERG presented resolutions adopted by the common council of the city of Detroit, Mich., which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Copy of a resolution adopted by the common council of the city of Detroit on April 24 in regular session, setting forth the opposition of the council to any change in the present methods of developing the waterways of the country as proposed by bill H. R. 8127, known as the Wyant bill, by Councilman Kronk

River and harbor engineering and construction work has been directed and administered for more than 100 years by the United States Corps of Engineers.

They are thoroughly familiar with the engineering and construction work of the Government the country over and are free from political influence.

In the Great Lakes district alone they have directed the expenditures of more than $160,000,000 in the improvement of the harbors and navigable rivers in a manner that has been entirely satisfactory to the people of the Lake States. Measured in savings to the public, this expenditure has paid and is paying each year 100 per cent interest on the investment.

The annual water-borne commerce of the Nation is now approximately 550,000,000 tons, valued at approximately $27,000,000,000. This vast commerce, dependent on adequate waterways, is too important to be intrusted to anyone who has not had the practical experience of the Army engineers.

They are recruited from year to year from the most efficient graduates of the United States Military Academy and through the peerless code of honor inculcated there they are preeminently qualified for the service of the Government.

It is vital to the safety of the Nation that during peace these engineers be given practical experience in river and harbor construction so that in war they will have information and experience of an indispensable character that could not be obtained otherwise.

Their long record of loyal, faithful, efficient, and honorable public service in all of their activities inspires not only the admiration and confidence of the American people but the earnest hope that they may be permitted to continue to direct and administer all river and harbor works: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the common council of the city of Detroit declares their unqualified opposition to any change in the present methods of developing the waterways of the Nation, which would in any way lessen the authority or responsibility of the United States Army engineers in this connection; and be it

Resolved further, That we are therefore opposed to the provisions of H. R. 8127, commonly known as the Wyant bill, which proposes to transfer river and harbor improvement, the duties of the United States Chief of Engineers pertaining thereto, and jurisdiction over navigable waters from the War Department to the Interior Department; therefore be it

Resolved further, That we request our Representatives in Congress to do everything within their power to defeat the said provisions of this bill.

Adopted as follows:

Yeas: Councilmen Bradley, Callahan, Castator, Dingeman, Ewald, Kronk, Littlefield, Walters, and the president—9.

Nays: None.

Mr. NORBECK. I present a letter from William Hirth, publisher and editor of the Missouri Farmer, as chairman of the Corn Belt Committee, to Gov. Howard M. Gore, of West Virginia, and resolutions adopted by the Corn Belt Committee, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and accompanying resolutions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[William Hirth, publisher and editor the Missouri Farmer, Missouri's greatest farm paper]

COLUMBIA, MO., May 15, 1928.

GOV. HOWARD M. GORE,
Charleston, W. Va.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: As one who has spent long, weary months in Washington during the last six years in connection with the great struggle for a square deal for agriculture at the hands of the Government, and as chairman of the Corn Belt Committee, which represents more than a million organized farmers reaching from Indiana to Montana, I am deeply interested in the approaching presidential contest—and I say this because I have come to the conclusion that never was it so important for agriculture to have a friend in the White House as during the next four years. In other words, we not only need a President who is willing to sign an effective farm-relief measure but one who is in deep sympathy with such legislation, and who will therefore lend the full power of his great office to its successful administration.

And in this connection I was surprised some days ago to learn (on apparently reliable authority) that you are sponsoring the candidacy of Herbert Hoover in the approaching primary in West Virginia—and because of the pleasant personal relations which existed between us some years ago I trust you will be willing to give consideration to the following comment which I desire to have you regard in the nature of an open letter to the farmers of your State. I recall with much admiration the splendid service you rendered to the Missouri Farmers' Association at the National Stockyards at East St. Louis some years ago when you were connected with the United States Department of Agriculture. This service came at a time when our Livestock Commission Co. was fighting with its back to the wall—you stood fearlessly for a square deal to the farmer on that occasion, and, recalling this incident as vividly as I do, I am all the more puzzled by your reported sponsorship for Mr. Hoover at a time when our great agricultural industry is threatened with almost complete collapse, and when the farmers of West Virginia and of the whole Nation need true friends in high places as never before.

I regard Mr. Hoover as the most sinister and relentless enemy the farmers of this country have ever known, and I base this conclusion upon two general grounds—first, because as food administrator during the World War he did everything in his power to depress the price of farm commodities, and this at a time when the shout that "Food will win the war" filled the land morning, noon, and night; and, secondly, I make this charge because during the administrations of both President Harding and President Coolidge, Hoover has been a relentless enemy of the McNary-Haugen bill, which is the only measure that has been offered in the history of Congress that promises to place the farmers of this country on an even footing with the great organized forces that fix their costs of production.

I know that since he has become a candidate for the Republican nomination for President, a frantic effort has been made to "whitewash" his World War record, but this record is so indelibly written in the memories of men, and upon the pages of recorded events, that all such efforts will fail dismally. Only recently I supplied an article to the press which told in detail of his duplicity to the livestock producers during the war, and even so his arbitrary interpretation of the minimum price of wheat, as fixed by Congress as a maximum price, these facts can not be explained away by all the political whitewashers in Christendom—the simple truth of the matter is that Mr. Hoover came over here from England to act as food administrator, and for reasons best known to himself he started out to buy food as cheaply as possible, and that in carrying out this ruthless policy he deprived the farmers of this country of hundreds of millions of dollars which justly belonged to them; of this there not the slightest doubt.

And, now, don't misunderstand me on this score—I don't mean that our farmers had a right to expect to make money out of the war, but I do think they were at least entitled to fair production cost, and especially so at a time when we were breeding new millionaires by the hundreds in all other fields of war activity.

Furthermore, no one needs to take my word about Hoover in these premises, for men like ex-Gov. Gifford Pinchot, of Pennsylvania; Edward C. Lassiter, of Texas; John Simpson, of Oklahoma; and dozens of other men of standing, who were intimately connected with his war activities, will join me in pronouncing him the greatest enemy that American agriculture has ever encountered.

And here let me say also, that if by any chance he should be nominated at Kansas City, Governor Smith, or whoever the Democrats may nominate at Houston, will be the next President of the United States—the rising and setting of the sun is not more certain than this, for the farmers of the great Corn Belt States will smite him hip and thigh; they will take his nomination as an open affront to agriculture, and thus the old party lines will look as if a cyclone had struck him. And in proof of this I need only cite the recent primaries in Ohio and Indiana, where the vote for Hoover was confined to the big cities, and where he failed to carry a single rural congressional district.

The old saying that you can lead a horse to water, but that you can not make him drink applies to the present instance—they may put Hoover across at Kansas City, but as certain as they do the farmers of the country will teach the Republican leaders a lesson they will not forget in 50 years. And therefore feeling as deeply about the matter as I do, I hope the farmers of West Virginia will give their overwhelming support to Senator GOFF in your coming primary—and in this connection I want to say that as chairman of the Corn Belt Committee, which has taken such a leading part in the farm-relief struggle in Washington, I have addressed communications similar to this to the farmers of other States, and from the results in the primaries in these States I have ample reason to believe that my appeals have not fallen wholly upon deaf ears.

And now, in conclusion, permit me to say that I realize your eminent right to be your own judge in these premises, nor have I the slightest desire to question your motives. But in an hour when the American farmer is desperately fighting against peasantry, and when I am reminded of the fact that since the close of the World War the farm debt of the Nation has increased from four and a half billion dollars to more than $12,000,000,000, and that during this period farm values of all kinds have shrunk in the staggering sum of more than $20,000,000,000—when I think of these tragic things and the degree to which Herbert Hoover is responsible for them, then I am resolved to warn my fellow farmers against him, and this whether it be in the Corn Belt or in the distant States. With kind personal regards,

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM HIRTH.

RESOLUTIONS

Speaking for more than a million organized farmers reaching from Indiana to Montana, the Corn Belt Committee hereby serves notice upon the leaders of the Republican Party that if by any chance Herbert Hoover should be nominated for President at the forthcoming Kansas City convention, that the great Corn Belt States will be found solidly against him. The farm vote easily constitutes a balance of power in such States as Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, and the Northwest, and remembering the perfidy of Hoover to the farmer during the World War, and the sinister and relentless attitude he has maintained toward farm relief legislation during the Harding and Coolidge administrations, nothing is more certain than that in the event of his nomination, the farmers of the above States will utterly ignore party lines in their determination to consign this man to private life for all time to come. Therefore we not only protest against his nomination but we give fair warning to the Republican leaders of what they may expect if such an affront is offered to the farmers of the Nation.

We have not forgotten the shout that "Food will win the war," and the manner in which the farmers of America responded to that appeal will ever stand as an imperishable monument to their patriotism. And yet no sooner did the producers of wheat and livestock and of other farm commodities go to the rescue of their country in its hour of peril, when through the activities of Mr. Hoover as Food Administrator, prices were controlled or depressed to an extent that defrauded these producers out of hundreds of millions of dollars which justly belonged to them—and this at a time when the gunmakers and powder manufacturers and other suppliers of war material were rewarded on the notorious and indefensible plan of 10 per cent plus cost. That under these circumstances intelligent and responsible party leaders should seriously propose Mr. Hoover as a presidential nominee is hardly believable, and can be reconciled only upon the assumption that the farmers of this country possess neither memories nor self-respect.

We hereby serve notice on the leaders of both political parties that the farmers of the great food producing areas of the United States will look with extreme disfavor upon any candidate for presidential honors, whose past actions and present attitude brand him as unfriendly or unsympathetic toward the inequality with other industries under which we have been laboring the past seven years. Self-appointed leaders of both parties should realize that we have reached the point where political lines can be easily broken or even wiped out.

SHOOTING OF JACOB D. HANSON

Mr. COPELAND presented resolutions adopted by Batavia Lodge, No. 950, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, Batavia, N. Y., relative to the shooting of Jacob D. Hanson, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BATAVIA LODGE NO. 950,
BENEVOLENT AND PROTECTIVE ORDER OF ELKS,
Batavia, N. Y., May 15, 1928.

We, the undersigned past exalted rulers of the Batavia Lodge of Elks, have been authorized to draft this resolution in the form of a protest by the members of our lodge against the uncalled-for attack and shooting of one Jacob D. Hanson, secretary of the Niagara Falls Lodge of Elks, by two Coast Guardsmen in the employ of the United States Government, who made this attack on Brother Hanson on the Lewiston hill early Sunday morning, May 6.

We hereby characterize the shooting of Mr. Hanson as a most cruel and wanton act, without any reasonable excuse whatsoever in the conduct of these two Coast Guardsmen, who, we understand, were disguised in their form of dress so that they appeared as highwaymen rather than Government representatives.

Resolved, That the Batavia Lodge of Elks hereby protests to the United States Government against such methods as were employed by these Coast Guardsmen on the public highway. The shooting of Mr. Hanson was a most deplorable affair. He had a right on the highway, as have other citizens, without being molested, and we herewith appeal to our Government to cause a prompt investigation of all circumstances surrounding this tragedy and that those guilty of the crippling for life, if not death, of Mr. Hanson be punished accordingly; be it further

Resolved, That we, as Elks, together with all other good citizens of the State of New York and of the United States, are most desirous that the laws be lived up to, but that the methods employed, as in the case of Mr. Hanson, be immediately abolished and that the highways in our fair State be made safe for its citizens to travel upon without being molested or shot at.

WILLIAM H. COON,
JOSEPH M. QUIRK,
GEORGE W. BABCOCK,
Past Exalted Rulers.

Hon. FRANK T. HINES,
Director United States Veterans' Bureau,
Washington, D. C.

"That any ex-service person shown to have had a tuberculosis disease of a compensable degree, who, in the judgment of the director, has reached a condition of complete arrest of his disease, shall receive compensation of not less than $50 per month: Provided, however, That nothing in this provision shall deny a beneficiary the right to receive a temporary total rating for six months after discharge from a one year's period of hospitalization: Provided further, That no payments under this provision shall be retroactive and the payments hereunder shall commence from the date of the passage of this act or the date the disease reaches a condition of arrest, whichever be the later date."

Will you please inform me as to the number of ex-service men now receiving compensation under the provisions of my amendment; and also please further advise me as to the gross sum of money (compensation) which to date has been paid to ex-service men under and by virtue of this Ashurst amendment?

INVESTIGATION OF PUBLIC UTILITY VALUES IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. BLAINE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 236), which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Whereas valuation of the property of the Washington Railway & Electric Co. and its subsidiaries, the City & Surburban Railway of Washington, and the Georgetown & Tennallytown Railway Co., as decided December 4, 1919, by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia as then constituted has been protested by the carriers as not being representative of current conditions; and

Whereas a valuation of the Capital Traction Co. has been made, as decided September 4, 1919, by the aforesaid Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, and being protested by the carrier was appealed in accordance with paragraph 64 of the act of March 4, 1913, creating the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, and a decree thereon has been entered by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia; and

Whereas the Washington Rapid Transit Co., a public utility operating in the District of Columbia, has not as yet been valued, although petitions fixing the rates for this carrier have been granted by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia; and

Whereas a valuation of the Potomac Electric Power Co. has been made and a report thereon published by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia and an order thereon entered March 21, 1917, said order being appealed to the courts and finally compromised before the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in a decree entered the 31st day of December, 1924, with the consent of the parties, fixing a valuation and a rate of return of 7½ per cent thereon and a sliding scale of prices under which one-half the excess return above 7½ per cent is the property of the company; and

Whereas all of these valuations were made prior to the creation of Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia as constituted in the act of December 15, 1926, and prior to the provision of funds for conducting such inquiries as provided in the act of March 3, 1927; and

Whereas these valuations are based upon principles resulting in grave injustice to the users of the public utilities, and, further, that there is now pending before the Congress of the United States a resolution known as H. J. Res. 276, to authorize the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and the valuation of these properties correctly made is an important prerequisite to the approval of such a merger: Be it

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is directed and shall investigate, ascertain, and report the value of all the property owned or used by the above-named public utilities in the District of Columbia for rate-making purposes and for purposes of consolidation or merger.

Further, the Interstate Commerce Commission is directed to determine the value of the properties sought to be merged by aforesaid H. J. Res. 276 as a single entity, with due consideration for the degree of depreciation in the property which it is proposed to dedicate as a unit to public service; be it further Resolved, That the aforesaid Interstate Commerce Commission shall report to Congress as promptly as may be results of its findings.

PAYMENT OF TAXES IN VIEW OF DISCLOSURES

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I offer a resolution. I request that it be read, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation be, and it hereby is, requested to secure from the Secretary of the Treasury and submit to the two Houses of Congress full information concerning what taxes and penalties, if any, have been collected by or paid into the Treasury consequent upon disclosures made before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys of the Senate in the course of the investigation conducted by it pursuant to Senate Resolution 101, or through inquiries prosecuted incidental to such investigation, including the date of payments, the amount of the same, and the persons making the payments; and likewise, in so far as it may not be incompatible with the public interest, further information concerning any claims or demands being made by the Treasury against any persons or corporations for taxes or penalties over and above such sums as may have been heretofore paid on account of the receipt of assets so disclosed and not duly reported for taxation as required by law.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] is detained from the Senate by illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. NEELY obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NEELY. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the quorum call, I will state to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] that I had offered an amendment to the tax bill which is now the pending amendment. While the clerk was calling the roll the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] informed me that he has to leave the city this afternoon at 3 o'clock and he has one or two amendments that he wishes to offer and dispose of before he leaves.

Mr. COPELAND. I understand the remarks of the Senator from West Virginia will be very brief.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not finding fault with the Senator.

Mr. NEELY. I want to be accommodating not only to the Senator from New York but to all other Senators. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

PROPOSED BITUMINOUS COAL COMMISSION

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to introduce a bill and to make a brief statement with reference to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Will it lead to any discussion?

Mr. WATSON. There can be no discussion. I am merely introducing a bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. WATSON. Some three months ago the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] introduced a resolution to investigate the conditions in the coal industry in certain States. For the last three months the Committee on Interstate Commerce has been having hearings on that subject, having concluded them yesterday. There was not as much difficulty in diagnosing the disease as in prescribing the proper remedy. Always the question in the mind of every committeeman, as well as in the minds of all who attended the hearings, was, granting all these things are true, what do we intend to do about them? It was suggested that each phase of the industry represented in the investigation or in the industry or in the transportation of coal or in the ownership of the mines or among the miners themselves should prepare a bill, putting on paper the ideas of that particular branch of the industry as to what is the proper remedy.

Pursuant to that request the United Mine Workers, through their very competent counsel, Mr. Henry Warrum, with such aid and assistance as he cared to call in, formulated a bill. It is that bill that I am now introducing, together with a report also formulated by them, setting forth what they desire to accomplish by means of this bill if it shall be enacted into law. The bill is introduced purely as a basis of argument for the future; it is not intended as a finality, but is what the miners think would be a proper remedy for the difficulties in which this industry is involved. Other bills, I am told, will be formulated by other branches of the industry and will be presented at a later date; but with that understanding I desire at this time to introduce this measure.

The bill (S. 4490) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in bituminous coal; provide for consolidations, mergers, and cooperative marketing; regulate the fuel supply of interstate carriers; require the licensing of corporations producing and shipping coal in interstate commerce; and to create a bituminous-coal commission, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, as the author of and one deeply interested in the resolution for the investigation of conditions in the coal-mining industry and in the coal-mining regions, I want to express for myself personally and for those for whom I acted in presenting the resolution our gratitude and our appreciation to the Interstate Commerce Committee and to the chairman of that committee for the able, courageous, and painstaking way in which that investigation has been conducted, and for their fairness in ultimately reaching their conclusions. We feel—all of us who are interested in that resolution and in the conditions existing—a debt of gratitude to that committee and to its chairman that we never can repay.

Mr. WATSON. I thank the Senator.

TAX REDUCTION

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to reduce and equalize taxation, provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia has the floor.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, taking advantage of the kindness of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who has agreed to withhold action on his amendment, I send, in order that it may be pending, an amendment which we may consider when the revenue bill shall be regularly taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is the pending amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. In order to accommodate the Senator from New York I temporarily withdraw my amendment with the idea of offering it as soon as we get through with his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 22, line 3, after the word "trade," it is proposed to insert the word "profession"; on page 22, line 3, after the word "business," to insert "or in attending meetings of trades, professional or business organizations of which the taxpayer is a member"; and on page 22, line 7, after the word "trade," to insert the word "profession."

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, on yesterday there was laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4235) to amend section 12 of the act entitled "An act to provide more effectively for the national defense by increasing the efficiency of the Air Corps of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, approved July 2, 1926. The House amendment to the body of the bill is somewhat extensive, and at my request the bill and the amendments, the other amendment being an amendment to the title, were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. By direction of that committee, I report the bill and amendments back to the Senate to-day and move that the Senate disagree to the House amendments, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, pending action on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I inquire whether the Senator has considered the advisability of concurring in the House amendments?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The main House amendment goes pretty far. It takes care of seven pioneer aviators who were qualified prior to 1913 and gives them a retirement pay which is greater than the active service pay of officers of the same grade not on flying duty. It also confers certain benefits on aviators who were distinguished during the war. It seemed desirable that a further study of the matter should be made before the Senate should concur in the House amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I shall not oppose the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I hope, however, that it will be possible for the conferees to reach an agreement which may be acted upon before the end of the session. I believe that the House amendment is a meritorious proposal, and I trust that the Senate conferees will agree to it if possible.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ought to say also that the House amendment contains some typographical misprints, which it will be easier to correct, perhaps, in conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives, ask for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, Mr. GREENE, and Mr. FLETCHER conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will those in the rear please be kind enough to discontinue their audible conservation or retire to the cloakroom?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Sergeant at Arms ought to be instructed to request Senators who are carrying on conversation to the disturbance of the Senate to retire or to cease conversation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will be so instructed. The Senator from West Virginia will proceed.

CANCER—HUMANITY'S MOST DEADLY SCOURGE

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the concluding chapter of that fascinating, thrilling, and instructive masterpiece by Charles Dickens, entitled "A Tale of Two Cities," contains a vivid description of the guillotine, the most efficacious mechanical destroyer of human life that brutal and bloodthirsty man has ever invented. Mr. Dickens says that—

> All the insatiate and devouring monsters imagined since imagination could record itself are fused in the realization—guillotine.

But through all the years the victims of the guillotine have been limited to a few hundred thousands of the people of France.

I purpose to speak of a monster that is more insatiate than the guillotine; more destructive to life and health and happiness than the World War; more irresistible than the mightiest army that ever marched to battle; more terrifying than any other scourge that has ever threatened the existence of the human race. The monster of which I speak has infested and still infests every inhabited country, it has preyed and still preys upon every nation; it has fed and feasted and fattened, and still feeds and feasts and fattens, on the flesh and blood and brains and bones of men and women in every land. The sighs and sobs and shrieks that it has extorted from perishing humanity would, if they were tangible things, make a mountain. The tears that it has wrung from weeping women's eyes would make an ocean. The blood that it has shed would redden every wave that rolls on every sea. The name of this loathsome, deadly, and insatiate monster is "cancer." It is older than the human race. Evidence of cancer has been found in the fossil remains of a serpent that is supposed to have lived millions of years ago. Records made on papyri by the ancient Egyptians show that the cancer curse was known in the Valley of the Nile more than 2,000 years before the birth of Christ.

Medical science has conquered yellow fever, diphtheria, typhoid, and smallpox. Medical science has robbed even leprosy and tuberculosis of their terrors. But in spite of all that physicians, surgeons, chemists, biologists, and all other scientists have done, cancer remains the unconquered, the unconquerable, and defiant foe of the human race. It is to-day more menacing and deadly and irresistible than ever before.

The naked facts and figures which record the rapid, progressive, and persistent advance of this frightful scourge are so appalling as to render superfluous any attempt to emphasize the tale of horror that they tell.

For example, in Great Britain the death rate from cancer in the year 1850 was 274 for each million of the population. During the next 50 years this death rate increased 288 per cent; and in the first year of this century of every million Britons 800 died of cancer. Subsequently for each million of the British population deaths from cancer have been as follows:

For the year—
1905	866
1910	939
1915	1,054
1920	1,179
1923	1,267

Thus it appears that during the 73 years between 1850 and 1923 the cancer death rate in the great English-speaking country across the sea increased more than 462 per cent.

In the year 1921 the registration area of the United States contained 82.2 per cent, and in 1926, 89.8 per cent of our entire population. In this area our yearly deaths from cancer during the period just indicated were as follows:

1921	76,274
1922	80,938
1923	86,754
1924	91,138
1925	95,504
1926 (the last year reported)	99,833

Stated in another way, the death rate from cancer in the area under consideration was for each hundred thousand of our population, including all ages, as follows: 1921, 86; 1922, 86.8; 1923, 89.4; 1924, 91.9; 1925, 92.6; 1926, 94.9.

In other words, from 1921 to 1926 in the registration area of the United States the annual cancer death rate mounted from 86 for each hundred thousand population, including all ages, to 94.9. But it should be borne in mind that cancer is comparatively rare in both men and women who are under 40 years of age. Accordingly, in order to appreciate the full significance of cancer's ruthless devastation, one must consider it in relation to those who are 40 years old or older.

Accurate statistics as to the ravages of cancer in the United States previous to the year 1900 are not available. But for that year and all subsequent years to and including 1926 such statistics are available for what are known as the 10 original registration States, namely, Connecticut, Indiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island, and Vermont. The population of these 10 original registration States was in 1900 almost 20,000,000 and more than 27,000,000, or almost a fourth of the population of the entire country, in 1920.

The United States Public Health Service has issued a bulletin entitled "Cancer Mortality," from which it appears that the death rate in the original registration area for each hundred thousand of the population aged 40 years or more from 1900 to and including 1920 is as follows:

Year:	Cancer, all forms
1900	212.0
1901	218.1
1902	217.4
1903	227.9
1904	232.2
1905	238.8
1906	240.0
1907	248.5
1908	251.0
1909	259.0
1910	270.8
1911	273.8
1912	278.0
1913	286.0
1914	286.0
1915	293.2
1916	300.0
1917	301.4
1918	299.7
1919	302.3
1920	311.4

The most conservative cancer statisticians say that more than a hundred and ten thousand, and perhaps as many as a hundred and twenty-five thousand, people died of cancer in the United States during the year 1927, for which complete statistics are not yet available.

At first blush these cold facts and figures may make little impression on the mind of a public official who is charged with no particular responsibility to solve the cancer problem. But upon serious reflection they must challenge the earnest consideration of everyone who is sufficiently thoughtful to be interested in perpetuating the human race.

If the rapid increase in cancer fatalities should persist in the future as it has persisted in the past, the cancer curse would in a few centuries depopulate the earth.

Because of the unusual susceptibility of the female breast and organs of reproduction to cancer, about 60 per cent of all who succumb to this scourge are women, while only about 40 per cent are men.

Assuming that all who are known to have died from cancer in the United States in the year 1926 were of average height and that 60 per cent of the victims were females and 40 per cent males, and further assuming that they were all placed in a straight line, that line would be more than a hundred miles long.

If these victims were laid in a double line side by side, the line would extend from Washington to Baltimore and 10 miles beyond.

Do the Members of the Senate realize that every month more than 8,000 of the American people die of cancer; that every day in the year cancer robs 277 of our people of their precious lives; that, on the average, cancer murders 11 of the people of the United States during every hour of every day; that every time the clock ticks off 5 minutes and 30 seconds somebody's father or mother, brother or sister, or daughter or son is by the cancer curse sent to the dissolution of the grave?

The fact that cancer is everywhere claiming greater and greater multitudes of victims every day is in itself sufficiently terrifying. But even more horrible is the fact that in its later stages cancer inflicts upon its wretched victims suffering greater than any other disease can entail, torture more excruciating than any ever devised by American Indians, agony more intolerable than any ever inflicted by the fanatical fiends of the Dark Ages.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NEELY. I do.

Mr. COPELAND. There is no suffering in the world equal to the torture of cancer. The Senator has put it strongly; but he could not choose words strong enough to express the suffering of the human beings with that terrible disease.

Mr. NEELY. I thank the able Senator and eminent physician from New York for approving and emphasizing what I have said.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. NEELY. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. It is also true, of course, that all this suffering is to a very great extent alleviated by anodynes.

Mr. NEELY. That is true; but it is also unfortunately true that the dying victim of cancer must be given enough opiates to make him unconscious in order to relieve his pain.

Mr. BRUCE. If the Senator will allow me to make another interruption in the course of his most interesting address, which I have been following with the closest attention, after all is not this supposed increase in cancer due to what might be called the high visibility of cancer under the conditions of modern research?

When I was a boy, very great numbers of people died of cancer without ever knowing that they had cancer. Even the doctors, especially country doctors, sometimes, when they found that a man was about to succomb to a mortal disease, would not trouble themselves very much about the causation of his condition. It seems to me those are considerations that ought to be taken into account.

Mr. NEELY. The medical profession has been quite capable of diagnosing cancer accurately in most cases for more than 20 years. Unfortunately the cancer victim only too frequently fails to give the surgeon a chance until it is too late.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; I suppose that is true.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, would it disturb the Senator if I said one word more?

Mr. NEELY. No; I gladly yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Maryland raises an interesting question. Undoubtedly it is true that with the improved means of diagnosis physicians now discover cancer when the old-time physician did not know what was the matter; but, as the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] says, during the past 10 or 15 or 20 years we have been in a sense at a standstill in our progress and knowledge of how to recognize cancer. Excluding all the hopefulness that we might build up in our hearts that it is really because we know more, it is undoubtedly true that cancer is on the increase. Whether due to our habits of civilization or what it may be, without going into any detail as to why, the fact remains that cancer is increasing.

Just one other word before I sit down.

The Senator from Maryland speaks about the use of the opiate. Of course, by increasing doses of those narcotics it is possible for a time to control the pain and suffering of cancer; but the time comes when the doses taken are so poisonous that death would come from the administration of the narcotic. In other words, the time comes when the narcotic can no longer give relief; and so, in the end, the patient dies in excruciating agony.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I hold in my hand Hoffman's illuminating and exhaustive work, entitled "The Mortality from Cancer Throughout the World." The able author of this volume says that the death rate from cancer has doubled in the United States in 40 years.

Another element of alarm that obtrudes itself into the consideration of the cancer problem is found in the fact that this frightful disease, in a large percentage of cases, steals upon its victims like a thief in the dead of the night. In the beginning cancer is usually painless. Consequently it frequently progresses to the hopeless stage before its existence is certainly known.

In spite of all that countless self-sacrificing physicians and surgeons and other scientists have done, and tried to do, cancer in its advanced stages is still the most mysterious and incurable of diseases, and humanity's most deadly foe. Indeed, the only known certain cure for cancer, even in its early stages, is to be found only in the application of the surgeon's knife.

For the benefit of those who are more inclined to think in terms of dollars and cents than in terms of humanity, attention is invited to the fact that the people of the United States suffer from the ravages of cancer an annual financial loss of more than three-fourths of a billion dollars. The following article which appeared in the New York Times for the 6th day of May, 1928, convincingly speaks to the point as follows:

CANCER LOSS IN 1927 PUT AT $800,000,000—DR. LUIS I. DUBLIN ESTIMATES ECONOMIC VALUE OF PERSONS WHO DIED AT $680,000,000

Establishing an economic loss as great as if 300,000 workingmen had been idle for a year, cancer in 1927 was responsible for a monetary loss of approximately $800,000,000, according to Dr. Luis I. Dublin, statistician of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. He said that $680,000,000 represented the monetary value of persons dying from this disease and $110,000,000 was spent caring for the victims.

The current year undoubtedly will see a greater economic loss and a greater amount of suffering, since the number of deaths from cancer is steadily increasing, according to Doctor Dublin. Cancer is a condition which usually occurs late in life, toward the end of the economically productive period, he added. However, a very considerable number of deaths occur earlier in life than is commonly supposed.

"We find, for example," said Doctor Dublin, "that under 25 years of age there are every year about 1,600 deaths from cancer, involving losses of $38,000,000; between 25 and 35 close to 3,000 deaths, amounting to $62,000,000; between 35 and 45 the deaths number 10,000, with losses of $160,000,000, and so on up to 75, where we estimate that the money value—that is, the earning power—of the average man is no longer appreciable. The important thing to remember is that the total runs up to $680,000,000.

"This is a considerable sum of money and represents a tenth of the total value of all iron and steel manufactured in the United States; it is as much as the total current income of the State of Louisiana."

Doctor Dublin estimates that care and medicine cost $1,000 a case. This means that the 110,000 cancer deaths last year involved a loss of $110,000,000, which added to the $680,000,000 means practically $800,000,000.

Sad to relate, practically every other civilized country is suffering as severely as our own from the world-wide cancer scourge. It is estimated that the deaths from cancer in the entire world now reach the grand total of three-fourths of a million a year.

And what is being done to check the advance of this all-devouring insatiate monster?

The best available figures indicate that the total governmental appropriations of the world to combat cancer now amount to only $400,000 a year. That this sum is not only ridiculously inadequate but pitiable in the extreme no intelligent person will deny. In spite of cancer's ravages and the suffering it has wrought among the people of the United States, in spite of cancer's awful desolation which has reached almost every family in the land to this moment our Government has never appropriated a dollar or even a cent to be used exclusively in warring against this hideous disease.

On the 4th day of February, 1927, I introduced in the Senate the first bill that was ever offered in either House of Congress for the purpose of obtaining governmental assistance in solving the cancer problem. That bill proposed a reward of $5,000,000 to the first person who discovered a practical and successful cure for cancer. The great press associations generously carried the news of the introduction of that bill around the world. Within a year after I introduced that measure I received almost 2,500 letters informing me that their writers possessed infallible cancer cures. These letters came from every country on the globe.

Let me read the following of these letters, which are fairly representative of all the rest.

DAYTON, OHIO, February 5, 1927.

DEAR SIR: In reading the paper, I saw a reward for the cure of a cancer. Not that I am after the money, but just to show you what the Lord will do, I am sending an anointed handkerchief, and if you will do as I tell you, you will be cured of that disease. Now, just lay it over the cancer in the name of Jesus, and it is healed if you will believe it. If this doesn't do you any good, it is because you have no faith. * * *

Mrs. C. J.

SAND SPRINGS, OKLA., May 9, 1927.

Senator NEELY.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your ad. in Capper's Weekly, I am sending you a cure for cancer, as follows:

External only; 10 grains arsenic, white of 1 egg, enough soot from wood stove to make a thick paste; apply twice a day on cancer.

* * * * * * *

Mrs. I. R.

WORCESTER, C. P., SOUTH AFRICA.

DEAR SIR: In writing on an advertisement of our South African newspaper of March, 1927, offering £1,000,000 for giving the best receipt for cancer, drink mixed herbs for working the cancer out of the body and blood. Take 1 ounce boggo, 2 ounces stonecflower, 2 ounces wild vineyard to a bottle of boiling water; let draw for 10 or 15 minutes; let set cold; take three times a tablespoonful a day. No meat or any salt fish may be taken when drinking this mixture. Also no strong drinks may be taken, such as wine and brandy.

For healing an open cancer wound take 2 ounces beeswax, 2 ounces castor oil, 4 or 6 ounces kraal bosch; fry together for 15 minutes; let cool; use two times a day. The wounds must be cleaned with warm water before using the salve.

Dear sir, my hope and longing are to receive a reply from you on this receipt.

Yours faithfully,

Mr. J. B. G——— ———,

30 Mylne Street, Worcester, C. P., South Africa.

Letters like the foregoing convinced me that the plan to offer a reward for a cancer cure set forth in my bill was imperfect, if not utterly futile.

My experience with the quacks who wrote to me only increased my sympathy for all the unfortunate cancer victims who fall into the hands of the countless charlatans of the country.

But burning with a desire to aid, if possible, in relieving humanity of the cancer curse, and believing with Edmund Burke that even the attempt to render a great service to mankind—would ennoble the flights of the highest genius and obtain pardon for the efforts of the meanest understanding,

I next sought the counsel and advice of some of those who are recognized as great authorities on cancer.

Dr. Joseph Bloodgood, of Johns Hopkins University, one of the greatest, if not the greatest cancer surgeon in the world, and one of the most princely men I have ever had the good fortune to know, has, with a reckless disregard of his own precious time, conferred with me at length again and again, and most generously given me his wise counsel and advice in my quest of means by which the Government could properly and effectually aid in solving the perplexing cancer problem.

Through Doctor Bloodgood's kindness I was permitted to participate in a meeting in his home in Baltimore at which the following eminent persons besides my host were present: Dr. J. B. Murphy, of the Rockefeller Institute; Prof. Raymond Pearl, Drs. Roland Park, Thomas S. Cullen, Warren H. Lewis, Lewis H. Weed, William Mansfield Clark, James S. Ames, George A. Stewart, and Mr. Merrill Stout.

After an entire evening's deliberation and discussion, it was unanimously decided by those present that the best method of beginning the offensive against the aggressive and deadly cancer foe lay in the introduction of a bill to authorize the National Academy of Sciences to investigate the entire cancer subject and report to Congress in what manner the Federal Government could assist in coordinating all cancer research and in conquering this most mysterious and destructive disease. The National Academy of Sciences was selected as the proper organization to make the investigation for the reason that it is composed of the most eminent doctors, chemists, biologists, and other scientists in the country.

The meeting in question was mindful of the fact that in the year 1915, when the constantly recurring slides threatened to destroy the Panama Canal, the National Academy of Sciences had, at the request of the President, promptly solved that problem. It was further believed that those composing the National Academy of Science possessed in the aggregate more knowledge that might be useful in discovering a cancer cure than was possessed by any other organization.

Acting upon the unanimous recommendation of those who participated in the meeting in Doctor Bloodgood's home, I introduced Senate bill No. 3554, which authorizes the National Academy of Sciences to make the investigation and report described in the bill. An appropriation of $100,000 was proposed to cover the actual necessary expenses of the work. The bill was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, which has amended the measure by reducing the proposed appropriation from $100,000 to $75,000. With this amendment the bill was unanimously reported from the committee and placed on the Senate Calendar.

A single Member of the Senate has informed me that he opposes my bill in its present form for the reason that he believes that the United States Public Health Service should be authorized to participate in the proposed work. After familiarizing myself with the recent accomplishments of the Public Health Service, and particularly after studying the remarkable achievements of Dr. J. W. Schereschewsky, of the Health Service, in experimenting with malignant tumors in mice and in successfully inoculating chickens with the Rous fowl sarcomas, and in a number of cases curing the artificially developed sarcomas by the action of "an intense electrostatic field, excited by high frequency oscillations," I became convinced that the Public Health Service should aid in making the investigation and report proposed in my bill.

The work in cancer research recently done by the Public Health Service without any specific appropriation for the purpose is, or at least may be, of great value. And let it be observed in passing that the great Public Health Service has never been supplied sufficient appropriations to carry on the important work to which it is most industriously applying itself. For instance, for the current year the service is not given a dollar for the specific purpose of cancer research.

In order to provide that the work contemplated in my bill shall be done by the Public Health Service and the National Academy of Sciences jointly, I shall later offer certain amendments and ask that they be adopted by unanimous consent.

The only effect of the adoption of these amendments will be to have the contemplated work done by the Academy of Sciences and Public Health Service jointly instead of by the National Academy of Sciences alone, and reduce the proposed appropriation from $75,000 to $50,000.

Let me implore the Senate to pass this bill to-day and without a dissenting vote, to the end that the Congress may soon be informed how the Federal Government can assist in solving the cancer problem that is costing the United States almost $800,000,000 a year, destroying more than a hundred thousand lives a year, and inflicting more suffering and agony upon the American people than all the other diseases known to humanity.

During the last Congress we appropriated $10,000,000 to eradicate the corn borer. For the present fiscal year we appropriated for the investigation of tuberculosis and paratuberculosis in animals more than $5,000,000; for meat inspection, more than $2,000,000; for the improvement of cereals, more than $700,000; for the investigation of insects affecting deciduous fruits, vineyards, and nuts, more than $130,000. I favored and supported all of these appropriations, and countless other appropriations of a similar nature.

But in view of our unequaled liberality in protecting our domestic animals against every sort of disease and pest, and in view of the vast expenditures we have made in protecting every species of food-yielding plant and tree, and in further view of the fact that the Government has never yet appropriated a dollar for the particular purpose of combatting cancer, I beg, in the name of all the vast hosts of cancer victims living and dead, for an appropriation that will make it possible for the work of rescuing suffering and perishing humanity from this frightful scourge immediately to begin.

If you should ask what the Public Health Service and the National Academy of Sciences will be able to do with this awful problem, I should answer that, in detail, I do not pretend to know. But the indomitable spirit of Americanism that impelled Grant to say, "I propose to fight it out along this line"; Lawrence to say, "Don't give up the ship"; Hale to say, "I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country"; Webster to say, "Nothing is impossible at Bunker Hill"; that matchless and magnificent American spirit, bold, unterrified, and unafraid, always exalted and glorified by serving the suffering and the distressed, will impel and enable these two great organizations to formulate plans and suggest ways and means to eradicate cancer, the unspeakable horror of horrors, and to save humanity from the greatest tragedy since Calvary; from the greatest curse that has ever been visited upon the children of men.

I now ask unanimous consent for five minutes in which to perfect the amendments and pass this bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEELY. I yield.

Mr. RANSDELL. I want first to say that I have listened with very great interest to the unusually fine speech of the Senator from West Virginia. I think he has made a real contribution to a subject of the greatest national importance, and I sincerely hope the amendment which he proposes to introduce, which, as I understand, will include the Public Health Service along with the Academy of Sciences, may be adopted.

I would like to state that the Committee on Commerce this morning authorized a favorable report on a bill which I had the honor to introduce, Senate bill 3391, to establish and operate a national institute of health, create a system of fellowships in said institute, and to authorize the Government to accept donations for use in ascertaining the cause, prevention, and cure of disease affecting human beings, and for other purposes. The Senator will note that the institute is not limited to any one disease, but takes in all the ills that flesh is heir to. I am delighted to know that the Senator himself is striving so hard to overcome the very worst disease which we have in America to-day, the awful disease of cancer.

I did not hear the Senator mention a very interesting book I read the other day, entitled "The Chemistry of Health," by Professor Green, of Notre Dame University. Among other things, he says in this extremely interesting book, which I commend to all Senators who wish something fine, that cancer is a dietary disease; that it is caused almost entirely by improper diet and improper elimination. He calls attention to the fact that savage peoples do not have cancer; that it is a disease almost entirely of civilization; and that if we would pay proper attention to health we would avoid having this awful disease. I wish the Senator Godspeed in his splendid efforts.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I virtually agreed with a number of Senators that we would allow no legislation to-day. Will the Senator let this matter go until a little later in the day, toward the close of the session? I assure the Senator that I am in full sympathy with his proposal, and if I can assist him in passing the bill to-day or later, I shall do so.

Mr. NEELY. I thank the Senator, and withdraw my request for the present, but I shall vigorously renew it before the end of the day.

Before I take my seat I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an article from the Pathfinder, one of the greatest American periodicals, entitled, "Cancer."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From The Pathfinder, February 26, 1927]

CANCER

Senator NEELY, of West Virginia, has introduced a bill in Congress which would authorize the Government to offer a $5,000,000 prize for a cancer cure. In view of the fact that many monetary rewards—not to speak of the satisfaction in rendering a great service to mankind—already await the first person to demonstrate a successful cure, we are not prepared to say whether such a huge money consideration is advisable.

The Cancer Research Society of Brooklyn, N. Y., has offered a $100,000 prize for some time. A similar amount is posted by Lord Atholston, proprietor of the Montreal Star, and a $50,000 reward has been put up by Sir William Veno of Manchester, England, not to mention the annual Jung prize of $500 for cancer research.

However, we do unhesitatingly commend Mr. NEELY'S desire to interest the Government more in combating this great scourge. He proposes to create a Federal commission to pass on the many claimed "cures." The commission would be made up of three eminent scientists, to be appointed by the President, who have enough public spirit to serve without pay. They would have the power to enlist the aid of one or more Government agencies in trying to solve the cancer problem.

The Government has not given as much attention as it might to the physical ills of mankind. The public, too, has been somewhat indifferent. Mr. NEELY is disappointed that, since the introduction of his bill, "the three so-called great press associations have been so busy informing the country about a mechanical bull fight in New Jersey and other matters of similar importance that they have been unable to give more than passing notice to the matter involved in the proposed legislation." But this is natural.

People have an aversion to harrowing things. That is why the cancer campaign launched at Washington in 1922 with the British ambassador as an active worker received so little public support.

However, the subject merits everyone's consideration. Cancer is a growing menace. Though radium and surgery are popular treatments, there is no proved cure. It has been said that nearly four times as many people died in this country from cancer during the period of the World War as were killed in battle abroad. And the toll is mounting. The cancer death rate grew from 74 per 100,000 in 1911 to 92 per 100,000 in 1924. In 1920 there were 89,000 deaths from the disease. The number last year will probably reach 100,000. There are over 300,000 known cancer patients in this country to-day. One fact is very apparent: The modern style of living contributes to the spread of the disease.

Much has been written about cancer. Theories are many. Each physician seems to have his own pet ideas regarding cause and treatment. The Government could aid materially in collecting and studying this material. Only through such cooperation can a cure for this and other terrible diseases be found.

There is no greater public duty than helping stamp out disease. But physicians as individuals haven't the time or the money to engage in the exhaustive research work that is necessary. The study of any disease, after all, is one of assembling facts. This service the Government is well qualified to perform. For that reason we agree with Mr. NEELY that the United States should be as much a leader in health as in other things.

It is not enough for our experts to announce that there is no known cure for cancer, and to denounce those who claim to help it. It is not enough to urge everybody who has a mole or a wart or any suspicious growth to have it cut out "while there is time." Thousands of poor sufferers have had repeated operations and have had everything done for them which medical science can suggest; they have sacrificed all their savings in the effort to secure relief—but the relief has not come.

It is time that we should have action, and not simply reassuring words or treatments that do not secure results. People are afraid of the very word "smallpox," and yet smallpox claims only a very small percentage of the deaths that cancer does. Smallpox used to be one of the world's great scourges, and it carried off vast numbers of people. But it has been mastered.

In the same way yellow fever, malaria, and many other ills have been conquered or brought under control. All these improvements have been brought about largely through the activities of the Government. We must not expect the Government to do everything for us—but the conservation of the public health is safely within the legitimate sphere. Let the good work go on.

Mr. NEELY subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for just a moment in order to carry out an agreement I had with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] this morning. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3554) to authorize the National Academy of Sciences to investigate the means and methods for affording Federal aid in discovering a cure for cancer, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with amendments:

On page 1, line 7, after the word "practicable," to strike out "a plan for the participation of the Federal Government in eradicating cancer" and insert "the result of such investigation," and in section 2, page 2, line 8, after the words "the sum of," to strike out "$100,000" and insert "$75,000."

Mr. NEELY. I move further to amend the bill.

On page 1, line 3, after the first words "That the," to insert "Public Health Service and the"; in the same line, to strike out "is" and insert "are"; in line 4, after the word "authorized," to insert "jointly"; on page 2, line 1, after the word "cancer," to insert "the result of such investigation"; in line 3, before the words "National Academy," to insert "Public Health Service or the"; in line 5, before the words "National Academy of sciences," to insert "Public Health Service and the"; and in section 2, page 2, line 9, after the words "the sum of," to strike out "$75,000" and insert "$50,000"; in line 10, after the word "to," to strike out "reimburse the National Academy of Sciences for" and insert "defray the" before the word "expenses"; in line 12, after the word "appropriation," to insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary"; in line 14, after the word "vouchers," to insert the word "jointly"; in line 15, before the word "President," to insert "Surgeon General of the Public Health Service and the"; and in the same line, after the word "President," to strike out "or other authorized officer," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Public Health Service and the National Academy of Sciences are hereby authorized jointly to make a thorough investigation of the means and methods whereby the Federal Government may aid in discovering a successful and practical cure for cancer, and to report to Congress as soon as practicable the result of such investigation. It shall be the duty of any executive department or independent establishment of the Government, upon the request of the Public Health Service or the National Academy of Sciences, approved by the President, to lend such assistance and cooperation as may be necessary to enable the Public Health Service and the National Academy of Sciences effectively to carry out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to defray the expenses which may be incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act. Such appropriation, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be disbursed by the disbursing officer of the Treasury Department upon the presentation of vouchers jointly approved by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service and the president of the National Academy of Sciences, and all expenditures from such appropriation shall be audited in the usual manner by the General Accounting Office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments submitted by the Senator from West Virginia to the amendments of the committee will be agreed to, and the amendments of the committee as amended will be agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Public Health Service and the National Academy of Sciences jointly to investigate the means and methods for affording Federal aid in discovering a cure for cancer, and for other purposes."

LOCAL PUBLIC UTILITIES

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to amend the Judicial Code so as to exclude strictly local public utilities from the Federal district courts where such jurisdiction is based solely on diversity of citizenship or on the presence of a Federal question.

These local utilities are created by the State; they are given permission to do business and are accorded special franchise and monopoly privileges by the State or its municipalities.

The source of all their rights and powers is the State, but when their duties are in question the utilities are showing a marked preference for the Federal courts and an antipathy to the jurisdiction of the State courts.

Through its ability to raise the constitutional question, the local public utility has been able to exercise that choice and thereby secure an advantage over the municipalities and residents of the communities wherein they do their business. There is, to my mind, no sound reason why a local public utility should have the advantage of a choice between two systems of law and two sets of judges.

Several recent cases in different parts of the country have brought this question to the forefront of attention. In New York City a local public utility had leased from the city a municipally owned system of local railroad and had in the lease covenanted to charge no more than 5 cents for a ride. In exchange for that 5-cent covenant the city deferred its right to any revenue or rental until after the company had paid all proper charges, maintenance, and interest, and until after the company had secured for itself over $6,000,000 a year. Not until then could the city receive any revenue to reimburse itself for the cost of the construction of the subways or any interest payable by the city on the cost of construction.

Before that contract was entered into between the company and the city a law was duly passed by the State legislature in the nature of an enabling act authorizing the execution of the contract and providing that the contract shall contain terms as to the rate of fare to be charged.

It is well known that that legislation was passed with a view to the contract then in contemplation between the city and the company. Pursuant to this legislative authority the contract of 1913 was executed and that contract provided that the company could charge 5 cents for a ride, and no more. For almost 15 years everyone, including the parties to the litigation, felt that the 5-cent fare in New York was protected by contract. I say that the company itself recognized it, for in 1925 it memorialized the State of New York for remedial legislation on the theory that that body alone could give relief unless the city and the commission consented to "amend the contract."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. My colleague will recall that on the consummation of that contract a great dinner was given to Mayor Gaynor, where all the attorneys for the companies were present, and all rejoiced that there was to be perpetuated in New York a 5-cent fare, everybody in the community was rejoicing over it, including the traction lines themselves.

Mr. WAGNER. Unquestionably, all of the parties to the contract, the public, and the press then asserted that a definite rate of fare has been provided in a definite binding contract.

That was the situation when, on February 1, 1928, the company filed new schedules of fare with the transit commission, and a petition for an increased rate of fare. No decision was announced on this petition until February 14. One hour before that decision was even rendered the company had already filed its bill of complaint in the Federal court. Immediately after the decision the city and the commission instituted injunction suits in the State courts to prevent an increase of fare. But these courts have been ousted of jurisdiction by the order of the Federal court on the ground that the Federal courts had first acquired jurisdiction, although at the time the original bill of complaint was filed no cause of action existed.

I may say without reserve that the people of New York have resented far more this assumption and retention of jurisdiction by the Federal court than its unfavorable decision. The source of friction in this controversy has been jurisdictional. The people rightly feel that the appropriate forum for the litigation of a strictly local issue is the State court; that the proper judges are the State judges, and that the laws enunciated in the State decisions ought to govern.

Briefly, I wish to comment on the opinion. The court has decided that the contract between the company and the city did not mean what it said on its face; that the common intent of the parties at the time of the execution of the contract must be disregarded; that the common understanding of the parties during 15 years of operation under the contract was mistaken; that there must be read into the contract a legislative enactment of 1907, which created a State public service commission with general supervision over utility rates.

By a strained construction the court has held that the contract must be read as if no reference to fare had been made, in spite of the patent fact that the provision of cheap transit facilities for its residents was the primary motive and the primary consideration of the execution of the lease by the city. The special statute which authorized this contract and authorized it to contain fare provisions is blandly waved aside, although enacted subsequent to the public service commission act.

The court has said that the company is entitled to charge a rate which would bring a return of 8 per cent not only on its own property but on the city property as well. Practically, it means that the company has a right to complain not only of the confiscation of its own property but that it has a right to complain of the confiscation of the property belonging to some one else, although the owner of that property is perfectly willing and satisfied.

The court's decision means that the city must be subjected to the vagaries of a valuation for rate making, the very contingency which the contract was intended to avoid. Under the terms of the injunction which the court has granted the powers of a State public service commission with respect to this company have been paralyzed for an indefinite length of time.

With the merits of this particular controversy we can not here deal legislatively. But I believe there is genuine merit in resisting the jurisdiction of the Federal court in such cases. The resentment springs from a democratic love of local self-government and self-rule. It gives expression of a widely held belief that the Federal courts are trespassing upon what ought to be the domain of the States.

It can be readily demonstrated that the greatest offender against the principle of local self-rule has been not the executive nor the legislative branch of the Government but the judicial. The Federal courts have been most aggressive in the steady encroachment of Federal power upon the sovereignty of the States.

No one wants to deprive a local utility company of its constitutional rights, and I have no desire to limit its right of access to the United States Supreme Court when its constitutional rights are violated or endangered, but there is no reason why local issues should not be first fully litigated in the State court and taken to the Supreme Court by way of the highest court of the State.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SACKETT in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Will the Senator tell us whether the State courts of New York follow the rule that was laid down by the Federal court in this case?

Mr. WAGNER. On the question of confiscation?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. Oh, yes. The great controversy in this particular case, if I may answer the Senator further, is whether or not the contract made between the utility company and the city of New York, providing for a rate of fare, is a binding contract or not. The contract was entered into as a result of a special enactment of the legislature authorizing the municipality and the public utility to enter into the particular contract in question and providing in the legislation that they provide and stipulate the rate of fare to be charged. It could not, it seems to me, be stated more definitely than that. Nobody believed at the time the law of 1913 was enacted that there was any question but that a specific delegation of power was granted to the municipality to enter into the contract, with a direction for the inclusion of a provision for a specific rate of fare to be exacted.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The point I wanted to get at for my own information was this, and I am not asking this at all in any spirit of contention: Did the State courts of New York, in cases of public utilities having in their franchise or contract agreed upon the rate of fare, follow the rule that those prices are not binding when the company is no longer able to make a return?

Mr. WAGNER. They have, of course, inquired into the question of the reasonableness of the rate, and that determines the question of whether there is confiscation or not.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I am speaking of contract rates. I do not want to take the Senator's time and I am really sorry I interrupted him. There is a long line of decisions, of course, holding, where a company comes into a city and secures a franchise, which is, of course, a contract, and in that franchise its rates are specified, that if it is found the company can not make money it may raise its rate in violation of its contract and still hold its franchise. That is a doctrine from which I have the temerity to differ. But I was inquiring whether the same doctrine obtains in the State courts of New York as evidently was applied in the Federal court in the case to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. WAGNER. That precise question has not, so far as I know, been decided by our courts. I do not want to prolong the discussion unduly, but there is a distinction even between the cases the Senator cites and this case which I have been discussing in the fact that there was a special act passed by our legislature delegating to the municipality the power to enter into a contract, with a direction to fix the rate of fare. The general statutes of 1907, giving general supervisory power by a public service commission over rates, I contend, can not be read into these particular contracts as an implied provision.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I thank the Senator, and apologize for leaving the Chamber at this moment, as I am compelled to do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am at a loss to know how the Federal court acquired jurisdiction of this case. Was it on the ground of diverse citizenship, or because it is a foreign corporation, or on account of the amount involved, or how was it?

Mr. WAGNER. It was upon the ground that there is a Federal question involved, the Federal question being the alleged confiscation of the property of the public-utility company, and therefore in violation of the due process of law clause of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WAGNER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the effect of the bill which the Senator has introduced, it is to exclude utility corporations alone from the Federal jurisdiction under section 24 of the Judicial Code?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; those engaged in intrastate activities.

In a recent case closely related to the one I have discussed, so far as underlying theories of government are concerned, Mr. Justice Holmes wrote a brilliant dissenting opinion, concurred in by Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Stone. I shall quote but a few sentences from that opinion:

> If I am right, the fallacy has resulted in an unconstitutional assumption of powers by the courts of the United States, which no lapse of time or respectable array of opinion should make us hesitate to correct. * * * But this question is deeper than that; it is a question of the authority by which certain particular acts, here the grant of exclusive privileges in a railroad station, are governed. In my opinion the authority, and only authority, is the State; and if that be so, the voice adopted by the State as its own should utter the last word. * * * I should have supposed that what arrangements could or could not be made for the use of a piece of land was a purely local question, on which, if on anything, the State should have its own way and the State courts should be taken to declare what the State wills. (Black & White Taxi v. Brown Yellow Taxicab, opinion No. 174, October, 1927.)

This is sound American doctrine. It is a matter of regret that it occurs in a dissenting opinion rather than a prevailing one. But what the court felt that it could not do by reason of precedent it is in the power of the legislature to do, and the bill that I have proposed to-day is intended to carry that out. That bill will in no wise interfere with the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in interstate matters, nor with railroad receiverships, nor with any of the other numerous matters properly cognizable in the Federal courts. But it will keep local controversies over local matters between utilities and municipalities and commissions out of the Federal courts and will bring them into the State courts, where they most appropriately belong.

The bill (S. 4491) to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended, with respect to the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States over suits brought by or against public-utility corporations, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ACOMA PUEBLO INDIANS

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, on April 24 last House bill 11479, to reserve certain lands on the public domain in Valencia County, N. Mex., for the use and benefit of the Acoma Indians, passed the Senate. The following day my colleague [Mr. CUTTING] entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill and moved that the House be requested to return the bill to the Senate. The bill was returned from the House. I now move that the motion so entered by my colleague be laid on the table, in order that the passage of the bill may stand.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

TAX REDUCTION

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to reduce and equalize taxation, provide revenue, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SACKETT in the chair). The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND].

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to permit men in the professions to do what men in the trades are permitted to do if they go to conventions.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. What amendment is this?

Mr. COPELAND. It is the amendment to the tax bill which I presented, which is the pending amendment.

Mr. BORAH. What became of the other amendment that was pending?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was good enough to yield to me, because I am under the necessity of leaving the Senate in a short time. The amendment is the one which I am now describing, which is designed to permit a physician to deduct his expense incurred in attending a convention, just the same as an executive or one who is in a trade may do under the present conditions. For some reason or other the department has ruled against physicians doing that.

I do not care to argue the matter, if the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah can not accept the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	George	McMaster	Shipstead
Barkley	Gerry	McNary	Shortridge
Bayard	Gillett	Mayfield	Simmons
Black	Glass	Metcalf	Smith
Blaine	Goff	Moses	Smoot
Borah	Greene	Neely	Steck
Bratton	Hale	Norbeck	Steiwer
Brookhart	Harris	Norris	Stephens
Broussard	Harrison	Nye	Swanson
Bruce	Hawes	Oddie	Thomas
Capper	Hayden	Overman	Tydings
Caraway	Heflin	Phipps	Tyson
Copeland	Howell	Pittman	Vandenberg
Couzens	Johnson	Ransdell	Wagner
Curtis	Jones	Reed, Mo.	Walsh, Mass.
Cutting	Kendrick	Reed, Pa.	Walsh, Mont.
Deneen	King	Robinson, Ark.	Warren
Dill	La Follette	Sackett	Waterman
Fess	Locher	Schall	Watson
Fletcher	McKellar	Sheppard	Wheeler

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment, so far as my submitting it is concerned, is to permit physicians who attend meetings of their national societies to deduct the expenses incurred in attending such meetings so as to have that much reduction in their income tax. It is a very interesting thing that the Board of Tax Appeals in the appeal of Alexander Silverman in support of its finding that the travel expense of a chemist incurred in attending meetings of chemical organizations is deductible said:

> As the head of the department of chemistry it was expected of and incumbent on him as such to keep abreast in his particular field of work and in touch with other scientists in the same field, which was done, among other ways, by the preparation and publication of papers, by the reading of technical periodicals, and by the attendance at such conventions where subjects of a scientific nature were presented and discussed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. A physician has exactly the same right that a chemist has. If a physician is engaged in a work that properly belongs to his duties as a physician, then he can deduct his expenses just the same as can the chemist when he is engaged in work in his particular line. That is not, however, what the Senator's amendment seeks to provide.

Mr. COPELAND. Neither is that the interpretation of the Board of Tax Appeals. Now let the Senator listen to this——

Mr. SMOOT. The case to which the Senator has referred has no reference whatever to his amendment; it is another case entirely. The Senator's amendment provides that where a physician makes a trip to attend a national convention he may deduct his expenses for that trip.

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the same as the case of the chemist to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. COPELAND. I think it is exactly the case, according to the opinion from which I have read.

Mr. SMOOT. I know it is not.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me read it again.

Mr. SMOOT. What the Senator has read says that there may be deducted expenses incurred in the line of the profession of the chemist. The National Education Association, the American Bar Association, the various engineering societies, the various societies of accountants, the societies of chemists, the societies of druggists, and of the architects in the United States hold their conventions in different parts of the country, but in not one of those cases is a member attending such convention allowed a dollar for expenses in attending the convention, and neither is a physician.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, the Senator thinks that they should not be allowed to deduct such expenses?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly not. If a physician incurs an expense in the line of his profession, then he is allowed to deduct that expense, but attendance on conventions is not in line with his actual work; and, therefore, the department has held that he can not deduct such expense. The same ruling has been made with respect to all the associations to which I have referred, and there is not one of them but holds an annual convention, just as the physicians do.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator for what he has said, and I will attempt to show him that the department has discriminated. It is true, of course, that the department has refused to make these allowances as regards these various professions in most instances; but here is a case where they did not. Now, listen to this; and the medical profession asks merely that it shall be placed on the same footing as all other professions.

Mr. SMOOT. I asked the department if there was any discrimination that they knew of, and I was told that there was none that they knew of, and that with the bill as it is the physicians will be on exactly the same footing as the chemists, the lawyers, the accountants, the engineers, the druggists, and all of the professions holding their annual conventions.

Mr. VANDENBERG. How about newspaper men?

Mr. SMOOT. The same thing applies to newspaper men.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Utah ever heard about the man who was in jail, arrested for something?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I remember reading it when I was a boy.

Mr. COPELAND. All right. The Senator will recall that his lawyer said, "Why, you can not be put in jail for this," and the man replied, "But I am in jail."

Mr. BLAINE. He used stronger language than that.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; he did; but there are friends in the galleries, and we want to preserve the conventions as far as we can.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like very much to have the Senator point out the case, and I will take it up with the Treasury Department, because I am assured by the Treasury Department that there has been no case of discrimination.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the junior Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. My information is—and I think we can differentiate the general cases to which the Senator refers from the one I am about to speak of—that there has been a ruling that in a particular case where a chemist was employed and part of his employment for which he was paid by his employer was to attend the meetings of one or more organizations for the discussion of the particular work in which his employer was engaged, in that instance, where that was one of the essentials of his employment, his expenses in attending these particular meetings were permitted as deductions. But take, for instance, the lawyers, the engineers, the newspaper men, and many of the professions. The lawyers attend the bar associations in their own States. They attend the National Bar Association. They have gone to Europe upon one occasion to attend a great international gathering of the lawyers. They did it not as a part of their employment by any particular client, and they were not permitted to deduct their expenses under such circumstances. The same thing is true with a doctor. If a doctor was employed by a hospital and it was a part of his employment that he should attend the gatherings of the hospital organizations throughout the United States, I am inclined to think that under the present law he would be entitled as a deduction to his expenses in attending those organizations.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to my colleague that there is no question but that he would.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to what the junior Senator from Utah has said; and once more I am reminded of the naturalist who said, "A lobster is a red fish that walks backward." A lobster is not red; it is not a fish; and it does not walk backward.

The facts in the case stated by the junior Senator from Utah are these:

> The petitioner attended like conventions prior to 1921, did so again in 1921, and has since so attended, such action on his part being expected and necessary, as it was of others similarly employed at the university, for the purpose of keeping thoroughly informed in his field of work and in touch with other scientists, and in order to advance the interests of the university, though his contract of employment does not specifically make mention of any such activities, and there was no provision made for repayment to him of expenses so incurred.

Mr. SMOOT. I am aware of the case. I know the doctor to whom the Senator refers; and I know that the doctor has been told that if he would come down to the Treasury Department they would be perfectly willing to reopen the case and go into every detail, and let him prove that it was in the line of his profession.

Mr. COPELAND. Why should it be necessary for the physician to make proof of the importance of attending this convention?

Mr. SMOOT. Everybody who makes any kind of a return at all and claims any kind of an exemption has to make proof of it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I wish I could argue this matter with any other Senator in this body than my friend, the senior Senator from Utah. I am going to have a visit with him some day and find out why it is that he does not like doctors.

Mr. SMOOT. I do like doctors; but I do not like doctors so well that I think they ought to be treated differently from any other profession.

Mr. COPELAND. I fear the Senator would not even have them treated as well as some other professions.

Mr. SMOOT. Some of the closest friends I have in the world are doctors.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to talk to them.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there is not a feeling in my soul against the doctor as a doctor; but I do not want him to be treated differently than any other American citizen as to exemptions from the payment of taxes.

Mr. COPELAND. I have to say to the Senator from Utah that no Senator on this floor has been kinder to me than he has been, but I sometimes wonder if he did not forgive me for being a doctor rather than be kind to me simply because I am one.

Now, let us go into the merits of the case.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator to yield to me for the purpose of making this statement:

As we all know, nearly every year the accomplished and ambititous doctor at his own expense goes to these conventions, and frequently goes to colleges and takes postgraduate courses, in order to keep up with his profession, so that he may be able to give to humankind the best service of which he is capable. In thus preparing himself to aid his fellow man it does seem to me that we ought to credit him with those expenses on his taxable income.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator think we ought to do it with the doctor and not with the members of the National Education Association, the American Bar Association, the engineers, the architects, the chemists, and the druggists? They have just as many meetings as the physicians have.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps so.

Mr. SMOOT. They go just as far, and their expenses are just as much.

Mr. McKELLAR. But their missions are different, and I think there is a difference between them. We might include other classes, and that might well be done; but, at the same time, I think that class of our professional men who come nearest to the people in their lives and homes and families, especially in sickness, ought to be encouraged in every way to keep up with the advances in science; and I think they might well be encouraged by the Government to the extent of allowing them a credit on their incomes for the expenses to which reference has been made.

Mr. SMOOT. They go there to keep abreast of the times, simply because it is an advantage to them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no!

Mr. SMOOT. It is an advantage to them, the same as it is to an attorney or any one else.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, it is an advantage to them. I think we have a great many physicians in this country who take a pride in their profession, however, and want to be in a position to do the best they can for humanity, without regard to their pecuniary interest.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is so.

Mr. McKELLAR. And I think the Government ought to aid them to this extent.

Mr. SMOOT. That also happens with school-teachers, professors, attorneys, and all of the other classes. What applies to one class applies to all.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I can not agree with the Senator that this has the same application with reference to an attorney. I do not think he occupies the same important place socially that the physician does.

Mr. SMOOT. No; but I say that his object in going to conventions is to improve himself and keep up to date, just exactly the same as the physician does.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator if it is not true that physicians do more charity work than every other body of professional men combined?

Mr. SMOOT. I could not say that.

Mr. McKELLAR. They certainly do a great deal of charity work.

Mr. CARAWAY. If a physician passes anybody on the road who is injured or sick, the ethics of his profession compels him, as I understand, to render whatever aid he can.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know that his training does.

Mr. SMOOT. And he sends his bill for it, too.

Mr. COPELAND. I see now where the trouble is.

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is not it at all. He has a right to send his bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. He has no way of knowing whether a man will ever be able to pay him or not. I have observed that he is the most willing to take a chance. I have practiced law a bit; and when some client employs me, before I put out much labor in his behalf I ascertain what the rewards are going to be. A doctor can not wait for anything of that kind. Life and death is at stake; and every one of us that breathes has at some time owed his existence to the action of a physician.

Mr. SMOOT. In a case like that, if he is called to the next city or if he is called anywhere, and it is in the line of his business, then he is granted the deduction.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am fully aware of that. What I was trying to say—possibly not happily saying—was that there is a difference between a physician and his attitude toward his profession and that of a lawyer, for instance, that the Senator names, or an architect. I am sure that every other profession has time to investigate and determine whether or not it is advantageous to act. A physician must hold himself always ready to do his duty. I have never known one who did not respond to the call of humanity; and inasmuch as he does that, it would seem that he might have this advantage, without any other profession having the same right.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I promised to yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I understand, under the present law if a physician goes to some medical college during the course of a special term or for two or three months he would be entitled to deduct the expense incurred in such trip or in such course from his income tax; would he not?

Mr. SMOOT. In a case like that, where he goes off for education, under existing law he would not be allowed to deduct his expenses for the three months; but if he is called on a case in a neighboring city or State or any part of the United States and goes there in the line of his profession, then he can deduct the amount.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course.

Mr. SMOOT. And so can all the others.

Mr. BARKLEY. If a physician, even in middle life, takes two or three months in the year to go off and better prepare himself to minister to the wants of humanity, I think he ought to be allowed to deduct that in the computation of his income tax, because it is a part of the expense of his profession. If he goes to a medical society, he does not go there for the purpose of enjoying social activities. He goes in the interest of his profession, to acquaint himself better with the developments of medicine, and not necessarily as a money-making proposition. Even if it were, however, it seems to me that expense ought to be computed in determining what his net income is at the end of the year.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that is a much more meritorious proposition than the one the Senator from New York has offered. The Senator from New York is proposing that wherever a physician is called anywhere in the line of duty, he is to deduct those expenses.

Mr. COPELAND. That is not what I am trying to do at all.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what the Senator's amendment means.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would the Senator support an amendment permitting him to deduct expenses incurred in attending meetings of medical societies?

Mr. SMOOT. That is not in line of duty.

Mr. BARKLEY. Who is to determine whether it is in line of duty or not? It is in the line of his profession.

Mr. SMOOT. He goes to those conventions not in line of duty. He does not go there to attend any one of the conventions. He goes there on a vacation, as it is sometimes called.

He goes there for the purpose of better preparing himself to practice his profession, whether for selfish purposes or for the benefit of humanity, and it is a part of the expenses of his profession.

So does the attorney, so does the chemist, so does the accountant, so does the engineer, and so do all these men who go to these conventions.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I will go on with what I have to say. I think I see a glimmer of hope. The Senator from Utah intimates that if a deduction is for the purpose of paying the expenses incurred in attendance upon a medical society meeting, he is in favor of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is not?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am not.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Utah thinks the physician is like Minerva, that he sprang from the brain of Jove, full panoplied and perfect in every respect.

Mr. SMOOT. No more than an attorney is born in the same way, and from the same source, or a chemist, or a druggist, or any professional man.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not know anything about the practice of law, and I am not talking about any other profession, but I say that I can tell whether a doctor is a good doctor or a poor doctor by finding out whether he attends his medical society meetings or not.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say this: That I know some doctors who attend those medical society meetings who never will be good doctors, and others are men of renown the world over. You could not make those two men equal if there was a convention every week.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well; but I will say this to the Senator: That the man who is renowned is the man who goes.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not any doubt about that.

Mr. COPELAND. And he profits by it.

Mr. SMOOT. They all go.

Mr. COPELAND. No; they do not all go. Where would there be a convention hall or a town big enough to contain all the doctors if they all went?

Mr. SMOOT. They do not all go at one time, of course.

Mr. COPELAND. I am not going to split hairs with the Senator. He is in opposition to this proposal, but I want to say that any doctor who is worth while, who is seeking to acquaint himself with the progress made in his profession, who wants to know what the new procedures are, those things which will help to shorten disease and to relieve pain, and to stand off the awful day of death, goes to the medical society meetings. The man who goes to those meetings is the sort of man who acquires such knowledge.

Mr. SMOOT. I say to the Senator that the imposition of the tax proposed here would not stand in the way of such a man going to a convention any more than it would prevent an attorney or any of the other professional men. The men who go there go for a certain purpose, and that is an educational purpose, whether it be a druggist, or an accountant, or a doctor, or any other professional man. He goes there for that purpose, and if one is treated differently from another, there will be a discrimination. I can not see it any other way.

Mr. COPELAND. Does not the Senator see any difference in that respect between a physician and an architect?

Mr. SMOOT. Not as to the educational feature.

Mr. COPELAND. I am not referring so much to the educational feature, but to the return to society.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there may be a degree of difference, but the principle is the same.

Mr. COPELAND. The principle may be the same.

Mr. SMOOT. Just the same as it could not be possible to have every man in the profession equal, but the object of everyone who goes to these conventions is exactly the same; they go for the same purpose.

Mr. GERRY. I wonder if the Senator from New York could give us his amendment now. Some of us have come into the Chamber since it was introduced.

Mr. COPELAND. I take pleasure in handing the amendment to the Senator.

I think there is a great distinction between what society receives from the increase in the boundaries of knowledge on the part of the architect, on the one hand, and the increase of knowledge on the part of the physician. I do not, of course, sneer at beautiful architecture. Nothing promotes the finer senses more. But when we come to deal with the human body, with disease, with human suffering, the prolongation of life, who can question that the physician has a part to play which, in my humble opinion, few other professions have?

In the next place, go out and ask the average man on the street about it. He wants his doctor to be a good doctor, and he is made a better doctor by going to these society meetings and having contact with physicians from every part of the country and from every part of the world, and the man in the street says, "I want him."

Mr. SMOOT. They want a good lawyer, too.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand it, the idea of the Senator from New York is that this is educational.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes, educational; but it is a form of education that is beneficial not alone to the man educated, but to all those with whom he comes in contact.

Mr. BORAH. When I think of what we are going to learn at Kansas City, I think the delegates to Kansas City ought to have the privilege of deducting their expenses.

Mr. COPELAND. I would say that as regards Kansas City, every man who goes ought to be paid a bonus out of the Treasury; a very liberal amount.

Mr. BORAH. It begins to look like some of them will be paid a bonus from some source.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, I have nothing to say about that. This amendment in a different form was presented by the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. I am sorry he is not here, since I am fighting his battle. It has been sent out all over the country, and there is not a Member of the Senate who has not received dozens of letters from the medical profession asking that this relief be given.

Mr. SMOOT. Thousands of them.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes, thousands of them; and it should be done. I do not know that there are any words one can use to change the decision of the Senate; I doubt if anything can be done. But I hope that this amendment, either in the form in which I have presented it or in some other form which carries out its spirit, may be adopted by the Senate. I am satisfied to let the matter come to a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], and in his absence I am compelled to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WHEELER. I have a pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING], which I transfer to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD] to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and let my vote stand.

Mr. COPELAND (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. COPELAND. I have a pair with the Senator from New Jersey, which I transfer to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], and let my vote stand.

Mr. BRATTON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. I am told that he would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On this measure I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent. I promised to take care of him on this vote, and therefore I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE]; and

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. WATSON. My colleague [Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote for this amendment.

The result was announced—yeas 59, nays 13, as follows:

So Mr. COPELAND'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, as I announced a little while ago, I am forced to leave the Senate in a very few minutes. I send to the desk an amendment which I offer and ask to have reported. I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in charge of the bill, will accept it.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the amendment if the word "President" is inserted instead of the words "Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. COPELAND. I have made that change.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 105, after line 25, insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 121. INTERNATIONAL BRIDGES.

In the case of income derived from the operation of a bridge between the United States and a contiguous foreign country, the President is authorized to enter into an agreement in respect of any taxable year with the proper authorities of such foreign country, making an equitable apportionment as between the United States and such foreign country of the income and deductions allocable to the operation of such bridge. If such agreement is entered into, the tax imposed by this title in respect of such income for such year shall be considered to be the tax based on the net income as computed under such agreement. Any tax computed under the section shall not be reduced by any credit as provided in section 131 (relating to the credit for foreign taxes).

Mr. COPELAND. The amendment relates primarily to the international bridge from Buffalo to Canada and was written originally to apply to it, but there is a bridge to be built between Detroit and Windsor and other international bridges will be built, so it was thought wise to have general legislation.

The purpose of it is to prevent our country from taxing all the income of the bridge company and then Canada in her turn taxing all the income likewise. With regard to the international bridge at Buffalo, Canada has agreed to tax only half of the tolls, but in this case the amendment provides that the President may make such an agreement, and I assume the Senator in charge of the bill will be glad to accept it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to object to the amendment in view of the change from "Secretary of the Treasury" to "President." It is in effect authorizing the President to enter into an agreement with a foreign country; and as it relates to this particular matter and to a question of taxation, I shall not object to it.

But I do want to take this opportunity to say that I think the Senate ought to be much more vigilant in the future than it has been in the past with reference to these Executive agreements. There is a wide range of Executive agreements being made in these last years which have the effect of treaties. In my opinion most of those agreements ought to have come to the Senate for ratification. But, inasmuch as this is a tax matter, and perhaps, by reason of the nature of the peculiar situation the authorization can be justified, I trust it will not be considered as a precedent for any extension of the authority.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6104) to amend sections 57 and 61 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 2148. An act to fix standards for hampers, round stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes;

S. 3057. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer and convey to the Portland Water District, a municipal corporation, the water pipe line including the submarine water main connecting Fort McKinley, Me., with the water system of the Portland Water District, and for other purposes;

H. R. 9568. An act to authorize the purchase at private sale of a tract of land in Louisiana, and for other purposes;

H. R. 11133. An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 12286. An act making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

PRESERVATION OF OLD CAPITOL

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, the necessity for immediate action will be my excuse for asking in a moment for unanimous consent to consider a concurrent resolution which I shall send to the desk.

There is a condemnation proceeding now going on in the city of Washington to condemn, among other properties, squares 727 and 728. The purpose of the particular condemnation is to acquire a site for a new building to house the Supreme Court of the United States and its activities. It transpires that on square 728 stands one of the most historic buildings in America. It was the Capitol of this Nation from 1815 to 1819. The Congress met there during those years. President Monroe was inaugurated there as President of the United States. The first real feeling of solidarity of the American Republic found its birth in that building. It ushered in what was known as an era of good feeling. We had come out of the second war with the British Empire. The feeling of sectional differences had very largely disappeared. There was a consciousness of a nationality that America had not felt up to that time. The Monroe doctrine and much of our legislation that we look upon as fundamental found its birthplace there.

In addition to being the Capitol of the country, it has been the scene of very many historic occurrences. It has been not only a capitol but it has been a prison, and from it Mrs. Surratt went to the gallows. There is hardly anything connected with American history, commencing in 1815 and down until quite recently, that did not have something in common with this site.

Either the States or patriotic societies have preserved every building that housed this Government from its foundation. The old Independence Hall at Philadelphia, the building in which the Congress met in the city of New York, the building in which the Continental Congress sat at York, Pa., the building at Annapolis which at one time sheltered the Government, have all been preserved as national shrines. This building, one of the most historic, the one that gave birth to real America, standing here in the National Capital, is now to be torn down in order to house a department of the Government. Near it the Government of the United States owns land, both north and south of the building, much better located for the purposes for which it is proposed to use this particular square.

Unless the concurrent resolution which I shall introduce, or something in its nature, shall pass before the Congress adjourns, when we come back here next December we will have committed this desecration. I feel that the Congress does not want to do it. Therefore, I am going to introduce the concurrent resolution asking merely that the matter be held up until we reconvene in December, to see if we can devise some means to preserve this historic building. I have spoken to the leader on the majority side, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the leader on the minority side, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and quite a number of other Senators, and there seems to be no objection to it. Therefore, I send it to the desk to be read, and I shall ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think it is in order to ask the Senator a question. Is this particular building in one of the blocks that are proposed for the location of the Supreme Court?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is true. The concurrent resolution deals with blocks 727 and 728, because block 727 would not be large enough for the purpose. It will take both of them for the purpose for which they are intended to be used. Therefore, I am merely asking that the condemnation of blocks 727 and 728 be held up until we can have time to reconsider the question.

Mr. WARREN. If it were intended to ask for action to-day other than merely to delay the matter, I should expect to oppose it, of course, because we have made an appropriation of $1,500,000 for the purchase of the property in order to locate the Supreme Court there.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not think we have purchased any of it. Condemnation proceedings are now pending for all that ground. I do not think the Government has invested a dollar except in its condemnation proceedings. I am only asking that we hold them up until we can come back here in December and investigate the whole question.

I now ask that the concurrent resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the concurrent resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the concurrent resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Arkansas. I heard him refer to the resolution as a concurrent resolution.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to suggest to the Senator that, while it might have the effect desired, to have any legal effect it seems to me the resolution ought to be a joint resolution instead of a concurrent resolution. In the form of a concurrent resolution it would not have the force of law, because it would not be sent to the President, as would a joint resolution, and it would not receive the signature of the President. Therefore, while the officials might stop the proceedings—they have commenced lawsuits, they have started in on the project under the law which was passed—it might be embarrassing for them to stop them.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have no objection to changing it to a joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest to the Senator that he make it a joint resolution instead of a concurrent resolution.

Mr. CARAWAY. Very well. I will ask unanimous consent that the resolution be changed from a concurrent to a joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the form of the resolution will be changed as requested.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 156) to stay proceedings for the condemnation of squares 727 and 728 in the District of Columbia was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas condemnation proceedings are now pending to condemn squares 727 and 728, lying north of East Capitol Street and east of First Street facing the Capitol; and

Whereas on square 728 stands a building that next to the Capitol and Mount Vernon is one of the most historic in America; and

Whereas it has been asserted that had it not been for this building the Capitol would have been removed from the District of Columbia after the British had destroyed the Capitol Building in 1814; and

Whereas the Congress convened in said building from 1815 to 1819, and President Monroe was inaugurated there in 1817; and

Whereas other historic events occurred within said building and are associated with it; and

Whereas it has been both a capitol and a prison, scenes of revelry and tragedy, and connected with it many other historical events; and

Whereas every building that has been used as a Capitol of this Republic since its founding, including Independence Hall and the one at York, Pa., the one at New York City, and the one at Annapolis, has been preserved by patriotic people in the interest of history and sentiment; and

Whereas this building now standing in the Capital of this Nation and so long used as our Capitol during the most critical times of our Republic is now threatened to be torn down to use the site for a building for the Supreme Court: Therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That no further proceedings shall be taken for the condemnation by the United States, as a site for a building for the Supreme Court, of squares 727 and 728 in the District of Columbia, as such squares appear on the records of the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia until the Congress shall by law direct the acquisition of such squares for such sites.

SEC. 2. If such squares are at any time acquired by the United States, the buildings thereon shall not be destroyed, but shall be removed by the United States to some other site.

Mr. CARAWAY. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

BOULDER DAM—SENATOR SMOOT

Mr. ASHURST. I ask the Secretary to read from the desk an article from the Graham County (Ariz.) Guardian. The Graham County Guardian is one of the leading Democratic newspapers in the State of Arizona.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From Graham County (Ariz.) Guardian]

ARIZONA'S GRATITUDE TO SENATOR SMOOT

Arizona citizens owe a deep debt of gratitude and appreciation to Senator REED SMOOT, of Utah, for his masterly argument against the Johnson Boulder Canyon Dam bill before the Senate. He gave valuable and impressive aid to the forces of Arizona in their hour of greatest need.

Senator SMOOT takes his place alongside Governor Dern, of Utah, in the affection of the people of Arizona. Governor Dern also has been Arizona's friend in this long-drawn-out fight in which our State is engaging in a desperate effort to retain her natural interest in the resources of the Colorado River.

Senator SMOOT is recognized as one of the most powerful and influential Members of the United States Senate. He is chairman of the all-powerful Finance Committee. In his long term of service, Senator SMOOT has builded a reputation as one of the greatest leaders in that body. His ability is outstanding; his integrity is unquestioned; his patriotism has been proven over and over to be of the highest order.

It is interesting to recall to memory that a very determined effort was made to prevent Senator SMOOT from taking his seat in the Senate in 1907.

Disbarment was sought on the grounds that he was disqualified because of his religion. Senator SMOOT was then, and is now, a prominent member of the Mormon Church.

Fortunately for the good name of America, the movement to unseat Senator SMOOT because of his religion was defeated. Thus a man who has proven to be one of the greatest Senators in the history of that body was preserved for a life of usefulness to the Nation.

Succeeding years have demonstrated the hollowness of the claims which were made in 1907 by proving that Senator SMOOT's religious affiliations have not interfered with the discharge of his duties as a Member of the Senate of the United States.

Religious intolerance has not entirely disappeared, however, and to-day we find in America opposition expressed toward a candidate for the Presidency because of his religious views.

Such intolerance is as foreign to American ideals and traditions to-day as it was in the case of Senator SMOOT, of Utah, back in 1907.

TAX REDUCTION

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to reduce and equalize taxation, provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think it was understood when I agreed that my amendment might be laid aside that its consideration should follow the disposition of the amendment suggested by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND].

Mr. FLETCHER. That is quite true, Mr. President; but I spoke to the Senator from Nebraska about it, assuring him that my amendment would take only a minute or two, whereas his amendment will probably lead to considerable debate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think my amendment will lead to some controversy.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think my amendment may be disposed of in five minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the amendment proposed by me may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 206, after line 2, it is proposed to insert the following:

Subdivision 5 of schedule A of Title VIII of the revenue act of 1926 is amended to read:

"Passage ticket, one way or round trip, for each passenger, sold or issued in the United States for passage by any vessel to a port or place not in the United States, Canada, Mexico, or Cuba, if costing not exceeding $30, $1; costing more than $30 and not exceeding $60, $3; costing more than $60, $5. This subdivision shall not apply to passage tickets costing $10 or less, and shall take effect on the expiration of 30 days after the enactment of this act."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I understand, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida simply inserts the word "Cuba"?

Mr. FLETCHER. It merely proposes to insert the word "Cuba" in the present law, so as to include Cuba along with Canada and Mexico.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask consent to insert in the RECORD a couple of letters on the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters are as follows:

THE MEARS TOURS,
Tampa, Fla., December 10, 1925.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I thank you for yours of the 8th instant, with copy of letter from Hon. D. H. Blair, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with reference to the matter of the difference in the stamp tax imposed on tickets from Port Tampa and Key West to Habana.

I have for quite a long time been under the impression that it would be necessary to have the law changed to get the relief desired, since the commissioner has not only ruled as mentioned in his letter, but that if a person buys a ticket to Key West and then buys a ticket from Key West to Habana, and uses the same steamer on the same day he arrives in Key West, he must pay the same tax as if he had bought a through ticket from Port Tampa to Habana.

In view of the fact that there is no tax on steamship tickets from the United States to points in Canada and Mexico, and Cuba is in a way our "ward," it would seem that our Government would do well to remove the stamp tax on tickets to that country; but if that can not be done, then Port Tampa and Key West ought to be put on an equal basis. While I am not positive, I feel reasonably certain that there is not a case in the United States, other than from Port Tampa, where a ship on a regular passenger run to a foreign country stops at another point in the United States, after having begun the trip, before sailing for the foreign port. If the ships from here sailed directly to Habana, there might be some excuse for imposing a higher stamp tax, but in view of the fact that there is always a call at Key West, where the ship is cleared by the customs and immigration officials, it seems very unjust that we are compelled to pay the full $3 tax whether we buy directly to Habana or whether we buy from Port Tampa to Key West and then from Key West to Habana, especially when one is required to pay but $1 tax if his ticket is from Chicago or elsewhere to Habana via Key West if he arrives in Key West by any route other than by steamer from Port Tampa. It would be just as equitable to assess the passenger from Chicago (who travels via rail to Key West and thence by steamer to Habana) with a tax on the purchase price of his ticket for the entire journey as it is to make the passenger from or via Port Tampa and Key West on the steamer to do so.

The present law greatly discriminates against this port.

Comparatively speaking, I am sure the amount of revenue received by the Government from the tax on tickets to Cuba is not great, especially since almost all of the people in Cuba traveling to the United States who expect to return within six months buy round-trip tickets, from Habana, and on these, of course, our Government collects no revenue. Therefore to do away with this tax entirely would not mean the loss of much revenue.

Yours very truly,

JAMES E. MEARS, Manager.

THE PENINSULAR & OCCIDENTAL STEAMSHIP CO., ACCOUNTING DEPARTMENT,
Jacksonville, Fla., October 31, 1927.

Hon. D. U. FLETCHER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The newspapers announce that the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives will begin the preliminary work to write a new tax bill. The transportation lines are very much interested in having eliminated from the new bill paragraph No. 5 of Schedule "A," stamp taxes, of the bill approved February 26, 1926, which reads as follows:

"5. Passage ticket, one way or round trip, for each passenger, sold or issued in the United States for passage by any vessel to a port or place not in the United States, Canada, or Mexico, if costing not exceeding $30, $1; costing more than $30 and not exceeding $60, $2; costing more than $60, $5. This subdivision shall not apply to passage tickets costing $10 or less."

Most of the other stamp taxes were eliminated when the present bill was written, and thanks to your assistance, the bill that first passed the Congress had taken this element of tax out of the old bill, but when it was rewritten in conference it appeared again. At present it is more obnoxious than in the previous bill because it is one of the very few items of stamp tax in existence. It is particularly trying on the traveling public and the transportation people in applying it through the Florida ports in view of the Internal Revenue Bureau's decision that the entire ocean proportion from Port Tampa to Habana is taxable. Hence tickets reading Key West to Habana are taxable $1, while tickets reading Port Tampa to Habana are taxable $3. It is confusing both to all the ticket agents of the United States and the traveling public, and on each voyage of our ships there is a controversy and explanation relative to the collection of this tax which places it in line as the most aggravating nuisance tax.

If you can find time to do so, and you agree with us that this element of tax should be eliminated, we will consider it a great favor if you would bring this to the attention of the committee writing the revision. In the event that we are successful in having this item of the new bill eliminated it will give me great pleasure to advise the ticket agents, conductors, and ships' pursers of the country of your assistance in obtaining this result.

Yours truly,

ROY RAINEY, Auditor.

Mr. NORRIS. I now offer the amendment which has heretofore been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 48, line 23, after the word "title," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including line 26, on page 48, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

shall be open to examination and inspection as other public records under the same rules and regulations as may govern the examination of public documents generally.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this amendment, which comes in on page 48 of the bill, provides for making all income-tax returns public records, and that, as the amendment states, they "shall be open to examination and inspection as other public records under the same rules and regulations as may govern the examination of public documents generally."

It is in exact form, as I now remember, in which it was approved as an amendment to one of the prior revenue bills. It was, however, rejected by the House of Representatives, and in conference a compromise provision was adopted, which became the law, but which, as a matter of fact, was so unsatisfactory that, as I recall, it was not included in the next revenue bill.

Mr. President, I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate by going into a detailed argument on this publicity amendment. It has been debated in the Senate on several occasions, and I presume Senators all have definite ideas as to whether or not it ought to be included in the bill. To my mind there is no more reason why income-tax returns should be secret, why they should not be treated as public records are usually treated, than there is why in the States the returns of the tax assessor should be secret.

I presume that under the law of every State in the Union the returns of the tax assessor have been treated as a public document; they are accessible, under such rules and regulations as may be made in regard to all public documents and records, to examination by any person who desires to make such examination. I myself can not understand why there should be any more objection to making a tax return under the Federal law a public record than there would be to making the tax assessor's return a public record under the general taxing laws of the State. There certainly can be no harm come, so far as I am able to see, to any taxpayer because his return may be examined by those who desire to examine either that record or any other public record.

Everyone who has made any study of government or the history of government knows that from the dawn of civilization one of the evils of government has been secrecy in the transaction of public business. It is impossible to exaggerate, Mr. President, the dangers that may come to any government, National or State, county or municipal, that insists upon secrecy in the transaction of its public business. It may be that for a time no evil will come; it may be that such a course may be pursued for a while without danger arising to the government or its taxpayers; but it has been demonstrated over and over again that governments which have transacted the business of the public in secret and prevented the ordinary citizen from having opportunity to look into the records of public business and to examine public documents sooner or later fail.

Moreover, Mr. President, there is no doubt that dishonest taxpayers will take every advantage they can in order to avoid the payment of their taxes which are legally and justly due. The man who is perfectly willing to pay whatever under the law he should pay, as a rule makes no objection to having his tax return considered a public document. The corporation and the individual, however, who want to avoid taxation, who are ready to resort to all the technicalities that shrewd attorneys may discover for the purpose of avoiding taxation are the ones who are particularly interested in having this portion of the public business transacted on a secret basis.

The system of secrecy in connection with tax returns gives a premium to the dishonest taxpayer, and thus increases the burden of the honest taxpayer. It does another thing, Mr. President; it prevents Congress from legislating intelligently on tax questions. If we are not informed as to the evils that arise under our tax laws, we can not, of course, intelligently consider and enact legislation that will correct such evils in any way. Everyone knows that no law is perfect; every law, whether it be a revenue law or any other, especially when it covers the ramifications of all kinds of business, as a tax law does, will have imperfections; but from knowledge of conditions we will be able to learn how we can improve the law, how we can remedy its defects, how we can provide that the dishonest taxpayer shall not have an opportunity to avoid the just taxes which he owes to the Government. We are not now able to do this, because we are not able to secure information apprising us of the remedies which should be applied in our tax laws by way of legislation.

So, from any viewpoint, it seems to me there can be no just objection to making a tax return a public document, subject to the same rules and regulations as every other public document.

But, Mr. President, there is another reason that has recently been called to the attention of Congress and the attention of the country why I think we should take some such step as this.

The investigations made by the so-called Couzens committee developed that there were a great many imperfections in our revenue law, of which neither Congress nor the country had ever been advised. If Senators will examine the reports of these investigations, or talk with members of the committee, I think they will be able to see that the very fact of the secrecy that has pervaded the entire bureau in the collection of taxes, and in the decision of controverted questions that have arisen between the taxpayer and the Government for adjudication under our law, has resulted not only in the loss of hundreds of millions of dollars of taxes justly due to the Government, but has kept from Congress the necessary information by which we could pass legislation that would remedy the evils.

There are other instances where an injustice has been done to the taxpayer, and where no one has an opportunity to find out just what it is in order that it may be remedied; but there are still other things that have come to our notice recently.

The Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, the chairman of which committee is now honoring me with his presence and his attention, has been for a long time engaged in investigations that have brought to light facts and circumstances that have shocked the conscience of the American people. Those investigations have developed the fact that some of our wealthiest men and our wealthiest corporations have been engaged in a business that was as disreputable as ever was engaged in by Benedict Arnold or any of his pals. They have developed that these men have not only bribed public officials, but they have robbed the Government or attempted to rob the Government; and had it not been for these investigations, and the litigation that came as a result of these investigations, they would have robbed the Government of its naval oil reserves.

That probably might have meant, in case of war with a foreign country, defeat instead of victory. That might have meant the destruction on the battle field of hundreds of thousands of human lives that otherwise might be preserved.

Congress, in its wisdom, through the officials of the executive department of the Government, had set aside certain reserves, so that in time of emergency or war our Government might be equipped as well as any of the navies of the world at least, if not better. It has been shown that these reserves were squandered away, that officials were bribed to sell them, that these wealthy corporations invested hundreds of thousands of dollars to bring about the debauchery of public officials and the stealing from the people of the United States of hundreds of millions of dollars of the Government's property. It was further developed, Mr. President, that in carrying out part of these reprehensible schemes an illegal and a fraudulent corporation was organized over in Canada; and this committee of the Senate has spent a great deal of public money and a great deal of valuable time in trying to find out just what that corporation was, who was in it, who got the money, who were its officials, and all about it. The committee has been to a great extent unable to secure all the information that it ought to have been able to acquire, that the Senate and the country needed and wanted. It has been handicapped at every step.

It occurred to this committee on the investigation, and it has occurred to many of us, that if the schemes that it was known that this Continental Trading Co. of Canada was organized to carry out were successful, as they evidently had been up to a certain point, at least, these officials had not paid to the Government of the United States the money that was due it on incomes. That was perfectly apparent some time ago in this investigation to any student who was trying to follow the work that committee was doing. It was quite apparent that if Sinclair and Blackmer and O'Neil and Stewart had been doing the things that the evidence disclosed they were doing, they owed to the Government of the United States at least millions of dollars in the way of taxes for profits that they had made. But all those records were locked up right here in Washington, in the same city where the committee has been sitting during all these weary weeks of investigation. If there was any such evidence, if there was anything that would give any clue to what this corporation had made in the way of money, any returns that had been made to the Government by this corporation or any of its agents or officials or stockholders, there was no way to get the evidence. It was tied up, it was secret, because of the existence of our law now that makes all these returns secret.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, but that if the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys had access to the records of the Treasury, their weary way would have been eased many times by an examination of the records there; and it may be that they would have been able to save a vast amount of time and a vast amount of money if they had been permitted to look at the records and see what the records showed in regard to these profits that it was quite evident had been made by somebody. They might have been able, Mr. President, perhaps not to get all that they needed, but perhaps to get a clue to evidence that would have led them to get possession of the entire story. But, as I say, the law closed the doors in the face of the committee, as it closed the doors to every citizen of the United States. It seems to me this has been a demonstration that our law is wrong; that we ought to permit these returns to be examined, the same as any other public document can be examined; and had that been the law at the beginning of these investigations, one of the first things that would have been done would have been to examine the returns, to examine the records in the Treasury Department, to see whether or not these men, who had evidently made millions out of this transaction, had made a return; if they had not made a return, then to find out what the Treasury Department was doing about it. If they had made no return, they are liable under the law ciriminally as well as civilly.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NYE. The Senator from Nebraska is now touching upon a matter in which the committee has been very materially interested. I think, for his information and for the information of the Senate, it ought to be disclosed at this time that a few days ago the committee did make inquiry of the Treasury Department as to what proceedings were being initiated or carried out with relation to the collection of any tax that was due the Government as a result of the Continental Trading Co. deal. That the Senator may know it, and that it may carry weight with the argument which he is offering, I think it ought to be stated at this time that if the committee has gained from the Treasury any information at all touching upon this matter it is not the privilege of the committee to disclose what it has found out.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is one of the most important things, in my opinion, that could come before us, and with which this bill should deal. I think the entire Senate ought to be familiar with what is being stated now by the Senator from North Dakota. Will he yield that I may call a quorum, that the Senate may hear it?

Mr. NORRIS. I have the floor, and I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MCMASTER] are detained on business of the Senate in a committee meeting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-nine Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to say to those Senators who have come in in answer to the roll call, and who were not here when the roll call was begun, that I had been discussing the amendment now pending, with particular reference to the action of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys in the making of its investigation regarding Sinclair, Blackmer, O'Neil, and Stewart, and their connection, if any, with the Treasury of the United States in the payment of income taxes on the profits of the fraudulent Continental Trading. Co., of Canada. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, had just interrupted me, and manifested a desire and an intention of giving to the Senate information in regard to that difficulty, and as to what the committee had done in reference to it. I can not say what his statement is going to be, but at the time of the roll call he was starting to speak in regard to the matter, and I yield to him now to continue and finish his statement.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, perhaps under the circumstances I ought to have refrained from speaking in this connection at all; but the Senator from Nebraska was making such a splendid argument in support of the abandonment of this secrecy clause within the tax bill, and had touched so closely to a matter in which the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys was interested in the last few days, that I felt I could not refrain.

The Senator from Nebraska had insinuated that had the records of the Treasury been open to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys in its inquiry into the affairs of the Continental Trading Co. the path of that committee might have been made somewhat easier than it has been.

I said, when I interrupted the Senator, just this, that it occurred to the committee a matter of a week ago to ask the Treasury just what it was doing with regard to prosecuting any possible tax claims which might exist on the part of the Government against the Continental Trading Co. and those who participated in it, and I was saying that if there was any information of worth coming out of that inquiry, it was not, under the law as it stands at the present time, the privilege of the committee to make use of that information.

Whatever information the committee has received we are virtually sworn to secrecy upon, but I can say this in that connection, that for a matter of six months the committee has been endeavoring to ascertain the names of the participants in the profits of the Continental Trading Co., and as to who was responsible for the Continental Trading Co. We have been quite unsuccessful. The only two who were available and who we had reason to believe might have been participants in that company have sworn that they knew nothing of the affairs of the Continental Trading Co., have sworn that though they have received a profit from that company, they did not know, when the profit was paid to them, what its source really was. The only other three who could give direct testimony in that connection have fled the country and have been abroad through all these years.

If it has been disclosed to us that there has been settlement made by the Continental Trading Co. for any taxes owing the Government by the Continental Trading Co.—I say, if it has been disclosed to us that any such settlement has been made, it is not our privilege now to disclose, as a committee, just who made the settlement of that tax. I think it fair to assume that a statement of the names of the persons who made such a settlement would be indicative of whom the Continental Trading Co. was and who the individuals concerned were, but as it stands, under the law it is not our privilege to use the information which is available in the Treasury.

This morning, upon the convening of the Senate, the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] offered for the committee a resolution asking the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation to gain that information. We can gain it eventually, I have no doubt, but it seems to me to be a sorry state of affairs when the only way this information can be won is first of all to have secured information wholly foreign to that possessed by the Treasury Department; that it is the privilege of those who are evading the tax under the law as it stands at the present time to make settlement when they will, and the public knows absolutely nothing about it.

I think that under the circumstances the committee has a certain interest in this matter which the Senator from Nebraska is discussing that ought to be expressed. First of all, the committee is going to be more or less criticized after all is said and done because of what some will consider to be its limited accomplishments, because it would seem that these investigations accomplish little or nothing, when, as a matter of fact, the accomplishments of this investigation have been many, many fold. Not the least among the accomplishments, I am sure, will be the saving to the Government of millions upon millions of dollars of taxes that might otherwise have been evaded. So that though we get the facts, as we expect to get them, under the resolution offered by the Senator from Montana, I think it high time that we did away with this cloak of secrecy behind which scoundrels can hide in the settlements, when they do make settlements, of claims which rightfully exist against them.

I think that is all I would venture to say at this time in this connection.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I feel like adding to what has been said by the chairman of the committee the fact that it was disclosed some nearly four years ago now that this ephemeral Continental Trading Co. had realized profits out of its transactions extending over a period of something like a year and a half, and really consummated some time ago, of something over $3,000,000. That fact was known to some of the officers of the Government at least four years ago, when an application was made for a continuance of the Teapot Dome trial at Cheyenne, Wyo.

About the time the committee began its work under the resolution (S. Res. 101) offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] during the current session of the Congress a member of the committee addressed a communication to the Secretary of the Treasury calling his attention to the fact that in all reasonable probability a very considerable amount of tax was due from the Continental Trading Co. to the Treasury, and likewise that the facts disclosed before the committee rendered it altogether probable that no return had been made and no tax had been paid. Information with respect to that matter was asked, and inquiry was made as to whether any legislation was necessary or desired in order to aid the Treasury in the collection of any tax that might be due.

In response to that letter, a letter came from the Secretary saying that the fact was that no tax had been paid and no return had been made, and up to that time the Treasury was not advised that any further legislation was necessary, but further inquiry would be made in respect thereto.

Nothing having been heard about the matter until, as the chairman of the committee has stated, something about 10 days ago, a further communication was addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, as a result of which some communication has been had with officers of that branch of the Government, and as a consequence thereof the resolution which was offered this morning and adopted by the Senate was introduced. It is expected that definite information will come promptly concerning what has been done concerning the collection of this tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to thank the Senator from North Dakota and likewise the Senator from Montana for their contribution to what I was trying to say.

It is quite evident, from what these two Senators have said, that even they possess information which they are not at liberty now to disclose to the Senate, all because we have a law on the statute books which makes these public documents secret. It is quite evident, it must be apparent to every Senator who has listened to the statements of these two Senators, that there is information in the Treasury which they do not have, but that they at least know that there is something there that they do not have. They may have more information than that. But because of the secrecy made necessary by the law, they can not even disclose their knowledge to the Senate, a body which, in conjunction with the House of Representatives, is charged with legislation for more than a hundred million people, in a Republic where the people are supposed to rule. Yet, because of the secrecy in the Revenue Bureau of the United States, even members of our committee can not disclose the evidence to the the legislative body, which must be informed before any legislative remedy can be applied. It is a queer predicament, it seems to me, for a civilized nation to find itself in. Yet we are going on from year to year giving a premium upon fraud and dishonesty, then giving a premium to those who have committed the fraud and dishonesty, making it difficult for the officials of the Government to arrest and punish or to collect civilly under any liability which may exist from those who are at fault.

The particular amendment in only a few words would remedy that situation. Is there anyone who doubts if these documents were public documents, subject to examination, that instances of this kind would at least more rarely occur? The thief, the demagogue, the briber is afraid of publicity. That is one thing above all else that he avoids. So I say again we are by our laws giving a premium to the dishonest, to the debauchers of public officials, to those who rob the Government of its property, property that is almost sacred because it was set aside to preserve our Army and our Navy and our country in times of dire distress.

I heard the chairman of the investigating committee when he said that the committee would probably be criticized because the results were not as great as some people think they ought to be.

I have heard that criticism made. I heard made, I think, on the floor of the Senate at the beginning of the investigation objections to the expenditure of public money in the various investigations. But I say here and now to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the other members of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys that, considered only on a cold financial basis, the investment made of public money in the investigations has brought greater returns to the taxpayers of the United States than the expenditure of any amount of money ten times as great in the history of our country. We did recover Elk Hills reservation in California, we did receover Teapot Dome, and the title now rests in the Nation, property worth hundreds of millions of dollars. Not one foot of it would have been recovered had it not been for investigations made by the Senate committee.

Years ago, when the resolution was first introduced by the late Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. La Follette, and when it was passed by the Senate and the investigation was commenced by this committee, there was criticism both here and elsewhere. The committee and those who favored the resolution were criticized in a great many places in the United States, by high officials and high representatives in all kinds of business. Much of the criticism probably was honestly made. It was not a long time that the committee was at work before they began to unearth sufficient to convince even the worst doubter that there had been going on for several years the greatest kind of fraud; that a high public official, a member of the Cabinet, had been bribed and that he had given away hundreds of millions of dollars of the property of the United States.

So I would like to say to the members of the committee that while it may seem difficult, and has been even weary and uphill work, sometimes thankless, they have made a record that will be admired and glorified years after they have passed away. The late Senator La Follette was condemned, and one of the reasons for his condemnation was his activities in the Teapot Dome matter. Although he has passed away and can not listen to the praise that comes to his name, the whole world knows now that he was right, that he was on the right track, and that he was one of the principal instrumentalities that brought about, even if we consider it only in dollars and cents, hundreds of millions of profits to the United States by the saving of the naval oil reserves.

But, Mr. President, the money involved is the least part of it. The investigation which has been going on for years has brought to light, a little at a time, disclosures that have shown how this wicked thing was done, how unpatriotic some of our public servants were, how unpatriotic and dishonest and traitorous were some of our very wealthy men who were bribing public officials for dollars and cents. So I think it is a noble record, one of which, although the members of the committee may not think so much of it, their children will be proud.

Mr. President, I have said this much about the committee work not because it has a direct bearing upon the pending question but because the remark of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] brought it forth. But enough has been disclosed now to show that there is a connection in the secrecy between those who have defrauded the people of the United States, between officials who have sold out the Government of the United States for gold, and the secrecy that is going on in our Government. It is only another demonstration of what I have often said, that secrecy in government will ultimately, if not checked, lead to its destruction. It is a law of human nature. There is no escape from its result.

More quickly than anyone thought, this secrecy going on in the lease of the oil lands, something that was concealed from the people of the United States, has brought to light some of the most disgraceful disclosures that have ever been put in print. It can not be kept up long and have the Government survive. We can not make a daily occurrence of that kind of thing and expect the Republic to live. It will be an impossibility. The only way to purify it, or one of the ways to make it nearer impossible for these things to occur, is to throw open the doors to the public records of the United States. Therefore I hope that the Senate will adopt the amendment and incorporate it in the law.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, several Congresses have endeavored to have put into the law an amendment such as is now proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. The committee which investigated the Bureau of Internal Revenue had occasion during its examination to discover the criminality of the operations of the bureau through the very secrecy provision now in the law.

It seems to me that it is appropriate at this time to read into the RECORD some of the experiences we had and some of the records we found as a result of the examination. Of course, I know that Senators are busy on all sorts of committees, and have direct activities with special measures, and I assume, for that reason, that not many Senators have read the report of the select committee which investigated the Bureau of Internal Revenue. I want to read just a page or two of the results that were secured by means of our investigation.

On page 229 of the investigation report which was made to the Senate there appears the following:

> Many of the principles, practices, methods, and formulæ applied in determining taxes have never been reduced to writing, and only about 15½ per cent of the formal written rulings have ever been published.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I did not quite get that statement. Does the Senator mean to say that only 15½ per cent of the rulings have ever been published?

Mr. COUZENS. That is correct as of the time we made the investigation. I have no information of the condition since, nor do I know what rulings have been published since.

Mr. NORRIS. That means that anyone seeking a refund of an overpayment of taxes would not be able to find out what the rule was, or what the precedents, if any had already been established, might be.

Mr. COUZENS. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. That is a deplorable condition.

Mr. COUZENS. That condition was disclosed in the testimony and incorporated in the report.

> This failure to promulgate and publish the principles and practices to be followed in determining tax liability has resulted in gross discrimination between taxpayers similarly situated. Taxpayers desiring the benefit of the most favorable practices have been forced to employ former employees of the Income Tax Unit and pay immense fees for information which should be freely available to everybody. The premium thus placed upon the value of unpublished information is the cause of the immense turnover among the employees of the unit and creates a necessity for salaries entirely out of range with what the Government pays for similar services in other bureaus.
> This failure to promulgate and publish adequate rulings has retarded the settlement of the law and practice of the department. This unsettled condition of the law and practice has encouraged the filing and prosecution of claims and requires the continued discussion and consideration of questions which should have been long since disposed of by established precedents.
>
> Uniformity in the taxation of those similarly situated is the first and fundamental requisite of any just system of taxation. Such uniformity can not be accomplished unless tax liability is determined in accordance with principles uniformly applied.
> The most serious defect in the administration of the income tax law is the absence of any adequate statement of the departmental construction of the provisions of the law, the principles, formula, and methods applied, and the practice and procedure followed in determining tax liability.

In order not to delay the Senate I will pass over several paragraphs and refer to page 230 of the report. I want to say in this connection that the report is based on absolute evidence presented to the committee and is not speculation or an opinion arrived at by the committee itself.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator whether the report with respect to this feature was unanimous?

Mr. COUZENS. No; the report was not unanimous. It was not signed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] or by former Senator Ernst, of Kentucky. I might say in further answer to the Senator from Montana that the testimony is a public record and became a public record after we presented it to the Senate. The hearings were held before members of the committee, and the staff of the Bureau of Internal Revenue was present at all times.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would like to inquire of the Senator whether the Senators referred to made a minority report?

Mr. COUZENS. I think Senator Ernst made a minority report, which was concurred in by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, is the Senator able to tell us whether they canvassed this particular feature of the matter?

Mr. COUZENS. I do not recall. The minority report was not published, as I remember, but was read into the RECORD by the former Senator from Kentucky, Mr. Ernst.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is not able to tell us whether or not it expressed any views upon this particular feature of the matter?

Mr. COUZENS. No; but I shall be glad to look that up. I was not prepared for this question to come up this afternoon, but I wish to say that the bureau itself has at no time denied these statements.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan permit an interruption at that point?

Mr. COUZENS. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. I am speaking only from recollection, but I remember distinctly that the former Senator from Kentucky, Mr. Ernst, referred to it, and I think it was at the time when, as the Senator from Michigan has stated, he read his report into the RECORD. While he disagreed with the Senator from Michigan in some of his conclusions, I do not believe he made any denial, as I remember, or contradiction of the statements that the Senator from Michigan has just now made, nor did he claim that the evidence did not disclose just what the Senator from Michigan has stated that it disclosed.

Mr. COUZENS. His report was particularly directed against the chairman of the committee for his method of inquiry.

On page 230 of the report from which I have just been reading it is stated:

When Congress reenacts a statute which has received Executive interpretation it is considered to have given implied legislative approval to such interpretation. During the hearings it was repeatedly claimed that by reenacting the provisions of the revenue acts Congress has affirmed the administrative construction. It is therefore of vital importance that Congress have the means of informing itself as to how the revenue acts are construed and applied. Unless the practices and precedents interpreting and applying the revenue laws are reduced to writing and published, Congress has no means of learning what it is presumed to know in acting upon revenue legislation. Without knowledge of the administrative interpretation and application of the revenue acts Congress can not intelligently determine the desirability or necessity for their amendment.

THE REGULATIONS

The income tax law is necessarily most general in its terms and empowers the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to promulgate "regulations" more particularly defining the taxpayer's rights and obligations under the law. It was doubtless the intention of Congress that these regulations should be sufficiently complete, comprehensive, and specific to enable any taxpayer to determine his own tax liability.

The regulations under each revenue act must be promulgated before the returns made under such act are prepared. It has been impossible to foresee the multitude of questions which would arise under a new law or under new provisions of subsequent acts. The "regulations" under the earlier acts were, therefore, of necessity, very broad and general, and in many cases were mere restatements of the income tax law. We now have an entirely different situation. It is over seven years since the 1917 returns were filed, and it is extremely doubtful if many questions can arise which are not presented by the returns filed since March, 1918.

Most questions which can arise have been acted upon in some manner, and, if uniformity and consistency of ruling is to be observed, this accumulated mass of precedent constitutes a fund of information which should be available to the employees of the bureau and to the tax-paying public. This information should also be available to Congress. It is only by examining such precedent that Congress can determine how its acts are construed and applied, and whether amendment is necessary or desirable.

Notwithstanding the fact that nearly every conceivable question which can arise under the income tax laws has been presented by returns on file, and some action has been taken upon the most of such questions, the "regulations" promulgated under the 1924 act are still so broad and general as to give the employees of the Income Tax Unit, the taxpayers, and the Congress but little more guidance and assistance than do the "regulations" promulgated under the 1918 act.

PUBLISHED RULINGS

The generality of the regulations leaves a multitude of questions as to the interpretation of the law and the regulations, to be passed upon in particular cases. In many instances taxpayers before filing returns write to the unit requesting rulings upon the application of the law to particular facts. These inquiries are referred to what is known as the rules and regulations section, where they are answered. When, in the judgment of the rules and regulations section, these answers cover questions not covered by published rulings, they are forwarded to the solicitor for his approval, and if approved become what are called income-tax rulings.

The advice of the rules and regulations section is sometimes also sought by the audit and engineering divisions upon matters pending in the unit. It is the practice of the rules and regulations section to answer inquiries from the unit divisions if the question is covered by a published ruling, but otherwise to refer the questions to the solicitor for a ruling.

Solicitor's rulings are made upon questions referred by the rules and regulations section upon cases brought to the solicitor's office on appeal by the taxpayer upon refunds involving over $50,000 and upon requests made by the commissioner or deputy commissioner upon their own initiative or upon the suggestion of a chief of a division.

For a time the tax advisory board recommended methods of procedure and formula and acted upon cases appealed by taxpayers. The committee on appeals and review was the appellate body to which appeals were taken from unit determinations until it was abolished, when the Board of Tax Appeals was created under the revenue act of 1924.

ONLY 15½ PER CENT OF FORMAL RULINGS PUBLISHED

As of March 6, 1925, there had been issued by the solicitor—

And this is a point I wish to emphasize—the tax advisory board, the committee on appeals and review, and by the rules and regulations section 20,311 rulings, of which only 3,168, or 15½ per cent, had been published.

There were 20,311 rulings, and only 15½ per cent ever came to public observation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Does that mean that the remainder of those rulings—the 84½ per cent—were inaccessible?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. That means that it would have been impossible for me, for instance, if I had been an attorney for a client who had a case there, to find out what the precedent established in any of those other cases was?

Mr. COUZENS. So far as any public record is concerned, that is correct. I do not say if the attorney had applied to the commissioner and intimated that there was such a ruling and stated he would like to see it that he could not have examined it.

Mr. NORRIS. He would have had to know in advance that there was such a ruling.

Mr. COUZENS. He would have to know in advance. It was not a public record. He might have learned from an associate, or another attorney, or an auditor, or an accountant that there was such a ruling in existence.

The number of rulings issued by each of these authorities and the number published is shown by the following table—

I am not going to delay the Senate by going into all the details, but the advisory tax board issued 71 rulings or recommendations and published 50 of them, or 71 per cent.

Going further down the table, the committee on appeals and review issued 8,367 rulings or recommendations and published only 403 of them, or 4 per cent.

The aggregate of all these rulings, as I have said, was 20,311, of which 15½ per cent were published.

The representatives of the commissioner stated to this committee—

This is a matter of record—that all rulings upon novel questions of general application were published, provided it were possible to so delete the facts as to destroy the identity of the case, and that unpublished rulings are never used as precedents.

In other words, the commissioner testified before the committee that unpublished rulings were not used as precedents, so that if any taxpayer should get a favorable decision in his particular case, it could never be used as a precedent in another case.

This statement is not sustained by the facts as disclosed by the investigation.

In that section of this report dealing with "Depletion and the valuation of natural resources" many formal rulings by the solicitor and the committee on appeals and review are reviewed and discussed. Every one of these rulings are of general interest and importance. The facts in every case could be so deleted as to destroy the identity of the taxpayer. Not one of these rulings have been published.

The excuse of the bureau as offered to the committee was that they could not publish these rulings without disclosing the name of the taxpayer; that it was impossible, because of the peculiarity of the situation, to delete the names and yet give the facts to the public.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if I may be permitted again to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. COUZENS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Even that excuse would have been unavailable if we had had this kind of a provision in the law.

Mr. COUZENS. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Because the commissioner of course was saying, "I can not give you this case because I am prohibited under the law from disclosing this information."

Mr. JOHNSON. But, beyond that, the decisions were well known to a favored few. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. COUZENS. Every employee who left the bureau knew of these 17,000 unpublished decisions, or a percentage of them, and was able to go to his client or clients in soliciting business and say "Mr. Jones," or "Mr. Smith, I know of a decision of the Bureau of Internal Revenue that will secure you a refund of a million dollars. You do not know of it, and you can not get it. If you will let me take your case for a 25 per cent or 50 per cent contingent fee, I will take it up and get you a refund." I know that from actual experience. So it is perfectly obvious that the secrecy of the bureau, against which at every opportunity I have protested, is discriminatory as between taxpayers and leads to fraud and graft.

I continue to read from the report:

The following statement of several of these rulings suffices to prove their general importance and the fact that they can be stated without revealing the identity of the taxpayer:

A ruling by the solicitor that the commissioner may reconsider tentative valuation made for depletion purposes.

Rulings by both the committee on appeals and review and the solicitor that discovery depletion may be based upon discoveries made after the existence of the mineral is known.

A ruling that the provision barring discovery depletion when the property is acquired as the result of purchase of a proven tract or lease permits the allowance of discovery depletion to the owner of a fee which was a proven tract or lease when he acquired the fee, provided he had an option to purchase when the mineral was discovered.

In the National Aniline & Chemical case a published ruling of the solicitor was violated, and an unpublished ruling, advisory tax board recommendation No. 68, was followed. That this was not an oversight, but was done deliberately, is shown by the record.

In the United Motors Corporation case (3923), committee on appeals and review recommendation No. 6617 is contrary to published recommendation No. 34 providing for the 1913 valuation of corporate stock, yet No. 6617 was not published.

Recommendation No. 6617 is based upon seven unpublished rulings, one of which is L. O. 1117, which the committee states in its ruling was cited by both the unit and by the taxpayer.

It was cited by the taxpayer and by the unit without ever being published, because the taxpayer learned of it through means resulting from the secretive methods employed by the department.

This particular ruling not only shows the extent to which unpublished rulings were relied upon as precedents, but discloses the fact that at least this taxpayer had access to and was able to avail itself of this unpublished precedent.

It may be observed that since June 1, 1925, the commissioner has refused to give this committee copies of unpublished rulings, some of which had been requested but the copying of which had not been finished on June 1, 1925.

That was the time when the authority of the committee expired under the resolution—

It thus appears that some taxpayers are permitted to secure and utilize rulings which even a Senate committee can not secure.

I will skip over here; and I want to make reference to the value of this secrecy to the tax expert.

This system—

That I have just been talking about—had not only led to the lack of uniformity and lack of consistency in rulings upon the same and closely related questions but has given rise to and now maintains the lucrative business of the tax expert or "fixer." There is nothing so involved, complicated, or technical about the procedure in the Income Tax Unit that anyone of ordinary intelligence can not understand it, provided he has access to the information. Taxpayers generally, however, to secure the advantages accorded others similarly situated find it necessary to employ some one with "inside" information.

I want to point out to Senators that this is not a mere report; it is all sustained by evidence. The evidence is now in the hands of the Senate. If anyone challenges that statement he can go to the records, and deny, if he cares to, the statements I am now making, which are signed by a majority of the committee.

I have no desire to delay action on the proposed amendment; but if anyone is in doubt as to the desirability of adopting this amendment, I can refer him to the testimony that is already in the hands of the Senate, produced by the select committee that examined the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and specifically refer him to the reports from which I have read.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

On May 16, 1928:

S. 2004. An act authorizing the paving of the Federal strip known as International Street, adjacent to Nogales, Ariz.

On May 17, 1928:

S. 1662. An act to change the boundaries of the Tule River Indian Reservation, Calif.;

S. 2340. An act to transfer to the city of Duluth, Minn., the old Federal building, together with the site thereof;

S. 3565. An act to provide compensation for disability or death resulting from injury to employees in certain employments in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

S. J. Res. 119. Joint resolution granting an easement to the city of Duluth, Minn.

CONSTRUCTION OF RURAL POST ROADS (S. DOC. NO. 111)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair) laid before the Senate the following veto message from the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

To the Senate:

There is returned herewith, without my approval, S. 3674, a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes.

The bill would authorize appropriations of $3,500,000 each for the fiscal years 1929, 1930, and 1931, to be allocated to States having more than 5 per cent of their area in unappropriated or unreserved public lands, nontaxable Indian lands, or other Federal reservations, for the construction, by the Bureau of Public Roads, of the main roads through such lands.

From 1917 to 1929, inclusive, Federal appropriations aggregating $840,000,000 have been authorized for cooperative construction of rural post roads and appropriations aggregating $733,200,000 have been made to meet the requirements as they have developed. From 1922 to 1929, inclusive, Federal appropriations aggregating $58,000,000 have been authorized for forest-development roads and forest highways and appropriations thereunder aggregating $54,055,000 have been made. From 1925 to 1929, inclusive, $10,000,000 have been appropriated for the construction of roads in national parks.

While expenditures from appropriations for cooperative construction of rural post roads are contingent upon equal contributions by State or local agencies, no such requirement obtains with reference to appropriations for roads in national forests and national parks, since such roads are required for the protection, administration, utilization, or development of Federal resources. The bill would provide for entire construction from Federal funds of main roads through unappropriated or unreserved public lands and nontaxable Indian lands. Such expenditures could not be justified on the basis of protection or development of Federal resources and would constitute a radical departure from the established policy of Federal aid on a cooperative basis in road construction.

Having in mind the increasing ability of the States to finance road construction due to the general adoption of the gasoline tax and the increase in revenue from this source which would accrue to States from roads constructed through public and Indian lands therein, I see no reason why the States should be relieved from their contribution toward the construction of these roads as required by existing law. I am constrained therefore to return this bill without my approval.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 18, 1928.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand that the veto message has to be entered on the Journal before that vote is taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada has a perfect right to make a statement, however.

Mr. CURTIS. I beg pardon.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, when the message is entered on the Journal in the proper way, in a short time I shall move that the Senate consider this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that a motion is not necessary. The matter is on the table for that purpose at any time. The message will lie on the table and be printed.

CLAIMS OF INDIANS IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON (S. DOC. NO. 110)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following veto message from the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

To the Senate:

I am returning herewith Senate bill 1480, "An act authorizing certain Indian tribes and bands, or any of them, residing in the State of Washington, to present their claims to the Court of Claims," without my approval.

These claims amount to approximately $9,125,000, which represents the value of 6,500,000 acres of land, in the aboriginal possession of the Indians, at $1.25 per acre, and includes hunting and fishing rights to the value of $1,000,000. These claims are not based upon any treaty or agreement between the United States and these Indians, nor does it appear to me that they are predicated upon such other grounds as should obligate the Government at this late day to defend a suit of this character. The Government should not be required to adjudicate these claims of ancient origin unless there be such evidence of unmistakable merit in the claims as would create an obligation on the part of the Government to admit them to adjudication. It seems to me that such evidence is lacking.

I am constrained, therefore, to withhold my approval of this bill.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 18, 1928.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding? The bill and message will lie over for the day and be printed.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE (S. DOC. NO. 109)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, submitting supplemental estimates of appropriations for the Department of Commerce, fiscal year 1928, amounting to $1,373,020, and for the fiscal year 1929 amounting to $47,955; in all, $1,420,975; which with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF JOHN BOYD (S. DOC. NO. 108)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the District of Columbia, fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, for the payment of a final judgment rendered against it amounting, with costs, to $516.66, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON CIVIL AERONAUTICS (H. DOC. NO. 308)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the inclosed report from the Secretary of State, with the accompanying papers, to the end that legislation may be enacted authorizing (1) the President to invite representatives of foreign governments to attend an International Aeronautical Conference on Civil Aeronautics, to be held in Washington, D. C., December 12, 13, and 14 of this year, and (2) an appropriation of $24,700 for the expenses of such a conference in accordance with the recommendations of the Secretary of Commerce, as submitted through the Secretary of State.

INTERNATIONAL TELEGRAPH CONFERENCE AT BRUSSELS (H. DOC. NO. 309)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State requesting that the Congress be asked to enact legislation authorizing an appropriation in the sum of $19,800 to pay for the expenditures involved in the participation by the United States in the International Telegraph Conference to be held at Brussels, beginning about September 10, 1928.

I recommend that the Congress enact legislation authorizing an appropriation for the sum mentioned, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

NAVAL CONSTRUCTION

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay action on the amendment now before the Senate nor on the bill; but there are certain matters that I feel that I ought to bring before the Senate. I will ask Senators not to interrupt me in the course of what I have to say, as there are many figures involved.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is not asking for action to be taken at this time?

Mr. HALE. I am not asking for any action at this moment. What I shall say will not consume a great deal of time.

Mr. President, to understand clearly the present naval situation and the purposes of the naval construction bill which is on the calendar it will be necessary to go back a number of years into naval history.

In August, 1916, the so-called 1916 building program was authorized by act of Congress. This program provided for the construction of 157 new ships of various types, including a number of very large and very powerful battleships and battle cruisers.

Most of the ships included in the building program, including all of the battleships and battle cruisers, had been laid down and were in process of construction when President Harding took his seat in the White House in March, 1921.

At that time we had on the ways 9 battleships, 3 of them of a tonnage of 32,600 tons each, 6 of a tonnage of 43,200 tons each, and 6 battle cruisers of a tonnage of 43,500 tons each. The battleships, when work was shortly thereafter stopped upon them, were in a stage of completion averaging 43 per cent, and the battle cruisers 16 per cent.

Mr. President, had all of these ships been completed and had they been added to our naval forces, and had a sufficient number of cruisers, submarines, aircraft carriers, and other auxiliary ships been laid down properly to round out the Navy, we would have had a Navy powerful enough in all probability to withstand all of the navies of the world now in existence combined.

This would have guaranteed to us absolute protection from any attack by sea.

After the Great War a feeling arose in this country and throughout the civilized world that naval armament should be cut down and that the various peoples of the world should be relieved of the burdens of taxation necessary to maintain and keep up the great armaments then existing and planned for, and, above all, as far as possible that competition in naval armament should be stopped.

To carry into effect such a plan for the limitation of armament the Washington Conference for the Limitation of Armament was called by President Harding in November, 1921.

With our tremendous shipbuilding program on the ways, which no other country could reasonably hope to equal, we were in a position to bring about an agreement among the five greater naval powers of the world—Great Britain, Japan, France, Italy, and ourselves—for such a limitation, and we did bring about, Mr. President, such a limitation of naval armament, so far as capital ships and aircraft carriers were concerned, by agreeing to scrap all of our battleships building, with the exception of two, and all of our battle cruisers building, with the exception of two, which were to be turned into aircraft carriers, making a total of 465,800 tons of new construction that was scrapped, on which $150,000,000 had already been spent.

In addition to this we agreed to scrap a number of older battleships, as did two of the other four nations parties to the treaty—Great Britain and Japan—which battleships could have been kept up only at great expense, and would in all probability have been scrapped had there been no conference on limitation of naval armament.

The other nations parties to the conference agreed to scrap no ships that were in process of construction, with the exception of Japan, and nearly all of her building program was on paper.

In exchange for giving up this great naval supremacy of ours we secured a basis of limitation on capital ships and carriers of 5 to 5, or an equality with Great Britain; 5 to 3 with Japan; and 5 to 1.67 with France and Italy on capital ships and 5 to 2.22 on carriers.

The sacrifice in reaching this ratio was almost altogether on our part. At the same time the representatives of the United States made a strong attempt to have the same ratio apply to other combatant vessels, including cruisers, destroyers, and submarines, but the attempt was a failure and no agreement other than the agreement on capital ships and aircraft carriers was reached.

When in a conference called on our own initiative we showed ourselves ready to sacrifice our naval supremacy the surprised world was only too glad to accept our terms for a limitation in this class of ships, and to that extent the conference was a success. The pity is that with this immense leverage we could not have fixed the ratio limit on all classes of combatant ships. It is true that we tried our best to do so, and at one time it looked as though we were in a fair way to succeed. But we did not succeed, and hence our troubles of to-day.

One thing the Washington conference did for us—it served as a notification to the rest of the world that the 5–5–3 ratio was the basis upon which the United States proposed to keep up its Navy. Secretary Hughes, who presided over our delegation at the conference, stated clearly the position of our country in referring to the celebration of Navy Day on October 26, 1922, when he said:

> This Government has taken the lead in securing the reduction of naval armament, but the Navy that we retain under the agreement should be maintained with efficient personnel and pride in the service. It is essential that we should maintain the relative naval strength of the United States. That, in my judgment is the way to peace and security. It will be upon that basis that we would enter in future conferences or make agreements for limitation, and it would be folly to undermine our position.

I firmly believe that the position taken by him expresses the will of the American people.

Last summer, Mr. President, at the instigation of the President of the United States, and to follow up the attempt made by our representatives at the Washington conference, a conference was held at Geneva to consider a limitation of armament of ships other than capital ships and carriers. France and Italy refused to take part in the conference other than to send observers, and the conference was thereby limited to Great Britain, Japan, and the United States.

The delegates of this country went to the conference with the honest intention of securing a limitation of armament in the classes of ships indicated. They were ready and willing to accept a tonnage figure on these classes of ships—cruisers, destroyers, and submarines—below the actual naval needs of the country as recommended to Congress by the Navy Department, provided the limitation could be made on the same basis as the capital-ship ratio.

The American proposal at the conference was 250,000 to 300,000 tons of cruisers for Great Britain and the United States and 150,000 to 180,000 for Japan. As we have but 155,000 tons of first-line cruisers built, building, or appropriated for, the lower figure would have involved the building of nearly 100,000 tons of new cruisers.

As the British have built, building, or appropriated for 337,410 tons of first-line cruisers they would have had to scrap about 87,000 tons of their present cruisers. The Japanese, with 196,205 tons of first-line cruisers built, building, or appropriated for, to come within the ratio would have had to scrap about 46,000 tons of their present cruiser force.

The first proposal of the British at the conference was 600,000 tons of cruisers, which offer was later cut down to 510,000 tons. The United States raised their offer to 400,000 tons, though protesting at the time that it was against their better judgment to do so.

The representatives of Japan were at all times in favor of a low figure for a limitation. They asked that the ratio of 5–5–3 be changed to 5–5–3.5, but were not insistent upon this specific demand.

The American demand was for a limitation of total tonnage in cruisers with permission to build cruisers of any size within the limitation up to the 10,000 tons of the treaty cruiser. The British contention was that on account of their far-flung naval bases and insular possessions they needed a great number of smaller cruisers and that therefore the number of 10,000-ton treaty cruisers should be limited.

They insisted that their naval needs required 70 to 75 cruisers, and sought to limit the construction of cruisers to two classes, those of 10,000 tons, carrying 8-inch guns, and those of 7,500 tons and under, with a limit of 6-inch guns, which proposal was later changed to 6,000-ton cruisers with 6-inch guns.

Their original proposal was for fifteen 10,000-ton cruisers, which in one of their later offers was modified to 12.

The position of the United States that a limitation be placed on the total tonnage, with permission to build ships of any size within that limitation up to the treaty limit of 10,000 tons, was maintained throughout the conference by the American delegates, because on account of our almost entire lack of naval bases and the fact that our operations away from the fleet would necessarily be carried on overseas and in proximity to hostile bases, we need the maximum cruising radius and maximum protection in armament, so that it is imperative that we build almost exclusively ships of the larger type. The smaller type of ship with a lesser cruising radius would be of little value to the United States, and necessarily we would not feel justified in building such ships. While it is perfectly true that the naval needs of Great Britain are not necessarily based on the possibility of any hostilities with us, yet the fact remains that if she builds up to her expressed naval needs and we do not she will have a navy that is stronger than our Navy and we lose that position of equality which was the whole basis for the ratio of the Washington conference.

There are people in this country who believe that we should never consent to any agreement that would deny us the right to maintain a navy equal to that of Great Britain, and yet hold that it is not necessary for us to exercise fully our rights under such an agreement. It is true that there is nothing in the agreement of the Washington conference that obligates us in capital ships and carriers to keep our Navy up to the ratio basis, nor would there be in all probability any such obligation in any future conference agreements, yet if we do not do so for any reason we would necessarily be left in a secondary position until the deficiency in strength should be made up, and at any given time that would involve, with the intricacies of modern naval construction, a delay of several years before the Navy could be brought up to its permitted strength. Obviously in case of a sudden call for our Navy such an agreement, if we did not exercise fully our right under it, would be of little value to us.

The representatives of the United States had no objection to the other countries party to the conference building smaller vessels if they saw fit to do so, but were unwilling to bind the United States to an agreement that would force her in order to maintain her position of equality to build ships for which she had no use.

This failure to reach an agreement on types of cruiser and on the total tonnage of cruisers to be allowed caused the conference to break up without reaching an agreement. Tentative agreements could have been reached and practically were reached in regard to submarines and destroyers, including destroyer leaders, but as the main proposition—the cruiser proposition—failed, no final agreement was reached in respect to any class of ship in the conference.

We went into this Geneva conference in an honest attempt to bring about a further limitation of armament. We figured that in the Washington conference almost the entire sacrifice had been made by ourselves. In the Geneva conference we hoped that Great Britain, which was in much the same position in regard to cruisers at that time that we occupied in regard to capital ships at the time of the Washington conference, would sacrifice her cruiser superiority as we had sacrificed our capital-ship superiority, but we hoped in vain. The shoe was now very much on the other foot. We were not at this second conference in the lordly position that we occupied at the first one. We had no great partially completed program that we were willing to sacrifice in the interests of world economy. We were asking another country to assume that rôle and the other country did not feel that it could assume it, so the conference failed, as all such conferences in the future will fail unless the nation which has come to the top is willing to give up that advantage for some reason which to her seems justifiable.

We were able to bring the Washington conference to a more or less successful conclusion because we were on top at that time. Great Britain could have done the same thing at the Geneva conference at the price of sacrificing her cruiser superiority. In the same way France could undoubtedly bring about an agreement for a limitation in land forces if she were disposed to give up her military preeminence; but Spain could not do it, or England, or Italy, or any other country that was unable or unwilling to bring up its military strength to that of France.

The great striking force of the Navy is the Battle Fleet, which is made up not only of battleships but of aircraft carriers, cruisers, destroyers, submarines, and auxiliaries.

The striking unit of the Battle Fleet, in so far as gun power is concerned, is the battleship. Next is the cruiser.

While no agreement was reached at the Washington conference limiting the number or aggregate tonnage of vessels of this class, an agreement was reached that in the future no cruisers should be built of over 10,000 tons' displacement or mounting any guns heavier than 8-inch guns. The reason for the treaty limitation on type of cruiser adopted at the Washington conference was that Great Britain already at that time had built and building four cruisers of approximately 9,750 tons, mounting 7.5-inch guns. The modern tendency is to build cruisers of the treaty tonnage, and all of the nations party to the conference have laid down, built, and are building ships of this class.

The duties of cruisers are when with the fleet to guard the fleet movements as scouts, and to act as a protective screen for the fleet. In fleet action cruisers are necessary to attack on their own part the cruisers of the enemy, to break down destroyer attacks, and to carry in their own destroyer attacks, and to a certain extent they may also be used to augment the fire of the battle line.

When the fleet is away from its home base cruisers are needed to guard the lines of communication and to escort convoys. Away from the fleet they are the vessels primarily used to break the enemy's line of communication, to protect our commerce, and to destroy the enemy's commerce.

The treaty cruisers are very fast ships, in some instances reaching a speed of 35 knots. They carry 8-inch guns, which, though they have not the striking power of the heavier guns of the battleships and battle cruisers, have, through elevation of guns, almost the range of the larger guns.

With their great speed the treaty cruiser can keep out of the way of battleships and even battle cruisers, which while much faster vessels than battleships do not attain the speed of the treaty cruiser.

And with their 8-inch guns they themselves can destroy all other surface types of naval vessels that come within the range of their guns.

Mr. President, the needs of our Navy for cruisers, as pointed out to Congress by experts in the Navy Department, is for 26 vessels to accompany the United States fleet, with 2 additional cruisers as destroyer flagships, and 15 for detached service, including protection of our commerce and guarding convoys, making a total of 43 cruisers.

Should we build this number of vessels we would then have in modern cruisers 33 of a tonnage of 330,000 tons, and 10 of a tonnage of 75,000 tons; in all, 405,000 tons.

At the present time we have built and building 8 of the treaty cruisers aggregating 80,000 tons and 10 of the 7,500-ton cruisers, giving us a total first-line cruiser tonnage of 155,000 tons when the 8 now building are completed.

These 18 modern cruisers will not be enough to take care of the needs of the fleet alone by some 10 vessels, and will allow us no additional cruisers for destroyer flagships for detached service or for the protection of our commerce. In this very important branch of the service we are distinctly lacking, and until the deficiency is made up the fleet can neither operate effectively nor can our commerce receive that protection which it manifestly should have.

Great Britain has 13 treaty cruisers of 10,000 tons and 1 of 8,300 tons built and building. She has, further, 1 of 8,300 tons appropriated for and 5 more authorized, 1 of 10,000 tons and 4 of 8,000 tons.

If she keeps up her program, she will have in 1931 20 of these cruisers, and aside from this she has 39 first-line cruisers of 190,810 tons, running from 9,770 tons down to 3,750 tons each, none of which carry 8-inch guns, although 4 of the larger vessels carry seven 7.5-inch guns and are very much more powerful than are our 7,500-ton cruisers, giving her an aggregate tonnage of first-line cruisers of 337,410 tons.

Japan has, built and building, 8 of the treaty cruisers and 21 smaller first-line cruisers running from 3,100 tons to 7,100 tons each, with an aggregate tonnage of 196,205 tons.

The Geneva conference having broken up with no agreement reached, England having insisted that her naval strength must be based on her national needs and that therefore any possible agreement would involve an increase rather than a decrease in naval strength, it was up to us to quit marking time with our Navy and decide on its future building policy. The Navy Department accordingly, with the consent and approval of the President, presented to Congress a building program based on our national needs, which would have rounded out our Navy in certain classes of ships wherein we are not up to the mark, by replacing old and obsolete ships with modern up-to-date ships and by adding certain vessels in categories where we are lacking.

The House has greatly cut down the program and the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs recommends the acceptance of the amended building program as adopted by the House. The present bill authorizes the construction of 15 cruisers at a cost of $17,000,000 each. These cruisers are to be treaty cruisers, carrying 8-inch guns.

When these ships shall have been completed we will have 305,000 tons of cruisers, as against Great Britain's 337,410 tons plus any additions thereto that she may make in the meanwhile; and as against 196,205 tons for Japan with any additions that she may make.

Obviously the addition of these ships will not bring us up anywhere near to the ratio of 5–5 of the Washington conference as applied to Great Britain or to the ratio of 5–3 as applied to Japan, nor will it reach in cruiser tonnage any conceivable limitation that from past indications we may reasonably hope to bring about in the future with Great Britain.

Neither, as I have said before, will it meet our naval needs as indicated to us by the experts of the Navy Department.

It will, however, make up to a certain extent for our deplorable lack of vessels of this class.

In addition, the bill provides for the construction of one aircraft carrier, at a cost of $19,000,000, as a first step in taking care of a serious shortage.

Under the Washington treaty we are allowed 135,000 tons of aircraft carriers. We have at the present time the Lexington and Saratoga, with a tonnage of 33,000 tons each, and the Langley, which is an experimental vessel of very slow speed, and which will probably be scrapped as soon as she can be replaced.

The tonnage of the new carrier is to be approximately 13,800 tons. When built we shall have an aggregate carrier tonnage of 79,800 tons, or 92,500 tons if the Langley is still kept in commission.

The British have an aggregate tonnage of 107,550 tons, and Japan of 63,300 tons. The building of this vessel will not bring us up to our ratio strength with either nation, as determined by the Washington treaty for vessels of this class.

The bill provides for no authorization for the destroyer leaders that were recommended in the original program. The House Committee on Naval Affairs in its report makes the following statement—

> Your committee makes no recommendations that additional vessels of the destroyer type be authorized, because the act of August 29, 1916, authorized 12 such vessels "to have the highest practicable speed and the greatest desirable radius of action," for the construction of which no appropriations have yet been made. Your committee regards this authorization as sufficient authority for the appropriation of funds to build the needed destroyer leaders.

Neither does it provide for any of the submarines called for in the original program. The House committee report goes on to say—

> The act of August 29, 1916, likewise authorized three "fleet submarines" for the construction of which no appropriations have yet been made. Your committee believes this authorization sufficient to justify appropriations for three submarines of a smaller type, between the S and V classes, of which we have none in commission at the present time.

It seems to me that the position taken by the House Committee on Naval Affairs is sound. Undoubtedly vessels of these two classes should be laid down in the near future.

Since the Washington conference we have started no new ships for our Navy with the exception of the eight 10,000-ton treaty cruisers now appropriated for and building, six small river gunboats, and three submarines already authorized in the 1916 program. In addition we have under the terms of the treaty completed two aircraft carriers of 33,000 tons each that had been previously laid down as battle cruisers.

In other words, we have started very little modern construction since the Washington conference. Great Britain, on the other hand, has built 2 new battleships, which she had the right to do under the Washington treaty, and has built, is building, or has appropriated for thirteen 10,000-ton and two 8,300-ton treaty cruisers and has authorized 5 more, one of 10,000 tons and 4 of 8,000 tons; 1 destroyer leader, 10 destroyers, 15 submarines and certain auxiliary vessels.

Japan has built, is building, or has appropriated for 16 first-line cruisers, included in which are eight 10,000-ton treaty cruisers, also 24 destroyer leaders, 27 destroyers, 33 submarines, and certain auxiliary vessels. Japan has also converted two battle cruisers into aircraft carriers.

France has built, is building, or has appropriated for 8 cruisers, 3 of 7,234 tons, 2 of 9,941 tons, and 3 of 10,000 tons; 18 destroyer leaders, 26 destroyers, 57 submarines, and certain auxiliary vessels.

Italy has built, is building, or has appropriated for 6 cruisers, 2 of 10,000 tons and 4 of 5,000 tons, 12 destroyer leaders, 16 destroyers, 21 submarines, and certain auxiliary vessels.

A table showing the total tonnage of vessels (by classes) laid down or appropriated for since February 6, 1922 (date of Washington conference) follows:

[13] In addition British Empire has 5 cruisers (42,000 tons), exclusive of those canceled which are to be laid down in 1928 and 1929. Two cruisers appropriated for in 1927 and canceled have been eliminated from table.

[14] Contracts let and material assembled but keels not laid.

The argument is often made that if we do not build ships other countries will not. The reverse has proved to be the case. While we have practically stood still the other naval nations have all gone ahead with big programs of modern construction. In my opinion, in no other way than by showing the other nations in no uncertain way that we will not allow them to outbuild us can we force them to give up their race for competitive armament. We have proved once in the Washington conference that we can force a cutting down of armament if we have a force that they can not hope to equal. We can do it again if we will show definitely that however much they may build we do not intend to allow ourselves to be outdistanced.

But by shilly-shallying along and letting our Navy drop behind we cease to be a factor in the situation. With something to offer we put through the Washington conference. With nothing to offer the Geneva conference came to naught.

Our aggregate wealth is greater than that of any other half dozen nations in the world combined. Our foreign commerce is increasing by leaps and bounds. We are the acknowledged money center of the world. By every precept in history we could properly arrogate to ourselves the right to the control of the seas for the protection of our vast possessions and our expanding commerce. No one could gainsay us should we see fit so to do, but we do not see fit so to do. We are a peaceful nation, wanting peace and the benefits of peace. All that we desire is a Navy equal to that of any other power in the world, that will give security to our country and protection to our citizens and our interests at home and abroad. Such a Navy will insure protection in war time and in peace time to the American merchant marine. And let me say here that just as you can not maintain a strong merchant marine without an adequate Navy to protect it, so you can not maintain a strong Navy without an adequate merchant marine to administer to the needs of the fleet when operating away from its home bases.

The interests and aims of the people of these United States are all for peace. Our every effort in the councils of the world will be to maintain a condition of world peace. Our influence in the councils of the world is based on our financial position, our military strength, and the power that we have to enforce any position that we may take. To doubt the use to which we will put that military strength is to doubt the will for peace of the American people. Let us by all means do everything that lies within our power to encourage treaties and agreements that will prevent war and that will result in a proportionate reduction of armament throughout the world, but until we know beyond peradventure of doubt that wars will not occur, let us keep up to the full measure of our national needs that arm of the service which must bear the first brunt of any hostile attack, and which is the real life insurance of our country—the United States Navy.

Mr. President, failure to pass this bill, with its moderate program of construction, at this session of Congress will result in real harm to our Navy. It will postpone the bringing up of our Navy, in a class of ships in which we are manifestly deficient, to a condition of efficiency. It will encourage the pacifists and the propagandists within and without the country, whose purpose it is to hamper and destroy our naval power. It will indicate to the rest of the world that we do not purpose to keep up our Navy to the ratio strength of the Washington treaty, and thereby will weaken our position in any future attempt to reduce naval armament.

The parliamentary situation at the close of the session is such that though I have tried my best to bring the bill before the Senate, I have not been able to do so. I do not think there are 20 Senators in the body who are against the passage of the bill. In my opinion this session of Congress should not adjourn until this bill is enacted into law.

TAX REDUCTION

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to reduce and equalize taxation, provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only a few moments. I desire to speak on the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] providing for publicity of income-tax returns.

The Senate may recall that for a number of years several of us have persistently urged the Senate to pass a provision of this kind. I believe the Bureau of Internal Revenue is the only department of our Government whose business is absolutely kept secret. I believe it is the only department of our Government that is hermetically sealed, not only against the public but virtually against the Congress itself. No Senator can get any information about tax returns or anything concerning that particular department of the Government. If a Senator does get any such information, he gets it by grace; he has no right to it. This should not be so.

There was a committee appointed a year or two ago composed of, I believe, five members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and five members of the Finance Committee of the Senate, to consider the situation, but it did not produce any publicity. We know virtually no more now than we did before the appointment of the committee. Long reports have been filed which it would take days and days to go into to discover anything, but such reports have been of no material benefit.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the income tax business is the only governmental function that is being exercised in any of our governments, State or National, where there is absolute secrecy. If a poor or rich man has to make a mortgage, he has to put it on record and it goes to the public. If a deed of smallest kind, with practically nothing involved, is made it has to be made public. The books and accounts of all other officers, State and National, are open to public inspection. Why should one department of the Federal Government be secret? Why should the actions of this department be secret? These tax returns are not made public because great money transactions are involved.

It is just another exemplification of the expression that we can not convict a million dollars in this country. Are we keeping its business secret because only the rich are concerned in the tax returns? Why should anyone desire to keep this information secret?

Senators, I call attention to the fact that this department has paid out billions of dollars—not hundreds of millions, but billions of dollars—in tax refunds on a basis of secrecy. Substantially no man in the country can say whether that money was rightfully paid back or not. I call attention to the fact that perhaps just as many millions and perhaps billions have been allowed in the way of allowances for depletions, and nobody knows whether they were properly allowed or improperly allowed. A few men in the Treasury Department or rather a few men in the Internal Revenue Bureau pass upon these great questions involving hundreds of millions of dollars, and every step in which is kept in absolute secrecy, and the Congress of the United States sits idly by and permits it to be done in secret, without any publicity whatsoever, because none of us know and none of us can know under the law the facts. The truth is that this bureau of the Government is hermetically sealed, not only against the people themselves, but against the two houses of Congress, whose duty it is to control the Government and its various bureaus and departments. If these agents of the Government are doing right, why should not everybody know? If they are doing wrong, there is infinitely more reason why the public should know it. I can not understand how it is that any Senator can vote to seal hermetically one of the great departments of the Government in which not only millions, not only hundred of millions, but billions of dollars in tax refunds and in allowances for depletions are paid out or remitted. Let us have all the Government's business transacted in the open.

Who knows whether there is favoritism? Who knows whether there is inaccuracy? Who knows whether there is even fraud in these refunds or allowances? No man can say. Why should we thus conduct the people's affairs in secret? What is there about this department that the public should not know about? Senators, it is incomprehensible to me how any Senator under his oath of office would be willing to continue the condition of affairs that has existed for the last seven years in regard to secret refunds and secret allowances. Every other tax is public; every other function of government is public; every other Government record is public; but when it comes to the returns of income taxes they are as secret as it is possible for human ingenuity to make them. It is "private" public government, as has been suggested; that is what it is. We ought to put an end to it. I hope that the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] will be adopted. I do not believe in secrecy in conducting of government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I now send to the Secretary's desk a proposed amendment to the tax bill. It is a long amendment and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD. My amendment as now offered is House bill 13039, the World War veterans' bill, as it passed the House of Representatives on the 16th of last April.

I offer this World War veterans' bill as an amendment to the pending tax bill because, as events may unfortunately happen, the bill H. R. 13039 might be lost in the rush of business incident to the closing of a session of Congress, and I desire that the Senate shall have an eligible opportunity to vote upon the World War veterans' bill, H. R. 13039. The learned senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] on April 2 last pointed out that the decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit on March 5 last, in the case of United States against Sligh, held that the statute of limitations began to run, not from the time when the veterans' claim was rejected by the Veterans' Bureau, but from the time when the claim accrued. My amendment would extend the statute of limitations, and would also carry into effect the other essential demands and reforms proposed in the bill H. R. 13039. I now ask that my amendment be printed in the RECORD, and I also ask that the House report on the bill H. R. 13039 be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. ASHURST to House bill 1, the tax reduction bill.

At the proper place at the end of the bill, add the following:

"That section 19 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 445, title 38, of the U. S. C.), be amended by adding the following:

"'No suit shall be allowed under this section unless the same shall have been brought within six years after the right accrued for which the claim is made, or within one year from the date of the approval of this amendatory act, whichever is the later date: Provided, That for the purposes of this section it shall be deemed that the right accrued on the happening of the contingency on which the claim is founded: Provided further, That this limitation is suspended for the period elapsing between the filing in the bureau of the claim sued upon and the denial of said claim by the director. Infants, insane persons, or persons under other legal disability, or persons rated as incompetent or insane by the bureau shall have three years in which to bring suit after the removal of their disabilities. If suit is seasonably begun and fails for defect in process, or for other reasons not affecting the merits, a new action, if one lies, may be brought within a year though the period of limitations has elapsed. Judgments heretofore rendered against the person or persons claiming under the contract of war-risk insurance on the ground that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations shall not be a bar to the institution of another suit on the same claim. No State or other statute of limitations shall be applicable to suits filed under this section. This section shall apply to all suits now pending against the United States under the provisions of this section.'

"SEC. 2. That section 21, subdivision (2), of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 450, title 38, of the U. S. C.), be hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(2) Whenever it appears that any guardian, curator, conservator, or other person is not, in the opinion of the director, properly executing the duties of his trust or has collected or is attempting to collect fees, commissions, or allowances that are inequitable or are in excess of those allowed by law for the duties performed or expenses incurred, or has failed to make such payments as may be necessary for the benefit of the ward or the dependents of the ward, then and in that event the director is hereby empowered by his duly authorized attorney to appear in the court which has appointed such fiduciary and make proper presentation of such matters to the court: Provided, That the director, in his discretion, may suspend payments to any such guardian, curator, conservator, or other person who shall neglect or refuse, after reasonable notice, to render an account to the director from time to time showing the application of such payments for the benefit of such minor or incompetent beneficiary.

"'Authority is hereby granted for the payment of any court or other expenses incident to any investigation or court proceeding for the appointment of any guardian, curator, conservator, or other person legally vested with the care of the claimant or his estate or the removal of such fiduciary and appointment of another, and of expenses in connection with the administration of such estates by such fiducaries, when such payment is authorized by the director.'

"SEC. 3. That section 28 of the World War veterans' act as amended (sec. 453, title 38, of the U. S. C.) is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 28. There shall be no recovery of payments from any person, who, in the judgment of the director, is without fault on his part, and where, in the judgment of the director, such recovery would defeat the purpose of benefits otherwise authorized or would be against equity and good conscience. No disbursing officer shall be held liable for any amount paid by him to any person where the recovery of such amount is waived under this section.

"'When under the provisions of this section the recovery of a payment made from the United States Government life-insurance fund is waived, the United States Government life-insurance fund shall be reimbursed for the amount involved from the current appropriation for military and naval insurance.'

"SEC. 4. That a new section be added to Title I of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (title 38, U. S. C.), to be known as section 34 and to read as follows:

"'SEC. 34. The director is hereby authorized to contract for the services of translators without regard to the provisions of the act of August 5, 1882 (secs. 39, 45, 46, 50, title 5, U. S. C.), and the classification act of 1923 (secs. 43, 45, 46, title 5, U. S. C.). This section shall be deemed to be in effect as of June 7, 1924.'

"SEC. 5. That a new section be added to Title I of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (title 38, U. S. C.), to be known as section 35 and to read as follows:

"'SEC. 35. The director is hereby authorized to purchase transcripts of the record, including all evidence, of trial of litigated cases. This section shall be deemed to be in effect as of June 7, 1924.'

"SEC. 6. That section 201, subdivisions (1) and (3), of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 472, title 38, U. S. C.), be hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(1) If death occur or shall have occurred subsequent to April 6, 1917, and before discharge or resignation from the service, the United States Veterans' Bureau shall pay for burial and funeral expenses and the return of body to his home a sum not to exceed $100, as may be fixed by regulation. Where a veteran of any war, including those women who served as Army nurses under contracts between April 21, 1898, and February 2, 1901, who was not dishonorably discharged, dies after discharge or resignation from the service, the director, in his discretion and with due regard to the circumstances of each case, shall pay for burial and funeral expenses and the transportation of the body (including preparation of the body) to the place of burial, a sum not exceeding $107 to cover such items and to be paid to such person or persons as may be fixed by regulation: Provided, That when such person dies while receiving from the bureau compensation or vocational training the above benefits shall be payable in all cases: Provided further, That where such person, while receiving from the bureau medical, surgical, or hospital treatment, or vocational training, dies away from home and at the place to which he was ordered by the bureau, or while traveling under orders of the bureau, the above benefits shall be payable in all cases and in addition thereto the actual and necessary cost of the transportation of the body of the person (including preparation of the body) to the place of burial, within the continental limits of the United States, its Territories, or possessions, and including also, in the discretion of the director, the actual and necessary cost of transportation of an attendant: Provided further, That no accrued pension, compensation, or insurance due at the time of death shall be deducted from the sum allowed: Provided further, That the director may, in his discretion, make contracts for burial and funeral services within the limits of the amounts allowed herein without regard to the laws prescribing advertisement for proposals for supplies and services for the United States Veterans' Bureau: And provided further, That section 5, title 41, of the United States Code, shall not be applied to contracts for burial and funeral expenses heretofore entered into by the director so as to deny payment for services rendered thereunder, and all suspensions of payment heretofore made in connection with such contracts are hereby removed, and any and all payments which are now or may hereafter become due on such contracts are hereby expressly authorized.

"'(3) The payment of compensation to or for a child shall continue until such child reaches the age of 18 years or married, or if such child be permanently incapable of self-support by reason of mental or physical defect, then during such incapacity: Provided, That the payment of compensation shall be further continued after the age of 18 years and until completion of education or training, to any child who is or may hereafter be pursuing a course of instruction at a school, college, academy, seminary, technical institute, or university, particularly designated by him and approved by the director, which shall have agreed to report to the director the termination of attendance of such child, and if any such institution of learning fails to make such report promptly the approval shall be withdrawn: And provided further, That no compensation shall be paid to or for any child who reaches the age of 21 years.'

"SEC. 7. That the first paragraph of section 202, subdivision (7), of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 480, title 38, U. S. C.), be hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(7). Where any disabled person having neither wife, child, nor dependent parent shall, after July 1, 1924, have been maintained by the Government of the United States for a period or periods amounting to six months in an institution or institutions, and shall be deemed by the director to be insane, the compensation for such person shall thereafter be $30 per month so long as he shall thereafter be maintained by the bureau in an institution; and such compensation may, in the discretion of the director, be paid to the chief officer of said institution to be used for the benefit of such person: Provided, however, That if such person shall recover his reason and shall be discharged from such institution as competent, such additional sum shall be paid him as would equal the total sum by which his compensation has been reduced through the provisions of this subsection.'

"SEC. 8. That section 202, subdivision 12, of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 486, title 38, U. S. C.), be hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(12) Where the disabled person is a patient in a hospital, or where for any other reason the disabled person and his wife are not living together, or where the children are not in the custody of the disabled person, the amount of the compensation may be apportioned as may be prescribed by regulations.'

"SEC. 9. That section 206 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 495, title 38, U. S. C.), is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 10. That section 209 of the World War veterans' act, as amended (sec. 498, title 38, U. S. C.), is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 11. That section 212 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 422, title 38, U. S. C.), be amended by adding thereto the following proviso:

"'Provided, further, That where the widow, child, or children, of a deceased veteran are entitled to compensation by virtue of an accrued right under the war risk insurance act, as amended, the rates of compensation shall be the same as those provided by section 201 of this act.'

"SEC. 12. That section 300 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 511, title 38, U. S. C.), be hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 300. In order to give to every commissioned officer and enlisted man and to every member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) and of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) when employed in active service under the War Department or Navy Department protection for themselves and their dependents, the United States, upon application to the bureau and without medical examination, shall grant United States Government life insurance (converted insurance) against the death or total permanent disability of any such person in any multiple of $500, and not less than $1,000 or more than $10,000 upon the payment of the premiums as hereinafter provided. Such insurance must be applied for within 120 days after enlistment or after entrance into or employment in the active service and before discharge or resignation: Provided, That any member of the reserve forces whose application was accepted at a time when he was in attendance at a military or naval training camp or station, and from whom premiums were collected, and who becomes or has become totally and permanently disabled, or dies or has died, shall be deemed to have made valid application therefor. This proviso shall not authorize the granting of more than $10,000 insurance to any one person: Provided further, That each officer and enlisted man of the Coast Guard who is serving on active duty at the time of the passage of this amendatory act, or who subsequent thereto enters the Coast Guard Service, shall be granted insurance in accordance with the terms of this section upon application within 120 days of the passage of this amendatory act, or date of enlistment or entry into the Coast Guard, whichever is the later date, and before retirement, discharge, or resignation.

"'Yearly renewable term insurance shall be payable only to a spouse, child, grandchild, parent, brother, sister, uncle, aunt, nephew, niece, brother-in-law, or sister-in-law, or to any or all of them, and also during total and permanent disability to the injured person.

"'Where the beneficiary for yearly renewal term insurance at the time of designation by the insured is within the permitted class of beneficiaries and is the designated beneficiary at the time of the maturity of the insurance because of the death of the insured, such beneficiary shall be deemed to be within the permitted class even though the status of such beneficiary shall have been changed.

"'The United States shall bear the expenses of administration and the excess mortality and disability cost resulting from the hazards of war. The premium rates shall be the net rates based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 3½ per cent per annum. This section, as amended, shall be deemed to be in effect as of June 7, 1924.'

"SEC. 13. That section 301 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 512, title 38, U. S. C.), be hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 301. Except as provided in the second paragraph of this section, not later than July 2, 1927, all term yearly renewable insurance held by persons who were in the military service after April 6, 1917, shall be converted, without medical examination, into such form or forms of insurance as may be prescribed by regulations and as the insured may request. Regulations shall provide for the right to convert into ordinary life, 20-payment life, endowment maturing at age 62, 5-year level premium term, and into other usual forms of insurance, and for reconversion of any such policies to a higher premium rate in accordance with regulations to be issued by the director, and shall prescribe the time and method of payment of the premiums thereon, but payments of premiums in advance shall not be required for periods of more than one month each, and may be deducted from the pay or deposit of the insured or be otherwise made at his election.

"'All yearly renewable term insurance shall cease on July 2, 1927, except when death or total permanent disability shall have occurred before July 2, 1927: Provided, however, That the director may by regulation extend the time for the continuing of yearly renewable term insurance and the conversion thereof in any case where on July 2, 1927, conversion of such yearly renewable term insurance is impracticable or impossible due to the mental condition or disappearance of the insured.

"'In case where an insured whose yearly renewable term insurance has matured by reason of total permanent disability is found and declared to be no longer permanently and totally disabled, and where the insured is required under regulations to renew payment of premiums on said term insurance, and where this contingency is extended beyond the period during which said yearly renewable term insurance otherwise must be converted, there shall be given such insured an additional period of two years from the date on which he is required to renew payment of premiums in which to convert said term insurance as hereinbefore provided: Provided, That where the time for conversion has been extended under the second paragraph of this section because of the mental condition or disappearance of the insured, there shall be allowed to the insured an additional period of two years from the date on which he recovers from his mental disability or reappears in which to convert.

"'The insurance except as provided herein shall be payable in 240 equal monthly installments: Provided, That when the amount of an individual monthly payment is less than $5, such amount may, in the discretion of the director, be allowed to accumulate without interest and be disbursed annually. Provisions for maturity at certain ages, for continuous installments during the life of the insured or beneficiaries, or both, for cash, loan, paid-up and extended values, dividends from gains and savings, and such other provisions for the protection and advantage of and for alternative benefits to the insured and the beneficiaries as may be found to be reasonable and practicable, may be provided for in the contract of insurance, or from time to time by regulations. All calculations shall be based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 3½ per cent per annum, except that no deduction shall be made for continuous installments during the life of the insured in case his total and permanent disability continues more than 240 months. Subject to regulations, the insured shall at all times have the right to change the beneficiary or beneficiaries without the consent of such beneficiary or beneficiaries, but only within the classes herein provided.

"'If no beneficiary be designated by the insured as beneficiary for converted insurance granted under the provisions of Article IV of the war risk insurance act, or Title III of this act, either in his lifetime or by his last will and testament, or if the designated beneficiary does not survive the insured, then there shall be paid to the estate of the insured the present value of the remaining unpaid monthly installments; or if the designated beneficiary survives the insured and dies before receiving all of the installments of converted insurance payable and applicable, then there shall be paid to the estate of such beneficiary the present value of the remaining unpaid monthly installments: Provided, That no payments shall be made to any estate which under the laws of the residence of the insured or the beneficiary, as the case may be, would escheat, but same shall escheat to the United States and be credited to the United States Government life insurance fund.

"'The bureau may make provision in the contract for converted insurance for optional settlements, to be selected by the insured, whereby such insurance may be made payable either in one sum or in installments for 36 months or more. The bureau may also include in said contract a provision authorizing the beneficiary to elect to receive payment of the insurance in installments for 36 months or more, but only if the insured has not exercised the right of election as hereinbefore provided; and even though the insured may have exercised his right of election the said contract may authorize the beneficiary to elect to receive such insurance in installments spread over a greater period of time than that selected by the insured. This section shall be deemed to be in effect as of June 7, 1924.'

"SEC. 14. That a new section be added to the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (title 38, U. S. C.), to be known as section 310 and to read as follows:

"'SEC. 310. Notwithstanding the provisions of sections 300 and 301 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (secs. 511 and 512, title 38, U. S. C.), the United States, upon application to the bureau, shall grant United States Government life (converted) insurance against death or permanent total disability in any multiple of $500 and not less than $1,000 or more than $10,000 to any person who has heretofore applied or been eligible to apply for yearly renewable term insurance or United States Government life (converted) insurance: Provided, That such person is in good health and furnishes evidence satisfactory to the director to this effect: Provided further, That no person may carry more than $10,000 of United States Government life insurance at one time.'

"SEC. 15. That a new section be added to the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (title 38, U. S. C.), to be known as section 311 and to read as follows:

"'SEC. 311. Wherever an insured under a yearly renewable term insurance contract or a United States Government life (converted) insurance policy is totally disabled for a period of 12 consecutive months he shall be entitled to receive total permanent disability benefits under his contract as though he were totally and permanently disabled, such payments to be effective as of the date such total disability began and to be made monthly in accordance with the terms of the contract during the continuance of such total disability. During the period of payments under this section premiums on such insurance shall be waived: Provided, however, That no retroactive payments shall be made under this section except where there is a period of total disability followed by permanent total disability, in which event payments shall be made effective not more than one year prior to the passage of this amendatory act: Provided further, That no application, conversion, or reinstatement shall be invalidated by reason of the provisions of this section. Provision shall be made by regulation for the reexamination of an insured under this section from time to time as the director may deem necessary, and in the event it is found that an insured is no longer totally disabled payment of benefits shall cease and the provisions of the yearly renewable term insurance contract or the United States Government life-insurance policy, with reference to recovery from permanent total disability, shall apply: Provided, That the benefits of this section shall not prejudice any other cause of permanent total disability.'"

[H. Rept. No. 1274, 70th Cong., 1st sess.]

AMEND WORLD WAR VETERANS' ACT, 1924

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, from the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 13039):

The Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13039) to amend the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, having considered the same, report thereon with recommendation that it be passed as amended. The bill as now presented proposes several substantial changes to which the attention of the House of Representatives should be specifically directed. They are as follows:

1. Section 1 of the bill amends section 19 of the act by establishing a uniform statute of limitations for suits on contracts of insurance. At the present time, under the conformity act, the statutes of limitations of the various States apply. The periods of limitations in these statutes vary from 3 to 20 years, the average being 6 years. The committee believes that the average statute of limitation, namely, six years, should be applied to these suits, with an additional year from the date of passage of this amendatory act for all suits. In computing the limitation period it is provided that the time from the date of filing claim for insurance benefits to the date of disallowance of the claim by the director shall not be included. Further, it is provided that the period of limitation shall not run during the time a person is under legal disability or is rated as incompetent by the bureau, and that such person shall have three years from date of removal of disability in which to sue. The amended section is made applicable to suits which have been heretofore rejected under the State statutes of limitations, pending suits, as well as future suits.

2. Section 2 of the bill, as amended, amends section 21, subdivision 2, of the World War veterans' act to provide authority in the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau for the payment of the expenses of original appointments of guardians, curators, and conservators of incompetent beneficiaries. At the present time the law provides for the payment of such expenses incident to any investigation or court proceeding for the removal of a guardian, curator, or conservator who has not properly executed the duties of his trust, and the appointment of a new guardian, curator, or conservator, but it is not within the power of the director to secure the appointment of such a fiduciary in the first instance and pay the expenses of the proceeding. The cost of this item is estimated at $164,000 per annum.

3. Section 3 of the bill, as amended, amends section 28 of the World War veterans' act, as amended, under which authority now exists for waiver of recovery of payments from any beneficiary who, in the judgment of the director, is without fault on his part and where, in the judgment of the director, such recovery would defeat the purpose of benefits otherwise authorized or would be against equity and good conscience, by the substitution of the word "person" for the word "beneficiary." Under the language of this section at present, as construed by the bureau and the Comptroller General, the word "beneficiary" does not comprehend persons who are not legal beneficiaries under the statute; for instance, in a case where, upon the evidence submitted, the bureau has paid insurance or compensation to a person who was alleged to be the widow of an ex-service man, but who, it subsequently appears, was not his widow, for the reason that prior to her marriage to the veteran he was married to another woman from whom he was not legally divorced, recovery can not be waived because the woman, not being the veteran's widow, could legally not be a beneficiary within the meaning of that term as used in the World War veterans' act, as amended. It is obviously unjust, however, to attempt to recover in such a case, both the payee and the bureau being without fault. The substitution of the word "person" for the word "beneficiary" will cure the situation. There is also included language to the effect that no disbursing officer shall be held liable for any amount paid by him to any person where the recovery of such amount is waived under this section. The purpose of this amendment is to relieve disbursing officers from liability on their bonds through payments made through error, the recovery of which has been waived under authority of section 28. At the present time the Comptroller General holds that, although recovery may be waived in so far as the payee is concerned, the disbursing officer is nevertheless liable under his bond for the erroneous disbursement. It is estimated that this would result in an immediate cost of $218,500 and an annual cost of $84,850 thereafter.

4. Section 4 of the bill, as amended, adds a new section to Title I of the World War veterans' act, as amended, to be known as section 34, and to provide authority for the director to enter into private contracts for the services of translators without regard to the civil service laws and the classification act of 1923. This amendment is included to enable the director to procure the translation of correspondence from foreign languages into English, and English into foreign languages, by the piece, where the foreign language is unusual and so seldom encountered in the administration of the bureau as not to justify the hiring of a translator on a salary basis. The director has found it economical to enter into private contracts in such cases rather than to employ a regular translator at an annual salary, but the Comptroller General has held that such procedure is unauthorized. It is estimated that the cost of this provision would be approximately $300. The amendment is made retroactive to June 7, 1924, in order that translators who have heretofore performed services under this arrangement may be reimbursed.

5. Section 5 of the bill, as amended, adds a new section to Title I of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, to be known as section 35, and to provide authority for the purchase of transcripts of the record, including the evidence of trial of litigated cases. This section is recommended by the bureau in order that in the future review of such cases the bureau would have the full benefit of evidence adduced at trial. It is estimated that this amendment will cost approximately $10,000 per year.

6. Section 6 of the bill amends section 201, subdivision (1), of the statute, which now provides an allowance of $100 plus $7 for a flag to drape the casket in cases where a veteran dies after discharge or resignation from the service and does not leave assets which, in the judgment of the director, should be applied to meet the expenses of burial and funeral and the transportation of the body, so as to provide for the payment of $107 in all cases in which the director, in his discretion and with due regard to the circumstances of each case, may decide that the sum should be allowed. Provision is also made that the director may make contracts for burial and funeral services without regard to the laws providing for advertisement and acceptance of the lowest bid, in order that the director shall be no longer bound by the law requiring him to accept the lowest bid offered, but, on the other hand, may accept the bid which will provide the best funeral within the amount allowed for burial and funeral expenses. Further provision is made so as to permit payments under contracts heretofore made on this basis by the director in an effort to provide respectable burials, but which have been disallowed by the Comptroller General.

This section of the bill also proposes to amend subdivision (3) of section 201 by the addition of a new proviso authorizing the payment of compensation to children after the age of 18 years, and until completion of education or training, where such children are or may hereafter be pursuing a course of instruction at a school, college, academy, seminary, technical institute, or university particularly designated by them and approved by the director. This allowance is to be continued until such children reach the age of 21 years, or terminate their attendance at school. It is estimated that this provision would result in a total increased cost to the Government of $1,007,900.

7. Section 7 proposes to amend section 202, subdivision (7), first paragraph, by increasing the amount of compensation now paid to disabled veterans who have no dependents and who are being maintained by the Government in hospitals from $20 to $30 per month. This amendment would result in an increased cost to the Government of $699,000 annually.

8. Section 8 of the bill proposes to amend subdivision (12) of section 202 by substituting the word "may" for the word "shall," so as to give the director discretion in making apportionments of compensation where the disabled person and his wife are not living together, or where the children are not in the custody of the disabled person. At the present time the language of this subdivision is mandatory and leaves no discretion in the director as to whether an apportionment shall be made regardless of the circumstances in the case. The object of the amendment is to permit the director to inquire into the reasons for the separation, and to make apportionments only in those cases where the facts warrant, and although it places on the bureau the functions of a court of domestic relations it nevertheless is important from the standpoint of justice to those veterans who are separated from their wives through the misconduct of the latter that the law no longer contain a mandate requiring apportionment in favor of a wife without regard to the circumstances of the separation. There would be no increased cost due to this amendment.

9. Sections 9 and 10 of the bill provide for the repeal of sections 206 and 209 of the statute, which now contain limitations on filing claim and proof thereof. It is estimated that the repeal of these two sections will result in an increased cost to the Government of $3,342,516 the first year.

10. Section 11 of the bill adds a proviso to section 212 of the World War veterans' act to provide that where the widow, child, or children of a deceased veteran are entitled to compensation by virtue of an accrued right under the war risk insurance act, as amended, the rates of compensation shall be the same as now paid to widows and children who are receiving compensation under the World War veterans' act, as amended. This amendment is proper in view of the fact that the dependents of veterans who died of injuries received during the period of time covered by the war risk insurance act, but not between April 6, 1917, and July 2, 1921, the period of the World War as defined by the World War veterans' act, are now paid at the rate provided by the old statute. It is fair to put all these dependents on the same basis. This amendment will result in an increased cost to the Government of $12,000 annually.

11. Section 12 amends section 300 of the act by removing the restriction on the designation of a beneficiary for converted insurance to a permitted class. The permitted class of beneficiaries will still remain in the statute in so far as yearly renewable term insurance is concerned. The committee is of the opinion that in view of the fact that the insured under converted insurance is paying an ample premium for the protection afforded, he should be given the same right with regard to designating a beneficiary, or changing a beneficiary, as he would have under a commercial insurance policy. This amendment will make unnecessary the amendment providing that trustees be included among the permitted class of beneficiaries for converted insurance. There will be no additional cost attached to this amendment.

12. Section 13 of the bill amends section 301 of the act merely to make the provisions of that section conform to the amendatory section removing the permitted class of beneficiaries for converted insurance and to permit reconversion of converted insurance to policies of a lower premium rate, other than the five-year term, where the insured is in good health. Evidence was produced to show that immediately following the war many men bought endowment policies which carry a high premium rate; they are now finding it impossible to continue the premiums on these policies, and it was believed that by permitting them, if they are in good health, to transfer to a lower premium-rate policy they would be able to continue the insurance. No additional cost will result under this amendment.

13. Section 14 of the bill adds a new section to the act, to be known as section 310. This section authorizes the granting of converted insurance to any man who has heretofore applied, or has been eligible to apply, for either yearly renewable term or converted insurance if he is now in good health and submits evidence to this effect satisfactory to the director. The committee believes that this amendment will not only be beneficial to the veterans but also to the United States Government life converted insurance fund, as it will permit men in good health to take out converted insurance and thereby increase the number of good risks carrying this form of insurance.

14. Section 15 of the bill adds a new section to the act, to be known as section 311. Evidence was presented to the committee showing that under the present law many veterans had been rated temporarily totally disabled for long periods of time and then rated permanently and totally disabled. As a result of this, in many instances the policy lapsed before the permanent total disability was effective, and no insurance was payable. The committee believes that it was the intention of Congress that cases of this kind should be payable, and in order to insure that the benefits might be paid this amendment is recommended. The effect of the amendment is this: It leaves the two previous maturing factors for insurance, namely, death or total disability, as they are. It adds an additional maturing factor, namely, wherever an insured has been totally disabled for 12 months the benefits shall be payable from the beginning of total disability during the continuance of such total disability. The amendment is only made retroactive in those cases where there has been a period of total disability followed by a rating of permanent total disability. It does not cover retroactively cases of men who previously have been rated temporarily totally disabled but who have since recovered. A special proviso is included protecting applications, reinstatements, and conversions heretofore made. The cost of this section is figured at $9,200,000 for term insurance and $450,000 for converted insurance.

The total increased cost of this entire bill for the first year is estimated at $5,632,346.

The figures given in this report are the official figures furnished by the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. ASHURST. I also ask that a resolution adopted by the Frank Luke, Jr., Post, No. 1, of the American Legion, at Phoenix, Ariz., be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution

Whereas the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in the case of United States of America v. Sligh (filed March 5, 1928) has determined that a suit on any claim under a contract of yearly renewable term or converted insurance brought pursuant to section 19 of the World War veterans' act of 1924, as amended, becomes outlawed in accordance with the statutes of limitation in the State wherein said suit is instituted, if the claim, antecedent to suit, was not filed with the Veterans' Bureau within the period fixed by said State statute; and

Whereas it appears that the State statutes of limitations are not uniform in that in some States suits upon written contracts of insurance are barred whin three years, whilst in other States said actions may be maintained at any time within 6, 10, or 15 years; and

Whereas such condition is manifestly unjust in that the benefits of the war risk insurance act are unequally distributed in that the award depends upon the law of the State wherein the veteran resides; and

Whereas the valuable rights of hundreds of veterans will be prejudiced by such application of the varying State statutes of limitation; and

Whereas it is further apparent that the disabilities incurred upon which such suits are brought were received while serving a common cause, and in consequence thereof the treatment accorded to those claimants should of a certainty be uniform and just; and

Whereas in the process of rehabilitation of disabled veterans many are not aware of their true condition—that is to say, of the permanency of their total disability until after years of treatment—and until most State statutes of limitations of four and six years would bar such claims it is eminently reasonable and just to allow a 10-year period for the determination of permanency of their total disability; and

Whereas dating such 10-year period from July 2, 1921, would be dating same from the day the Great War was officially ended: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States of America be, and it hereby is, petitioned to amend section 19 of the World War veterans' act (June 7, 1924, ch. 320, sec. 19, 43 Stat. 612, amended March 4, 1925, ch. 553, sec. 2, 43 Stat. 1302) by adding to such section the following:

"Provided further, That no State or Federal statutes of limitation shall be deemed to apply to any suit filed under this section on or before July 2, 1931;

"Provided further, That after July 2, 1931, all suits under this act must be filed within six years from the accrual of the cause of action;

"Provided further, That this section, as amended, shall be deemed to be in effect as of October 6, 1917"; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to every Member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America.

FRANK LUKE, JR., POST NO. 1, AMERICAN LEGION, ARIZONA BRANCH, PHOENIX, ARIZ.
J. H. MOEUR, Commander.
E. P. MCDOWELL, Adjutant.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question. I did not hear his amendment read. Does it provide for publicity of records that have to do with the refund of taxes and the settlement of claims in controversy between the taxpayer and the Treasury Department?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment for the benefit of the Senator from Minnesota.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offers an amendment, on page 48, section 55, under the subhead "Publicity of returns." That section reads:

Returns made under this title shall be open to inspection in the same manner, to the same extent, and subject to the same provisions of law, including penalties, as returns made under Title II of the revenue act of 1926.

The Senator from Nebraska proposes to strike out, after the word "title," in line 23, down to and including line 26 on page 48, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

shall be open to examination and inspection as other public records under the same rules and regulations as may govern the examination of public documents generally.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As I understand the amendment, the publicity is confined to the income-tax returns of taxpayers.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator will find the subject matter on page 48 of the bill. Section 54 has to do with "records and special returns." There are several provisions in regard to them. Then comes "Information at the source." Then comes section 55, "Publicity of returns."

If this amendment shall be agreed to, that particular section will then read as follows:

Returns made under this title shall be open to examination and inspection as other public records under the same rules and regulations as may govern the examination of public documents generally.

The amendment applies only to those documents and records referred to in the particular section which it undertakes to amend. There is nothing said about the publicity of lawsuits or controversies that may arise. They would come under another section of the bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And there is nothing said about taxes refunded?

Mr. NORRIS. There is nothing said about taxes refunded. The bill at this particular place refers especially to and describes tax returns, and the amendment provides that those returns shall be public. That is the effect of it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator read the law as it is to-day?

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Minnesota will permit me, I will say that I was reading from the bill and not from the law as it stands now. The provision in the bill reads:

SEC. 55. PUBLICITY OF RETURNS.

Returns made under this title shall be open to inspection in the same manner, to the same extent, and subject to the same provisions of law, including penalties, as returns made under Title II of the revenue act of 1926.

The law, which I do not have before me, in effect makes publicity for practical purposes impossible. There is a provision in the law that returns can be opened to examination upon the order of the President, and, I think, under rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury. This amendment would change that provision and make the returns open to inspection and examination the same as are any other public records.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will recall that we have already adopted an amendment, known as section 323, in relation to refunds and credits. That amendment, I will say to the Senator, is a part of the bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does it provide publicity for tax refunds?

Mr. SMOOT. For tax refunds and credit.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I think the Senator will simplify the matter if he will read the amendment which has been put into the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will do so. It reads as follows:

No refund nor credit of any income, war profits, excess profits, estate, or gift tax in excess of $75,000 shall be made after the enactment of this act, until after the expiration of 30 days from the date upon which a report giving the name of the person to whom the refund or credit is to be made, the amount of such refund or credit, and a summary of the facts and the decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is submitted to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation. A report to Congress shall be made annually by such committee of such refunds and credits, including the names of all persons and corporations to whom amounts are credited or payments are made, together with the amounts credited or paid to each.

That, I will say to the Senator, has already been adopted and is a part of the bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words concerning the system of administration employed in the Treasury Department. I hesitate to say what I am going to say, for it is always unpleasant to offer a word of criticism, and what I say I wish to assure the Senate I do not say with any personal feeling at all. I am not sure that anyone or any number of people are really to blame. I think we have a system that has grown up and that has for some reason or other arrogated to itself certain practices that I think are very vicious and very un-American.

Mr. President, we have in the Treasury Department a system of government within the Government itself that through the years has been forming and developing and growing until we have a dictinct system of three distinct branches. We have the legislative system; we have the judicial system within the Treasury, and we have the executive, with a department of justice of its own.

Under this system of secrecy, of course, certain vicious practices have grown up and developed.

We pass a general tax law with broad general powers; and under those general powers employees of the Treasury make certain rules. I do not say that they do not do it in good faith. As a matter of fact, these rules have the effect of law. There you have the legislative department. Then you have the Board of Tax Appeals, a separate and distinct court to try these cases; and then you have the executive department.

One practice which has been called to my attention is this: Whenever there is a controversy with a taxpayer over the settlement of a tax claim, that controversy may be in good faith on the part of the Government and also on the part of the taxpayer. The taxpayer may in good faith have made a mistake. He may have underpaid. He may have made a mistake in making the return. Not being an accountant, he may have hired a firm of accountants to make out the return for him, and he may have made the return to the Treasury based on the findings of these expert accountants after a search of his books; but, a controversy arising between the Government and the claimant, it has often happened that when a civil case involving a certain sum of money grows out of the controversy the Treasury Department seems to exert a special effort to institute criminal proceedings and get an indictment. It is quite generally said that the reason for that is that employees of the Treasury Department have stated that if an indictment is hanging over a man it is possible to get a better settlement of the claim against the taxpayer.

Another vicious practice has grown up, and that is to try to bring the criminal proceedings before the civil proceedings. I have had occasion to make a request for advancement on behalf of taxpayers who had a controversy in the civil court, the Board of Tax Appeals, who have made the claim that if they could go into the civil court and have their case adjudicated, their whole case would stand on its own feet, and the criminal proceedings would fall of their own weight; but the Treasury Department has refused and in fact has very strenuously objected to advancing the case on the calendar of the Board of Tax Appeals in order that the civil case should be tried before the criminal case.

Mr. President, I am not able to understand the line of reasoning that would try a man on a criminal charge before he is tried on a civil charge growing out of the same controversy. I do not understand the line of reasoning that would hold an indictment over a man in order to sandbag money out of him on a claim on which he in good faith is ready to meet the Government's representatives in the court established by the Government itself. I have never been able to understand the line of reasoning by which a representative of the Treasury Department, a representative of the Government of the United States, would feel that he did not dare to meet a claimant, a taxpayer, in a civil court before he met him in a criminal court.

I think it is an old axiom of Anglo-Saxon law that a man has a right to have his case tried in a civil court first before criminal proceedings are brought against him.

I do not question the good faith of the people who have instituted and have persevered in this practice, but I do question their point of view. If the Government of the United States has a claim against any taxpayer, it should never be afraid to meet him in court, civil or criminal; and it should meet him in the civil court first, in order to give him a chance to lay his cards on the table and have the Government lay its cards on the table, in order to save him from the injustice of having to appear in a criminal court when he is innocent of crime, and can establish his innocence, and that innocence can be established in a civil court if the case is permitted to go to trial in a civil court first.

This is a system that has been permitted to develop and grow because Congress is anxious and has been for years anxious to pass laws with broad, general application, and leave them to some bureau, to some commission, to administer, and to formulate rules having the effect of laws letting bureaus and commissions legislate upon questions that affect the property and the liberty of the people of the United States.

I did not feel that I should be doing justice to the State which I in part represent, and to the people of the United States, if I did not say a few words in protest against this un-American system of government within the Government of the United States, whose proceedings to a large extent are secret.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I desire to present an amendment and ask to have it printed in the RECORD and also printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. REED of Missouri to the bill (H. R. 1) to reduce and equalize taxation, provide revenue, and for other purposes, viz: On page 245, after line 13, insert the following:

TITLE VI—AGRICULTURAL EXPORT DEBENTURES

SEC. 801. EXPORT DEBENTURES.

(a) Agricultural commodity: The term "agricultural commodity," as used in this section, includes all agricultural, horticultural, viticultural, and dairy commodities and products, all livestock and products thereof, all products of poultry and bee raising, all nuts and edible products of forestry, and all other commodities not specifically mentioned herein which are produced on farms and the processed or manufactured products of such commodities.

(b) On and after the 1st day of July next after the approval of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall issue an export debenture to any person exporting from the United States to any foreign country and not previously exported, an agricultural commodity in either the original or processed condition in an amount equal to 25 per cent of the value of such product paid to the farmer in the purchase of the same for export under such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe: Provided, The total quantity of such exportation so valued shall amount to $3,000 or more and be exported in one vessel.

(c) The Secretary of the Treasury shall receive such debentures at their face value in payment of all import duties.

SEC. 802. ADMINISTRATIVE AND PENALTY PROVISIONS.

(a) Preparation of debentures: The Secretary of Agriculture shall prepare and issue, or cause to be prepared and issued, all export debentures, and shall prescribe the terms and conditions in respect of export debentures. The Secretary is authorized to have such debentures prepared in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

(b) Obligations of United States for penal purposes: Export debentures issued under the authority of this title shall be obligations of the United States within the definition in section 147 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, as amended.

(c) Fraud: Any person who shall make any false statement for the purpose of fraudulently procuring, or shall attempt in any manner fraudulently to procure, the issuance or acceptance of any export debenture, whether for the benefit of such person or of any other person, shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

SEC. 803. APPROPRIATION.

For expenses in the administration of the functions vested in the Secretary of the Treasury by this title there is authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200,000, to be available for such expenses incurred prior to July 1, 1929.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask permission at this time to make a brief statement of the purposes of this amendment.

To state the question in a very few words, when the war was over, when it was generally anticipated that there would be a rapid reduction in prices of all kinds of goods, the representatives of the great manufacturers of this country flocked in to the Committee on Finance and protested that they desired to have the tariff advanced on practically every article used by the people; and they gave as one of their chief reasons that they desired to maintain the war level of prices upon manufactured goods after the war was over.

They succeeded in having enacted substantially the law they demanded; and this was done at about the time that the European market was in the worst possible condition. All Europe was bankrupt. Prices were at the lowest ebb. Agricultural products exported from America were being sold upon that bankrupt European market, and the price of the articles exported fixed the price in our domestic market. What happened, therefore, was that Congress by law created a condition which resulted in the artificial increase of the price of manufactured products, while the great economic law operating everywhere reduced the price of all that the farmer had to sell to the lowest level of the world's markets. The gap between this artificial level of prices at which the farmer must buy and the world level upon which he must sell is the gap of bankruptcy through which the farmers of the United States are being forced.

It is useless now to stand and discuss the whole tariff question; but the acute situation is that the farmer of to-day must sell his products on the European level, and he must buy upon an American level artificially created by two conditions. One is a tariff law which prohibits the farmer from bringing into the country goods that he may desire to purchase in the same market where he has been compelled to sell. The other is the organization of combinations this side the tariff wall which exact the last possible penny of price which can be exacted and at the same time undersell European goods enough to keep them out of this market.

To my mind, nothing is more anomalous, more nonunderstandable than that the producers of the great agricultural districts of this country have not come to understand that if they are forced to buy upon a market which is artificially raised above the general level and, at the same time, must sell upon that general level, the inevitable result is bankruptcy.

All kinds of nostrums have been proposed. Some of them may have merit as partial remedies, but the real remedy lies in affording to the farmers of this land the opportunity to buy on the same level upon which they are compelled to sell. That is a remedy which reaches through the years and that is based upon sound and irrevocable and indisputable economic principles.

Without criticizing measures that have been proposed, without saying that some measures which have been proposed may afford a temporary relief, I nevertheless assert that the relief must necessarily be temporary. What ought to be done is to go down to the basic reason for agricultural depression.

It is a natural right, sir, for a man to sell his products in the highest market, in whatsoever market, indeed, where he may see fit to sell it. It is a natural right to buy in any market that is deemed the most advantageous. We have interfered with that natural right. We deny to the farmer who raises 10,000 bushels of wheat and who sells it, directly or indirectly, in Liverpool, England, the right to buy there an equal value of goods and bring them in the United States, because, when he comes to the United States, we exact an enormous tribute for the privilege of bringing those goods into the country. That law, be it remembered, was not passed for the purpose of raising revenue at all. It was passed for the purpose of enriching certain special favored institutions and organizations. It was the law of the legislative pickpocket and marauder. It is as contrary to the principles of free government as the ball and chain and the shackles upon the wrists are contrary to human liberty.

The purpose of this amendment is to permit the exporter of farm products to bring into this country free of duty an equal value of goods. It is to permit the farmer of this country to have the right to buy in the market where he must sell. I would like to see the scribes and Pharisees and hypocrites who have been pretending to be in favor of the farmer answer on this floor why they refuse to allow the farmer, who they declare is oppressed and outraged and bankrupted, the right to buy in the place where the conditions of the world compel him to sell?

Other measures, either bills or amendments, somewhat similar to this, have been proposed. Objection has been raised to the practicability of some of them. I have tried in this measure to avoid most of the difficulties to which my attention has been called. I do not present this amendment as the perfection of human reason, but I do present it as a measure of relief and as a real measure of relief.

I do not think it is likely to pass. I think that the influences which control the Treasury Department and sent it before the committee to demand that the tariff be raised so that manufacturers could maintain war prices will be still at work. I expect that the organized lobby of all of these gentlemen and institutions that want a law to enable them to levy and force tribute upon the American people will be here, and will be as potential in the future as it has been in the past.

I expect that that party which has been financed in every campaign out of the moneys extorted from the American people by law will obey the lash and answer to the command of the gentlemen who furnish their campaign funds. But I intend, as far as my very limited powers will go, to afford to this country an example of the power and force which that lobby can command, of the subservience which it can compel, and to point out the falsity and the infamy of the claim that farmers can be protected by levying on imports into this country of farm products, when as a matter of fact we have a surplus and must export.

I want a roll call on this ultimately, to determine who it is, when a farmer asks for bread, hands him a stone; when he asks for fish, hands him a serpent. I have waited a long time to introduce such a proposition as this. Indeed, I offered one at the last session of Congress, but as there was no revenue bill to which I could attach it, I was obliged to allow it to lie in abeyance. The bill is here now, and before we conclude the consideration of this revenue measure I shall ask a vote upon this amendment, and I shall desire to make a good many more remarks on it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to detain the Senate any length of time in the discussion of the pending amendment. The issue, it seems to me, is clear-cut. The question which the Senate must decide is whether or not we are to continue to permit the cloak of secrecy to be thrown around one of the most important functions of Government.

The fight for the publicity of income-tax returns started in this body in 1921. An amendment similar to the one presented by the Senator from Nebraska was presented by my father. The amendment was rejected after considerable debate.

In the 1924 contest over the then pending revenue bill an amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, identical with the one now pending before the Senate, passed this body by a vote of 47 to 27. It went to conference, the conference report was a compromise, and, like so many compromises, it was ineffectual. It provided, not for a simple declaration that income-tax returns should be public, as are other records of the Government, but it provided, instead, that only the amount of taxes paid by the taxpayer should be published. The return was surrounded with secrecy as before. That compromise, in my judgment, defeated the entire purpose of the amendment. It was of little or no avail to the public that the amount of tax paid by a taxpayer should be a matter of public record.

The return remained as secret as before and, therefore, there was no opportunity for an examination of the return either by the officials of the State or by a Senator or a Representative or by other interested parties. In 1926 this same amendment was presented by the Senator from Nebraska and defeated by the Democratic-Republican coalition on the then Mellon tax plan.

It is evident, from the course of the debate, that there is little or no interest in the proposition presented by the Senator from Nebraska. There has been small attendance in the Senate to listen to the arguments which have been made in support of the amendment, and no Senator has chosen to rise and defend the committee's position. It seems to me that the question presented is one of vital importance and of grave public concern. I should be derelict in my duty as a representative in part of the State of Wisconsin if I should permit a vote upon the amendment without voicing my support of the proposition.

The State of Wisconsin has had experience with the provision of law providing for the secrecy of income-tax returns, and it has likewise had an experience now of over five years in which income-tax returns have been public records under a provision very similar to the one now pending. It is a significant fact that an audit of income-tax returns filed for the years 1913 to 1923 prior to the publicity of income-tax returns in Wisconsin resulted in the assessment of back taxes against income taxpayers amounting to $9,000,000 in round numbers. Following the adoption of the provision making income-tax returns to the State of Wisconsin public records the audit of returns has disclosed no like failure on the part of the taxpayers to make their just contribution to the State under the provisions of law.

When the 1926 revenue bill was under consideration my colleague was then Governor of Wisconsin. The income-tax publicity provision in our State had been in existence for three years. I telegraphed him asking what had been the experience of the State under the publicity provision. He responded, and I quote his telegram because it is equally applicable now as then. The experience of the State since 1926 has not altered the facts and conclusions which he furnished:

> Fears created by repeal of secrecy clause in State income tax law were unfounded and there is no demand to reinstate secrecy clause. Benefits flowing from publicity of income-tax returns have been substantial and direct. Greater care has been taken in making income returns by taxpayers, resulting in more accurate and full returns of incomes. Publicity of income-tax returns has promoted generous and valuable assistance to income-tax officers by the public. Suspicion that prevailed under secrecy clause has been swept aside as taxpayers now know that they may know whether their neighbors make full and accurate returns. Carefulness and honesty in making income returns have been promoted. The most significant fact is that since repeal of secrecy clause income-tax field auditors have been unable to find back income taxes withheld in any way comparable with amount of back income taxes withheld under secrecy clause.

The same arguments against making income-tax returns public records were put forward, in the Wisconsin Legislature when it had under consideration the repeal of the secrecy provisions regarding income-tax returns, that were made in this body in 1921, in 1924, and in 1926. The opponents of publicity for income-tax returns charged that if they were made public, competitors in business would seek to obtain each others secrets, that there would be grave injustices to the taxpayer if the records were opened to public inspection. But that has not been the experience of the State of Wisconsin with publicity income-tax returns.

I quote from one of the commissioners, at that time, of the Wisconsin Tax Commission, Mr. Atwood. He said:

Comparatively few instances in which income-tax returns have been examined since the secrecy clause was repealed, but an increasing number of such examinations made in recent months. There is no case of known misuse of these returns, and publicity feature has in no manner interfered with the administration of the law.

The Wisconsin Tax Commission placed no restriction upon the examination of the returns whatsoever except to provide that they must be examined within the office of the commission. They have found, as stated by Commissioner Atwood, no single case of the misuse of the privilege on the part of any citizen of the State.

Mr. President, it is instructive in connection with the question of the publicity of income-tax returns to refer to the experience of the Federal Government during the sixties. I quote now, as I quoted in 1926, from an editorial written by Horace Greeley in the New York Tribune of May 24, 1866:

The Evening Post has a Washington dispatch which says:

"The Committee on Ways and Means have agreed to an amendment of the tax bill providing that lists of income shall not be published nor furnished for publication, but they shall be open to private inspection at the office of the collector.

"We would like to believe this untrue. We believe that publicity given to the returns of income submitted by individuals to tax gatherers has already put millions of dollars in the Treasury and gone far toward equalizing the payments of the income tax by rogues with that of honest men and saved thousands from being imposed upon and swindled by false pretenses of solvency and wealth, made on purpose to incur debts preordained never to be paid. The knave who sought credit on assumption of wealth belied by their returns of incomes, of course, hate publicity given to those returns, but why should any honest man seek to pass for any more (or less) than he is worth?"

In another editorial, written January 26, 1865, the New York Tribune said:

We learn that the publishing of the list of income taxpayers in this city, against which there has been so much absurd outcry, is likely to prove beneficial to the revenue as well as to the consciences of some of our "best citizens." Already, as we understand, considerable sums have been returned to the assessors and paid to the collectors by persons who have discovered "errors" in their original returns of incomes since the publication of the lists referred to, and assessors have received valuable information in reference to the incomes of some gentlemen who should but have not yet amended their returns.

Mr. President, the effort to prohibit the publicity of income-tax returns continued until 1870, when the tax dodgers were finally successful in having the cloak of secrecy thrown around income-tax returns. After the adoption of the secrecy provision the number of returns decreasd, and presumably the tax, by 20 per cent. In this connection I quote from a speech made by Senator La Follette in 1921:

The statistics published by the Internal Revenue Bureau are such that comparisons in all the classes of incomes taxed are not possible, but a comparison of the returns of those reporting incomes over $2,000 is almost conclusive.

This fact is very much in point, since it shows what happened when the Government reversed the policy of publicity of income-tax returns and adopted the policy of secrecy, which is a boon to every individual who desires to defraud the Government in the making of his income-tax return. I continue to quote from Senator La Follette's speech:

In 1870, when the returns were published, the number showing incomes over $2,000 were 94,887. In 1871, when publicity was prohibited, the number fell to 74,000—that is, from 94,000 to 74,000—then to 72,000 in 1872, and this in spite of the fact that, as shown by individual bank deposits, bank clearings, etc., 1871 and 1872 were more prosperous years than 1870. Similarly in North Carolina, when the income-tax returns under the State law were published by the Hon. Josephus Daniels in his paper, the News and Observer, the tax collections immediately more than doubled.

Mr. President, on numerous occasions when this issue has been before the Senate, an address made by former President Harrison has been quoted; it is just as pertinent to-day as when he delivered it on the 22d day of February, 1898, before the Union League Club, of Chicago. President Harrison said:

The special purpose of my address to-day is to press home this thought upon the prosperous, well-to-do people of our communities, and especially of our great cities, that one of the conditions of the security of wealth is a proportionate and full contribution to the expenses of the State and local governments. It is not only wrong, but it is unsafe to make a show in our homes and on the street that is not made in the tax returns.

It is a part of our individual covenant as citizens with the State that we will honestly and fully, in the rate or proportion fixed from time to time by law, contribute our just share to all public expenses. A full and conscientious discharge of that duty by the citizen is one of the tests of good citizenship. To evade that duty is a moral delinquency, an unpatriotic act. * * *

Continuing to quote from former President Harrison's speech:

I want to emphasize if I can the thought that the preservation of this principle of a proportionate contribution, according to the true value of what each man has, to the public expenditures is essential to the maintenance of our free institutions and of peace and good order in our communities.

Mr. Lincoln's startling declaration that this country should not continue to exist half slave and half free may be paraphrased to-day by saying that this country can not continue to exist half taxed and half free.

We have too much treated the matter of a man's tax return as a personal matter.

We have put his transactions with the State on much the same level with his transactions with his banker, but that is not the true basis. Each citizen has a personal interest, a pecuniary interest, in the tax return of his neighbor. We are members of a greater partnership, and it is the right of each to know what every other member is contributing to the partnership and what he is taking from it.

Also, Mr. President, I quote from Prof. C. C. Plehn, whose book Introduction to Public Finance contains a pertinent comment upon the question of the publicity of tax returns. Professor Plehn is an eminent authority upon finance and taxation. For more than 25 years he has been a distinguished member of the faculty of the University of California. He was formerly president of the American Economic Association and of the National Tax Conference. He says:

To a people unaccustomed to an income tax it may seem that one's income is a very intimate, personal, and private affair, and there is a natural dread of letting one's business rivals know one's business. But as a matter of fact the income-tax statement or return would be no more likely to be examined out of sheer curiosity or for purposes of gossip than are the property-tax returns, about which no such veil of secrecy is drawn.

I may state, Mr. President, that the experience of the State of Wisconsin during more than five years of publicity of income-tax returns confirms the statements made by Professor Plehn—and the business rival generally has better information already—

And this is an important point—

than he could possibly obtain from the returns. Against such dark secrecy it may well be urged that it is very important to feel assured that all incomes—my neighbors as well as mine—are fairly and truly assessed, a thing that can never be if the final assessments never see the light of day. Fear of publicity is a bogie man. This does not mean, however, that publicity should be used as a means of duress, to force assessments in excess of what is right, just, and equal.

Mr. President, we have had enough of secrecy in the operations of this Government, as shown by the experience of the past few years. It was secrecy that made it possible for Albert B. Fall to barter away the Nation's oil reserves. If it is desired by the executive and the legislative branches of this Government to increase the revenue in accordance with the provisions of law, then no greater step in that direction can be taken than to remove the secrecy which now surrounds Federal income-tax returns.

The proposal for the publicity of income-tax returns has met the constant opposition of the Treasury officials. Mr. President, if the administration of the Bureau of Internal Revenue is above reproach and suspicion, if it is consciously and fully discharging its duty under the law, why should it find it necessary to reach out its hand, through the influence of committees, to prevent the inauguration of a policy which prevails throughout every other branch of our Government?

Of course, Mr. President, it is not difficult to understand why the present Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon, should be opposed to publicity of income-tax returns. He has disclosed within the last few weeks the fact that secrecy is inherent in his nature. It was only when the Public Lands Committee, by the aid of a magnifying glass, found the first name of the Secretary of the Treasury upon a memorandum of Mr. Platt, who had died, that Mr. Mellon came forward and told of the proposition made to him in the fall of 1923 by Will H. Hays.

He came at the request of the committee, but for more than five years he had remained silent and had not volunteered the information in his possession to a committee of the Senate which he, as every other citizen, knew was trying to ferret out and to get to the bottom of the most colossal conspiracy ever conceived and consummated to defraud a people in the history of the world. If he could, in good faith, plead ignorance of the conspiracy at the time when Mr. Hays approached him in the fall of 1923, he could not do so after January, 1924, because then the fact had been brought out under cross-examination of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that Edward L. Doheny had sent $100,000 in cash in a black satchel by his son to Albert B. Fall.

When Andrew W. Mellon became Secretary of the Treasury he took an oath to defend his country against its enemies, both foreign and domestic; and yet he chose to remain silent for more than five years while the Senate was endeavoring to expose a conspiracy, by powerful individuals, to defraud the Government, far more insidious and more destructive of our institutions than any attack made by a foreign power.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If Mr. Mellon had not remained silent, what useful information could he have given?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He could have given the Committee on Public Lands the useful information that Will H. Hays had approached him and had sent to him by a messenger in a package $50,000 in Liberty bonds, and that Mr. Hays had subsequently seen him about the package and asked him in exchange for those $50,000 in Liberty bonds to contribute $50,000 to the Republican National Committee.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. He could have given the information that Sinclair had contributed to the Republican campaign fund and that they had tried to hide that contribution by putting it in Mellon's name and that Mellon had refused to be a party to it, but I do not see how that would have helped anything.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That would have helped the committee materially. If the committee had had in its possession those important facts early in its investigation, this entire story would have been unraveled years before it was.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to call to the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin the fact that those bonds were the very bonds in which the Continental Trading Co. was dealing. Everybody in the country knew that, because the investigation had been going on for a long while. Mr. Mellon knew, from his conversation with Hays and his examination of the bonds when he had them in his possession, that they were 3½ per cent Liberty bonds in which the Continental Trading Co. was dealing and about which the committee was trying to obtain information.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I will have to take issue with the Senator from Nebraska, for I do not believe that at the time that happened Mr. Mellon had ever heard the name of the Continental Trading Co., or that he or the country as a whole or the investigating committee had ever heard its name, or that there were any bonds owned by that company, or that certain oil companies had been defrauded of the $3,000,000 which was put into Liberty bonds. I do not think anything of that kind was known. You can not charge Mr. Mellon with knowledge of what nobody knew at that time.

Mr. NORRIS. I can charge him with what he admitted that he knew, and in his testimony he said they were 3½ per cent Liberty bonds. That occurred, perhaps, before a considerable portion of the investigation had taken place, but the investigation went on for several years; the committee was trying to disclose the operations of the Continental Trading Co. which was dealing in these bonds. He knew also that Mr. Hays had not told all the truth to the committee. He heard him testify after he had given him these $50,000 in bonds, but he did not tell the committee anything about Mr. Hays giving them to him until his attention was afterwards called to it, and then he admitted it.

In other words, Mr. Mellon knew what kind of bonds these were; and he must have known, as everybody in the United States knew from the investigation that went on after that, that this committee was trying to trace this kind of bonds, and that they were the bonds that were dealt in by this trading company. He knew that while all that investigation was going on, and yet he never disclosed it to anybody or to the commitee until his name was discovered upon the papers of a dead man that had been brought into evidence before the committee. Then he came out and told what he knew. He knew that all those years.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Why, Mr. President, he does not know it yet.

Mr. NORRIS. That is to charge him with an ignorance that everybody knows it would be wrong to charge him with. The newspapers were full of this investigation from the beginning until the final disclosures. It is fair to say that everybody who read a newspaper in the United States knew that the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys were trying to trace these bonds. They had had all kinds of witnesses subpœnaed. Mr. Mellon knew then, when they were tracing them, that Will Hays had offered him $50,000 of bonds of that issue. Why did he not tell the committee, "Here is a clue that may lead to something. Will Hays has tried to give me these bonds and get money instead." In fact, when Mr. Hays presented those bonds to him he knew that it was a dishonorable deal in which he was asked to participate. He himself said in the testimony that he wondered why Will Hays could not give the bonds themselves to the committee instead of trying to trade them to him and get money instead as a contribution which the record would have shown to be a contribution from Mr. Mellon, though it would have been no contribution whatever from him.

In other words, Mr. Mellon was asked by Mr. Hays to do an illegal and a dishonorable act. He declined to do it, to his credit be it said; but he remained silent about it even after Will Hays had been on the witness stand and had not disclosed that transaction that he had attempted to put through with Mr. Mellon. If Mr. Mellon had let the committee know the knowledge that he possessed when he found out that that was what they were trying to ferret out and get evidence about, it certainly would have assisted the committee very materially in making the investigation that they were making.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will please be very brief, because I wish to conclude my remarks.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I shall try to be very brief.

I do not think Mr. Mellon knows to-day that the bonds that were offered to him were part of the loot that went through the Continental Trading Co.

Mr. NORRIS. No; but he knew they were of that issue. He testified to that himself.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. There are three-quarters of a billion dollars of that issue out in the hands of the public to-day; and I do not think the Senator from Nebraska knows that those were part of the bonds that came from the Continental Trading Co.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I know that as well as a man can know anything without having personal knowledge of it. Those bonds came from Mr. Sinclair. He gave them to Mr. Hays. Mr. Hays undertook to give them to Mr. Mellon.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; that is all true.

Mr. NORRIS. That much Mellon knew at the time they were presented.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; that is right.

Mr. NORRIS. He knew that they were bonds that came from Sinclair.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Subsequent to that date they had Sinclair on the stand; they had all kinds of witnesses on the stand trying to trace those bonds. Mellon knew also that they were 3½ per cent Liberty bonds.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. And if he ever read anything in a newspaper he knew that the proceeds of money that came to this trading company were invested in that kind of bonds. He knew all those things. They came from Sinclair. They came through

Will Hays. They were 3½ per cent bonds. He knew that the trading company was dealing in 3½ per cent bonds; that they were the kind of bonds this loot had been invested in. Knowing that, and remaining silent, it seems to me he came very far from doing his duty as an American citizen, and particularly as a public official.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Just a moment, and then I will not interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin further, because we are taking an unconscionable amount of his time.

There are three-quarters of a billion dollars of those 3½ per cent Liberty bonds outstanding. They are the only Liberty bonds that are completely tax-free. They are owned practically entirely by rich individuals, because the other kind of Liberty bonds pay a higher rate, and are tax-free in the hands of corporations. It stands to reason that Sinclair, who was then believed to be one of the rich men of America, had hundreds of thousands of dollars of those bonds; and I do not know to-day, nor does any other Senators know, whether these bonds that Hays had, which came from Sinclair, were part of the Continental bonds or whether they were not.

It is probable that Sinclair, like other rich men, had boxes full of those bonds. It is the best way of escaping the surtax that has yet been discovered. It is probable that he has a lot of them to-day; and we are just guessing when we say that they came from the Continental Trading Co. We do not know what the numbers of them were. Mr. Mellon did not know that there was a Continental Trading Co. He did not know that it had any bonds. He did not know that it had 3½ per cent bonds.

Mr. NORRIS. He did if he read the papers.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Perhaps I am unduly ignorant, but I read the papers all I get time to do, and I did not know until this minute that the Continental bonds were 3½ per cent bonds.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. For the sake of having a little accuracy with respect to this matter which has become the subject of discussion, I should like to make a brief statement.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does the Senator mean to say that what I have said is inaccurate?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; not at all; but the fact about the matter is that prior to the time that these bonds were turned over to Mr. Mellon or offered to Mr. Mellon, the Treasury Department, the Secret Service branch of the Treasury Department, at least, know all about the Continental Trading Co. transaction.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Prior to Hays's visit to Mellon?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Prior to Hays's visit to Mellon.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. Mellon said he had never heard of them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. Mellon told us that he had never heard of the Continental Trading Co., and had no notion where the bonds came from. The fact, however, is that prior to the time the bonds were delivered, the Treasury Department knew about the transactions of the Continental Trading Co., knew about the contracts they made, and knew about their investments in Liberty bonds. But whether Mr. Mellon knew that the bonds that were tendered to him were Continental bonds or not, he had information in the month of November, 1923, as he told us, to the effect that Sinclair had turned over something like $300,000 in bonds to Mr. Hays. The evidence developed that it was $260,000. Mr. Mellon's information about the matter at the time he received the bonds was that something in the neighborhood of $300,000 in bonds had been turned over by Sinclair to Hays.

In the spring of 1924 the trial of the validity of the lease of the Teapot Dome came on in Wyoming. Whether the bonds that were turned over to Fall came from Sinclair or not, it would have been a most persuasive piece of evidence in the trial of that case to show that Sinclair, having gotten this lease from Fall, had turned over to the Republican National Committee $260,000—$300,000, as Mr. Mellon stated it—to meet the obligations of that committee. In other words, it seems to me that Mr. Mellon can not be excused from failure to convey to the Government attorneys the information he had in November, 1923, that Mr. Sinclair had contributed to the Republican campaign committee during the preceding year $260,000 for the purpose of making up its deficit.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean, does he——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to let me finish my remarks. I wish to be entirely fair to him.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. All right, Mr. President.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to finish what I have to say concerning the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield further.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not like to say that I decline to yield further. I yield if the Senator desires me to; but it is getting very late.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator has been very good-natured already. I am much obliged to him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, secrecy over the affairs of government was, in my judgment, largely responsible for the successful consummation of the looting of the naval oil reserves. The experience of this Government between the sixties and 1870 demonstrates that publicity of income-tax returns was a very important factor in the collection of the taxes due under that law. The experience of the State of Wisconsin between 1923 and 1928 is also very persuasive that the publicity of income-tax returns results in the collection of the tax due under the law.

We have had enough of secrecy in government. To continue it further with regard to Federal income-tax returns is to give advantage to the tax dodger and the individual with enormous resources of wealth to escape his just share in the burden of government and in the payment of the enormous debt now upon the people of the United States growing out of our participation in the war.

To my mind, this issue is simple and clear-cut; and every Senator, when he casts his vote upon this question, must face that issue.

I trust that the amendment sponsored by the Senator from Nebraska will prevail.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, we tried this experiment once. I think it is fair to say that it met with the condemnation——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is the Senator referring to the fact that the amount of income paid by taxpayers was made public?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think even the Senator from Pennsylvania will admit that it is not a fair statement to say that we tried publicity of income-tax returns once, having in mind the period in which the amount of tax paid by the individual was made public. The Senator must admit that they are two very different propositions.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Then, Mr. President, I will start again. We tried an experiment in publicity once; and we published, and the newspapers spread abroad, lists showing the amount of tax paid by various income-tax payers throughout the United States.

It happened in my own collection district that many applications were made for the right to inspect the returns of taxpayers. The collector of internal revenue in that district told me that all of the applications could be divided into two classes: First, ladies contemplating divorce, or contemplating an application for alimony; second, curiosity seekers, persons whose sole motive was curiosity to know the private business of prominent individuals. So far as he was able to discover, that collector told me, the making of returns subject to inspection, and the publication of the lists, had not resulted in the addition of a single penny to the revenue of the United States.

It did result in the publication and creation of the most authoritative "sucker" lists, as they are called in slang, that the country has ever seen. I received several advertisements from a concern in New York offering to furnish lists showing the persons in the whole United States, or in any State, having incomes of more than any specified amount, and it was explained that this was particularly valuable for people who wanted to sell things by mail or by solicitation otherwise.

If that is what we are trying to do, this is the way to do it, but there is an old-fashioned maxim that used to be very popular with the people of our race, that one of the cardinal virtues is to mind our own business, and when we take the intimate affairs of the citizen and spread them needlessly before the public gaze, we are doing an indefensible injury to that citizen.

It is all very well to say this will avoid tax evasion, but we all know from our personal experience how close is the scrutiny given to the tax returns now filed. We have created a great, new system of government. In its creation it was open to much criticism. You can not take thousands of new employees into the service and confront them with tax returns of the utmost complexity and get any other result but a record of inefficiency and irregularities such as were revealed by the Senator from Michigan and his committee. Of course, that was bound to happen, and it did happen, under both Democratic and Republican administrations. It could not be otherwise.

That administration has improved constantly. If we would pay adequate salaries in that bureau, we could develop good men and keep them. As it is now, we develop good men, and then some company takes them away, or they are hired by tax experts.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator mean that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue needs more salary to stay on the job?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; I do not mean that at all. I refer to the experts in the bureau.

Mr. COUZENS. The commissioner has been here a long time, and he has condoned and continues to condone some of the practices that have existed ever since he has been in the bureau—in 1921.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I have found fault with his decisions from time to time myself. I dare say every Senator here would disagree with his conclusions in some cases, and I dare say that if anyone of us was Commissioner of Internal Revenue he could point out decisions we would make with which he would not agree; but, on the whole, the administration of Commissioner Blair has been thoroughly honest and reasonably efficient and effective.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to inquire of the Senator whether under the laws of his State the returns of the citizen for purposes of taxation are public records?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. My impression is that the total you return for taxation is a public record, but the return itself is not. I am not sure of that, however. I have never known of any case where a return has been published.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is not that the general rule?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That the total amount of the return is published?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; that the return of every individual, every taxpayer, is a public record, open to the inspection of anyone.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No, Mr. President; I do not think so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the rule in my State.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is the rule in practically every State, so far as property taxes are concerned.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; so far as real estate goes.

Mr. COUZENS. It is also true so far as personal property is concerned in most States.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It may be. I have never known them to be published in my State.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They are not published in my State either, but you can go to the assessor's office and examine anything you want to examine.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am not so sure of that as to Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What basis could there be for requiring a return as to real estate to be made public and a return as to personal property not?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Because the ownership of real estate is a public matter. The details of one's income are very far from being a public matter.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not speaking about income. I suppose in most States there is a property tax.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. An ad valorem property tax.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And, of course, that is based upon the assessment of the property. I have had some experience in these matters, and I never heard of a State in which those returns of the assessor's office were not open to the inspection of anybody who cared to inspect them.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. My impression is that with us the record is only open to inspection upon the showing of some right to inspect; but of that I am not sure enough to make a dogmatic statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I can not speak of the time since 1926, but in that year I made some inquiry and found that the property tax returns in every State in the Union were public records.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Perhaps I can refresh the Senator's memory as to the law in his State, with which, of course, I am not particularly familiar, and I am willing to take the Senator's word for it, but I would be very much surprised to find on examination that in the State of Pennsylvania the return of the assessor is not a public document.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I did not say it was not. The return of the assessor is public.

Mr. NORRIS. That itemizes the property. That tells every item.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; on the contrary, it merely gives the aggregate.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not understand how the assessor can make a proper assessment without itemizing the property. He tells the amount of bonds the taxpayer has and the number of horses he has and the number of cattle and hogs he has. He gets the number of mortgages that he has, and in most States, I think, he permits a deduction for the debts that the taxpayer owes, figured from the evidence of indebtedness.

I want to ask the Senator, with a view of refreshing his memory on the general subject, whether the law of his State does not provide for an equalization of taxes by a board, a county board or commission, that has the power to increase anybody's assessment or to diminish it, and whether the law does not provide two things; first, that the taxpayer himself can complain before that board that he is assessed too high, and then, upon hearing, the board can either increase the assessment or reduce it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; that is the law.

Mr. NORRIS. There is another thing that may happen. The other thing is that some other taxpayer may go before the board and complain that some taxpayer, naming him, has not been assessed high enough. Is not that possible?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I believe not.

Mr. NORRIS. My familiarity with the laws of the various States on that particular subject is not universal, I admit, but in several States with which I am familiar, particularly my own State, that is the law, and I myself do not see how a board of equalization could properly adjust matters unless somebody were given the authority to make a complaint against a taxpayer, and he could not make that complaint without an examination of the record which showed what the assessment was.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The board itself has the right to increase the assessment, but no other taxpayer has any business to interfere.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand he does not have any business to interfere, but he has a right, I think the Senator will find—I do not believe there is a State that does not give that right—to make complaint that somebody else has not been assessed high enough. That is a common thing that occurs before boards of equalization.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Anybody has a right to do it; and, of course, it is often done in real-estate taxation. There is no question about that.

Mr. NORRIS. How could one do that unless the return of the assessor were a public document, so that he could examine it?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The assessment of real estate is public, and the aggregate amount of personal property assessed to any individual can be learned; but the details of the returns made by individuals are not public records, as far as I have ever heard, in the sense that anybody can examine them.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I wish to say that in Michigan, for example, each taxpayer is required to file a statement not only of his real estate but of his cash on hand, the amount of his family jewels, the amount of his furniture, and the amount of his investments, and in every one of those cases any citizen may go in and look at the record. I know that, because in my own last campaign one of my opponents went in and got the record and looked it all over to see if he could find some defect in my return so as to make it a campaign issue. So I know from actual experience what they may do in my State.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It adds to my pride in Pennsylvania to know that such a thing is not possible there.

Mr. President, I do not mean to take any more time on this——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas if he wants to have an executive session.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Is the Senator aware of the fact that I have the floor?

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to have a vote on the resolution. I probably can occupy an hour on it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am willing to yield to the Senator for a question if he asks me one, but he interrupted me in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thought the Senator had finished.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I had about finished. It seems to me that any possible increase in the tax yield that can result from this kind of publicity is far more than offset in the loss of respect for that right of privacy to which we ought to pay some attention.

We all recognize a right of privacy in the individual, but somehow more and more in our legislation we are ignoring it. The very Senators who inveigh against secrecy of tax returns want to conduct their business privately. They seal the envelopes in which they send their letters; they have blinds on their windows. They admit there is such a right. Why should it not apply also to the intimate details of a man's personal affairs? Why should it be possible for one's competitor to learn all the details of his business? It seems to me we are doing a positive damage to American business when we throw such records open to public inspection.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. I would like to ask the Senator what details of business there are in an income-tax return.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I will tell the Senator; that is a good question.

Mr. BLAINE. It is nothing but a statement of the business. There are no secrets of the business in it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Are there not?

Mr. BLAINE. No trade secrets.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Suppose the Senator is in some kind of merchandising business. His tax return has to show his gross income, his gross sales. It has to show the amount of his clerk hire. It has to show the cost of his wares. It has to show every item of deduction and the reason for it. It has to show all of his bad debts in detail, with the name of the bad debtor, and the reason why the debt can not be collected. It has to give all sorts of stuff that, if stated gratuitously, would be positively ruinous against the individual. Is there not some objection to making all that public?

Mr. BLAINE. Of what benefit is that to his competitor?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is of great benefit to his competitor to know the intimate details of the business. Suppose the Senator and I were in active competition, and I discovered by his income-tax return that he had been doing business at a loss for the last two years; would it not be very likely that I would try harder to drive the Senator out of business than if I did not know how his affairs were going? Suppose every corner grocer had to make his business public in such detail; what chance would he have against the chain store that wanted to drive him out of business? There is all that to consider, more than the mere gratification of the curiosity of the public. Suppose my rival practicing law sees that my income from my practice is going down little by little each year; what business is it of his to know that, or of the Government to tell him that?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield there; does the Senator think for a moment that his rival in the law business will not know without looking at his tax return whether or not his income is going down? Does not the Senator himself know whether the business of his rivals in the practice of the law, if he has rivals, is increasing or decreasing, whether they are prospering or not?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; I do not know that.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask a further question. The Senator thinks that if a man is about to fail it ought not to be published, because his rivals would push him on over the precipice if they could. What would he say about the man who loans the one who is failing a lot of money and loses it, who would not loan it probably if he knew the man was not doing a prosperous business? Would it not be good for society if it prevents these men from dragging a lot of others down when they go down?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If he is the kind of a banker who loans money without a statement, he deserves to lose his money.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I am not going to delay the Senate, and I am not going to argue the question. I agree perfectly with the idea that a man in private business has a right to keep his business secret, as he has the right even to seal his letters, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] states. That is all true up to the point where he comes in contact with the public and the public has business with him, and at that point the argument which has been advanced fails.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Would the Senator approve of leaving the mucilage off of official envelopes used by the Treasury Department? That is the business of the public.

Mr. REED of Missouri. My friend from Pennsylvania is so intelligent and I have such respect for him that I will not characterize that argument. But I will say that the Treasury has the right to write letters to a particular individual concerning negotiations in business that are going on. When the Treasury has acted for the public, it is a mere agent that has acted for a great principal, and the principal has the right to know what the agent has done. I do not possess that childlike faith which leads me to believe that if we appoint a man to a public office or hire him as a clerk in a public office we have thereby transformed him into either a perfect man or an angelic creature.

We have had plenty of rascals in public office. Some of them have been discovered and some have not. The whole business world proceeds upon the idea that there must be checks and safeguards. There is not a bank in the United States that does not have a method devised for checking over the accounts of every clerk in the bank. There is not a State in the Union that has not devised a plan for checking over the accounts and business of its banks. The right of the principal to know what is going on with reference to the public business is a right that ought never to be denied.

Now, what is the objection to the publishing of tax returns or leaving them open for inspection? The objection is that it exposes the private business of the taxpayer. But, as has already been said, every State in the Union has a law which provides for the levying of taxes, and I know of no State where those tax returns are not open to inspection and examination under any proper rules or conditions. I know of no great wrong or injury that has ever come from that fact. It might be embarrassing to the man who represents that he is worth a very large sum of money, and it frequently has been, to find his tax returns drawn on him in order to show that that was a false statement. Conversely, when men have claimed in court and out of court that they are worth only a small sum of money it has frequently happened that their State tax returns have been presented to contradict them.

The only exception that is proposed to be made is with reference to taxes made to the Federal Government. The argument is that that exposes private business conditions, private business conditions that have already been exposed if there is an honest return made to the State officer of the State in which the business is located. But suppose that the facts are exposed. Suppose the facts of a man's income or a corporation's income is exposed. It is based upon the taxpayer's own statement. It is therefore nothing but an exposition of an admitted truth which he has written down and to which he has subscribed his name. There is no chance for misrepresentation of his business, a thing which may be done by a business rival at any time and which frequently is done.

Besides all that, there is nothing in the argument of business rivals learning the income and business conditions of the other party to that rivalry, for it is a fact that everybody knows that business institutions are required regularly to make statements to their creditors of their condition. A business institution refusing to do so very soon loses its credit standing. These reports, not only those which are made to business institutions upon demand, but reports which are made to the commercial agencies upon request, are printed and appear in Dun's and Bradstreet's reports, and in a supplementary report which they constantly put out when inquiry is made by a subscriber. Those supplementary reports contain not only what the individual has admitted in a return to the commercial agency, but they are a compendium of information that has been gleaned from every other possible source.

Mr. President, we know entirely too little of what has been transpiring in the Treasury of the United States. I take it that the Senate will be astounded when I state that the Treasury has purchased Government bonds at a premium, at a price that has run to over 114—that is, a premium of over $14 to the $100.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the Treasury has not purchased a single one of those bonds since they were issued.

Mr. REED of Missouri. What bonds?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Treasury 4¼ bonds of 1952. Those are the only ones that have ever reached such a premium.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I have in my office a letter of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury stating the price that has been paid for bonds and the amount of bonds, and there has been paid over 114 for certain bonds. If that is not true, somebody made a mistake in figuring the interest. I shall be glad to send and get the letter.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I have the figures in my office, and I will bring them to the Senate at once.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Very well. Arguments have been made on this floor by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] regarding certain transactions of the Treasury which are of a very serious character, and apparently they have made no impress. It was stated here by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] on yesterday that the Treasury had proceeded for a time under one rule with reference to tax levies and then had reversed that ruling; that part of the taxpayers had paid under one ruling and part had paid under another ruling, so that infinite confusion had resulted, confusion so great that all we could do now was to enact a law which would provide that when the Treasury proceeded to collect in the future the rule of law to be applied would be that most unfavorable to the Government, but if the taxpayer sought to recover his money the rule of law to be applied as to him would be that which was most favorable to the Government and most unfavorable to the litigant. That is an absurd proposition by which it is proposed to penalize a party going into court asking for justice—a ridiculous scheme! It is proposed to say there are two rules of law, one for the plaintiff and another rule for the defendant, one for the Government and another for the citizen.

I am not sufficiently acquainted with the tax decisions to carry this discussion into specific illustrations, but it is a matter of common knowledge that the rulings and decisions of the Treasury Department have produced inexplicable confusion.

One rule has applied for a given period of time and then has been changed. There is a very deep-seated conviction that these rules have been changed as acts of favoritism; and I have not the slightest doubt but that conviction is well founded. Every act of this Government, Mr. President, ought to be a public act ultimately, and ought to be a public act while it is going on, save in those instances where privacy is necessary in order that the ends of the Government may not be defeated.

Speaking about privacy, although it is aside from the question I am discussing, there was introduced into the debate the secrecy and the privacy of the transaction between the Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Will Hays. It is claimed that the Secretary of the Treasury did not know that those bonds came from a particular company. That is immaterial. What he did know was that the directing genius of the Republican committee wanted secretly to cash those bonds; that he had them, and there was some reason why he could not take them to a bank as an honest man would do with an honest security, lay them on the bank counter, and ask to be credited with their market value. He knew that. He knew it was to be something done under cover; that there was something wrong or the bonds would have been cashed in the ordinary way. I do not know how long he kept them. I think he did not tell us how long he kept them. It does not appear that he knows just where they were kept or just when they were returned. So far as appears, this $50,000 package might have been turned over to the cook or the chauffeur; he does not know where he kept it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator from Missouri might be interested to know that when that package reached Mr. Mellon he put it to one side, forgot it, and left it lying all night on the top of his desk in the Treasury Department. The next morning when he found what it was he put it in the safe.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. And he sent it back as soon as he could see Mr. Hays.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That was the only $50,000 package he ever left on top of a desk overnight in his long and illustrious career.

Mr. CARAWAY. I had understood that he took it home with him instead of leaving it on his desk.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator from Arkansas is wrong about that.

Mr. CARAWAY. The reporters of the newspapers who heard the testimony, then, were wrong.

Mr. DILL. He stated in the hearings that he forgot them, but that he went back that evening and got them.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I heard the testimony. He did not say that he went back.

Mr. REED of Missouri. How long did he keep them in his safe? The Senator from Pennsylvania, of course, knows.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I know because I heard Mr. Mellon testify. He tried to return them to Hays when Hays came to see him a day or so later, but Mr. Hays asked that they be sent to him in New York, because he was going on a western trip and did not want to take them with him. So the next time one of Mr. Mellon's assistants was going to New York he gave him the package to take to Mr. Hays. That is the testimony.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, let us see why all that circumlocution; let us have regard to the fact that none of us came to town yesterday. Here are Government bonds that are just as negotiable as Government greenbacks or gold certificates. They have a market value which fluctuates but slightly from day to day; they can be cashed at any bank in the United States, big or little, at their market value. If the little bank did not have enough money to cash the bonds that day, it would nevertheless give the credit to the customer upon its books and it would get the cash the next day from a big bank. The man having honest possession of honest bonds, with nothing to conceal, with clean hands, upright heart, a decent purpose, and reasonable intelligence would have taken the bonds over to the bank and had them cashed.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is what Mellon suggested that Hays should do.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Exactly. So when Mr. Mellon said to Mr. Hays "Do not hand the bonds to me; do not leave them with me; I can not touch them; I can not take them," he knew there was "something rotten in Denmark."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. He testified that he knew that they were trying to conceal the fact that Sinclair had made a subscription, and they wanted to blame it on Mellon and he would not allow them to do it.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Very well. Then he knew the necessity for concealment; he knew the purpose of concealment; he knew they were Sinclair's bonds; he knew there was a committee of the United States Senate very anxious to find out the facts, and he kept the secret of the rogue who undertook to traffic with him—that is all there is to it—and he kept it well. He kept it until from outside sources at last the little track was found that led to him, and then he told of the transaction. That may be what the Secretary of the Treasury of the greatest Nation in the world ought to have done; that may be the code of morals that controls down there; that may be the response to public duty which we are there to expect; but it is not the standard the people of the United States have set up for their public officials.

Speaking of Will Hays, I wonder if he had expended so much of his energies regulating the morals of the people of the United States by censoring the picture shows that he had exhausted the moral element of his character and had no more morals left. I beg to suggest, in the interest of common sense, that Hays ought to be removed as the censor of the picture-show business and "Fatty" Arbuckle ought to be given back his job.

I remember that when Mr. Hays came before the committee of the Senate which was then investigating and trying to find out what moneys were being raised, he told us that they had adopted an ironclad rule that they would not receive, I believe it was, more than a thousand dollars—it may have been $10,000—from any man; and he proceeded to expatiate upon the wickedness of receiving large contributions, because they might create a condition where the contributors of huge sums might ask favors in return. But it was not long after that until he was receiving huge contributions from Mr. Sinclair, and that was not very long after Sinclair had obtained the oil lands of this country which he believed to be worth from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000.

Mr. President, a little more publicity, a little more light will do no harm. I have to make tax returns, and anybody is welcome to look at my tax returns. I see no reason why any honest man, making an honest return, should hesitate in his dealing with the public to have the public know that he has honestly dealt with them.

Mr. President, I have in my hand a letter addressed to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER]—I am now referring to the matter of interest—which reads as follows:

Very truly yours,

OGDEN L. MILLS,
Undersecretary of the Treasury.

Hon. LYNN J. FRAZIER,
United States Senate.

(During the reading of the foregoing letter:)

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is not necessary for the Senator to read any further unless he wishes. It is evident that my statement was wrong, if that is figured correctly.

(After the conclusion of the reading of the letter:)

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, that is all I desire to say at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who are present, were paired and did not vote. A quorum being present, the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope that we will recess at this time until 11 o'clock to-morrow. I feel that I should give notice now, so that Senators may govern themselves accordingly, that if it is humanly possible I shall try to keep this bill before the Senate to-morrow until it is disposed of.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, that is not humanly possible, because the proposition in itself is inhumane.

DEVELOPMENT OF AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK

Mr. McNARY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9495) to provide for the further development of agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, approved July 2, 1862, and all acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture," as amended, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 2:

(1) Page 3, line 8, after "in," insert "such."
(2) Page 3, line 8, after "proportions," insert "as may be determined by the State agencies."

CHAS. L. MCNARY,
ARTHUR CAPPER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
G. N. HAUGEN,
JOHN C. KETCHAM,
J. B. ASWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

EUROPEAN CORN BORER

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, the RECORD shows that some days ago I made some remarks on a motion entered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (H. R. 12632) to provide for the eradication or control of the European corn borer. The bill passed the House and the Senate, and the day after it passed the Senate the Senator from Utah moved to have the bill recalled from the House, and there is now pending his motion to reconsider. I desire particularly at this time that the Senate shall act on the motion to reconsider, because the deficiency appropriation bill will be here to-morrow, and it is quite necessary to carry on this important work. I therefore move to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Utah to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

RECESS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, May 19, 1928, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, May 18, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Again, O Lord, our God, the morning light has broken and Thy mercy embraces all, because Thou dost see and understand. From day to day Thou dost make known Thy loving-kindness, which blesses us with quiet-hearted trust. Teach us that the richest treasures of life are invisible and Thy supreme revelation is to the human heart. Thy greatest gifts can not be weighed, measured, nor counted. Do Thou spare us from the pride which is the root of sin and endow us with that humility which is the beginning of every virtue. Rebuke all unrighteous conflict throughout our country and reproach all selfishness, which is the poison that blights the flower of human happiness. Persuade us that he who forgives most shall be most forgiven. In the name of our Saviour we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 13873) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and prior fiscal years, and providing supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1925, and June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

ADDRESS OF HON. WILL R. WOOD

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a speech delivered over the radio on Tuesday evening, May 15, by our colleague the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered over the radio by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD]. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is there any politics in that speech?

Mr. TILSON. Considering the source from which the speech came, I think there is no more politics in it than one would expect. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address delivered over the radio Tuesday evening, May 15, 1928, from station WRC, in the "Voters' Service" program, under the sponsorship of the National League of Women Voters and the National Broadcasting Co., by Hon. WILL R. WOOD, of Indiana, chairman of the Republican National Congressional Committee:

THE CAMPAIGN OF 1928

Within the coming month our two great political parties will hold their national conventions. In these conventions the platforms will be written and the standard bearers will be chosen. The delegates to the national conventions are now being selected by the varying processes prescribed by the State laws. State conventions are adopting resolutions for the guidance of their delegates to the national conventions. Sectional and factional as well as national viewpoints are finding their way into the State party platforms. The air is filled with the claims and counterclaims of the adherents of the rival candidates for the greatest honor the American people in their wisdom can bestow. Issues are being urged in both parties as paramount to their success. There is a clash of opinion and a confusion of sound. Political observers and writers are endeavoring to clarify the atmosphere and guide us to definite conclusions. It is well that they should do so, for it is an engrossing theme and one well worthy of our best thought. Out of this welter of factional and party controversy must come, and will come, in my honest opinion, the mature judgment of the American people, which will be expressed at the polls next November. The superficial thinker may draw aside from the subject as unworthy his consideration, but the extent that we give it our attention and our thought will be the measure of our worthiness to enjoy the benefits of a representative government.

For, fellow citizens, I firmly believe that the two-party system is essential to the success of a representative form of government. Its necessity was made manifest in the early days of our growing Republic, and from that day to this outstanding American statesmen have been its advocates. Our Democratic friends seem to be agreed that that great American, Andrew Jackson, was a Democrat, though as a Republican I may well claim that the soundest part of his political theory was Republican, for he was an outstanding protectionist. Most certainly he was a party man, and no one has ever claimed he was ashamed of it.

At a time when confusion was much worse confounded than now, when factionalism was never more rife, when feeling ran higher than at any other period in the country's history, Abraham Lincoln was able to make up his mind what party best suited his views and he joined it—the new Republican Party. As a Republican, I am devoutly grateful for that.

Neither that vigorous old fighter, Andrew Jackson, nor the wise and understanding Lincoln, molded his party exactly to his liking, but each in his own way, kept in the fray and strove manfully for his ends.

The scoffer will say that the conflict of to-day is but the bickering of politicians and place seekers—that the average citizen is very little concerned in what they may say or do. The scoffer has said the same thing in every political campaign in the country's history, but, fellow citizens, the scoffer is wrong. To show concern in the things that concern us is a duty we can ill afford to scorn. We are all vitally concerned in the welfare of our Government.

Underneath all of this clamor, all of these charges and countercharges, all this apparent confusion of principles and ideas, there is a determined quest for truth. We have not too many politicians, but too few. Politics deals with the science of Government and we will have good Government only so long as our ablest citizens give this science their best attention. Politicians who give their main thought to patronage and place are not the leaders of thought in American politics to-day any more than they were in the days of Jackson and Lincoln, but even they have a better conception of government and its problems than the indifferent citizen too engaged in his personal affairs to give any thought to the subject at all.

While, as I have said, the issues of the 1928 campaign are not yet clearly defined, while they will not be fully joined until after the two great national conventions in June shall have declared their party principles and the men selected as the party condidates shall have developed their ideas and interpretations of those principles, to my mind it is sufficiently clear that in its broadest aspect the greatest outstanding question to be considered should be which party can be depended upon to manage most successfully the domestic affairs of our Government and insure to our people the most satisfactory relations with other nations.

The verdict of the 1920 election was unmistakable. An uprising of our people so nearly spontaneous—I might say so nearly unanimous—against the party then in power did not happen without a reason. There was a nation-wide dissatisfaction, as we all remember—dissatisfaction with the conduct of domestic affairs by the Democratic administration, and a deep and settled resentment against the abortive attempt which had been made to involve us in a permanent foreign alliance, in contravention of the established American policy of good will toward all nations and entangling alliances with none. The American people then expressed their determinaton that that mistaken attempt, however well intentioned, should remain an attempt and nothing more. The Democratic Party could no more return to its original position on that question, though certain Democrats still profess to think so, and hope to win an election, than it could revive the free silver issue of 1896 and hope to win on that. The promises of a party which has made such mistakes in judgment as to what is best for the American people—mistakes which were vital and fundamental, and I have cited only two of them—will well bear the closest scrutiny. The American people should not be misled by specious arguments intended to lead them away from the main theme.

Weigh the record of the Republican Party for the last 68 years, during all of which time it has been in power, with the exception of three short intervals—its promises and performances—against the record of the Democratic Party over the same period, what it did while in power during the short intervals the American people intrusted power to it and what it promised to do, and then give careful consideration to the promises of both parties for the future. But be wise, I urge you, and weigh these promises for the future in the light of the record of both parties in the past.

What does the Democratic Party propose to do about the protective tariff policy, for instance? That is one of the great fundamental policies of the Republican Party. It is a vital part of its management of the affairs of the American people which makes for their well-being and success. Some Democrats have come to see this and a growing number are beginning to acknowledge it. But the great majority of Democrats in Congress who ask protection for their particular industries still would deny it to others by voting against Republican tariff bills. They still give lip service to the theory of free trade or a tariff for revenue only, while announcing their determination to revise the tariff downward to help the American farmer. How can they help the American farmer by destroying his home market and crippling the buying power of the consumer of his products?

The standard of living of the American wage earner, the highest in the history of the world, can not possibly be maintained under anything but a protective tariff. The hordes of cheap European and Asiatic labor might just as well be freely admitted to our shores to compete with American labor as to take down our tariff wall. Cheap foreign labor can compete no less surely on its own shores as on our own.

The Democrats were honest when they said, in their minority report on the emergency tariff act of 1921, passed by a Republican Congress for the relief of agriculture, "Sensible protectionists will go to the party that has taught and practiced protection for 50 years and not to the party that has always opposed it." If they will be as honest this year in their national platform, the tariff issue will take care of itself in this campaign. For not even the solid South will much longer permit its Representatives in Congress to maintain a dishonest attitude on this question.

The mandate given the Republican Party in 1924 to continue direction of governmental affairs was no less convincing that that which returned it to power in 1920. The facts were before the American people in 1920 and 1924. They will be again in 1928. We will await in confidence the result

BRIDGE BILLS

Mr. DENISON, by authorization of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, called up the following Senate bills on the Speaker's table, similar House bills having been favorably reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which were severally reported and severally passed, and motions to reconsider the votes by which the bills were passed were severally laid on the table:

S. 4401. Authorizing Elmer J. Cook, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Bear Creek at or near Lovel Point, Baltimore County, Md., and a point opposite in Baltimore County, Md.

(A similar House bill (H. R. 13652) was laid on the table.)

On page 2, line 25, of the above Senate bill an amendment to strike out the word "interest" and insert in lieu thereof the word "interests" was agreed to.

S. 4345. Authorizing the Interstate Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Kansas City, Kans.

(A similar House bill (H. R. 13482) was laid on the table.)

S. 4381. Authorizing H. A. Rinder, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Niobrara, Nebr.

(A similar House bill (H. R. 13592) was laid on the table.)

S. 4357. Authorizing Henry Horsey, Winfield Scott, A. L. Ballegoin, and Frank Schee, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct and operate a bridge across the Des Moines River at or near Croton, Iowa.

S. 3793. Authorizing the St. Croix Interstate Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Croix River near Grantsburg, Wis.

(A similar House bill (H. R. 12912) was laid on the table.)

REAPPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. FENN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11725) for the reapportionment of Representatives in Congress.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RANKIN) there were—ayes 58, noes 36.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote upon the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 296, nays 49, not voting 85, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11725, with Mr. CHINDBLOM in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11725, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11725) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the House is honored this morning by the presence in the diplomatic gallery of one of Sweden's most distinguished men, Mr. Gustav Casel, of Stockholm, one of the greatest economists and specialists on stabilization and gold in the world. I simply wanted to call the attention of the House to the fact that he is present at this time. [Applause, the Members rising.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the time consumed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not be counted in the time allotted for debate.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has 23 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FENN] has 20 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, will you give me your undivided attention for five minutes?

The Constitution provides that every 10 years there shall be a census of the population of the United States, and on a correct return of that population there shall be an apportionment of the Representatives in Congress.

In 1920 this Congress no doubt neglected its duty under the Constitution. We took the census of 1920, properly returned, but on that census we have made no apportionment down to the present hour. That duty has gone by. You can not return to it and perform it. Nobody to-day is claiming that you are trying to make an apportionment of Representatives in Congress based on the census of 1920. You can not do it. You know you can not do it within 2 years of a census of population taken every 10 years. It is the duty of Congress in the next Congress to pass a census bill providing how the census of industries and manufactures and population shall be taken for 1930, and when that population of 1930 has been returned by the Census Bureau and we know how many inhabitants we have in this Republic, we will make and base the next apportionment, and between now and then you can not make a legal apportionment of Members of Congress.

This attempt to do so now is one of the most foolish and useless things that Congress can do. Why, what are you attempting to do? You say, "We are going to provide an apportionment for some future Congress." Congress can not delegate its duty under the Constitution. You know that. We can not provide for some member of the Cabinet to make the apportionment for 1930. You ought to know that. What are we doing here? We are saying to the Congress that meets in 1933, after the census of population has been returned, that a Cabinet officer shall decide what shall be the size of this House and what shall be the basis for the apportionment.

Now, I say, until you get the 1930 figures of population your work to-day in passing this so-called apportionment bill is simply to take care of the prejudice that since 1920 has existed against this Congress in the minds of the people. You are trying to deceive the people. You can not do it by passing such a useless and worthless thing as this. The people will not approve it. [Applause.]

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COLE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in the beginning I was very strongly for this bill. I am not so sure of my position at the present time, but I think in the end I shall vote for it. [Applause.]

I do not mean by this that I am in favor of this Congress trying to anticipate the work of the Congress which will sit in 1930, after the next census is taken. The apportionment ought to be made by that Congress and not by this. Nor do I understand that this bill attempts to do anything like that. If we pass this bill it will still be possible for the Congress sitting in 1930 to make its own apportionment. But if it fails to do so, then the provisions of this bill become operative and the reapportionment will be made automatically, not by the Secretary of Commerce at his will, but by him according to the census.

I realize that this proposition is no more than a gesture, but I believe it is a good gesture. Fault has been found because no reapportionment has been made based on the census of 1920, and more or less properly so. By passing this measure we will be giving notice that after the census of 1930 the long-deferred reapportionment will be made, as it ought to be made.

I have been consistently opposed to reapportioning according to the census of 1920. The first speech I attempted to make on this floor was in opposition to such a bill. I based that opposition on the facts which were so well stated yesterday by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]. The census of 1920 was grossly inadequate. It was taken at a time when the war workers had not returned to their normal homes. There was still a congestion of them in the industrial centers. But even many of those who should have been enumerated were not reached. The census was taken in midwinter and little effort was made by the enumerators to reach all the people.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Was it not because the roads in Iowa were so muddy that you could not get to them?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. No. There was no mud in Iowa in January of 1920. The roads were all hard and frozen.

Mr. GARBER. What assurance have you that the census taken in 1930 will be a correct one?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Warned by the experience of 1920, I think we will be more careful in 1930 to see to it that we have an adequate and correct enumeration of the people.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FENN. The census bill now before the House provides for taking the census of 1930 in the month of May.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes; and that is the proper time to take a census, in the good old summer time and not in winter. But whether the census to be taken is correct or not I shall be in favor of making a reapportionment according to its returns. I would hesitate to defer it again. If I am here I will not be a party to such postponement. There are now gross inequalities of representation. We must correct them if we would maintain the integrity of representative government. I realize that the State which I represent in part stands to lose one or possibly two Representatives; but such loss would be no proper reason to set aside the constitutional provisions for apportionment of Representatives in Congress according to population.

Nor am I in favor of increasing the membership of the House so that States like Iowa could maintain their present number of Members in the House. I have almost come to the conclusion that the House membership is too large as it is. I believe 435 is the limit of effectiveness in legislation. I would rather vote to decrease such membership than to increase it. I am almost convinced that a House with about 360 Members would be better.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. Does the gentleman think it would be fair for a Member of Congress to represent, as he would under this apportionment, 220,000 people if he came from Michigan or California and 299,800 if he came from Florida. That is what the bill proposes and there is a variation there of 79,000.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I can not go into that question at the present time. But whatever we base our apportionment on, there are bound to be some inequalities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, very reluctantly I find myself in disagreement with my friend and colleague from New York [Mr. JACOBSTEIN]. I yield to no man in my admiration for the qualities of that distinguished Representative. He is my friend and I am glad to testify this morning to his ability, his perseverance, and his wisdom, yet I find I must disagree with him and be opposed to this bill.

Much has been said about the unconstitutionality of the provisions of this bill, but to my mind they are not unconstitutional, and my opposition to the bill is not based upon that in any sense whatsoever. In the case of J. W. Hampton, jr., against United States, just decided by the United States Supreme Court, the court put a quietus on that kind of an argument, because the Supreme Court there said that it was not a delegation of legislative authority to the Federal Tariff Commission to empower that commission to help the President determine the difference between the cost of production here and the cost of production abroad on goods imported into this country. If that has been held not to be a delegation of legislative authority, surely the placing in the hands of the Department of Commerce of a certain standard—equal proportions or major fractions—by which they may determine reapportionment can not be held in any sense of the word unconstitutional. But it is a question of the wisdom and a question of the soundness of the policy of the bill that disturbs me. It forces subsequent Congresses to our way of thinking, and that, gentlemen, to my mind is the vice of this bill and tempts me to vote against it.

Why should we attempt by circumlocution and by subterfuge to place a future Congress in a box or in a pocket and say to it, "If you do not act; if you do not reapportion; and if you do not carry out your duty under the Constitution, then we will act for you." I can not go before my voters when I stand for reelection in 1930 and say I will come to the Seventy-second Congress with a free and open mind if you pass this bill, because, in a sense, I am bound. You have acted for me.

I am not a free agent. The bill seeks also to bind not only the Seventy-second Congress but all Congresses which fail to act and reapportion. It binds those Congresses in perpetuity. There is no limitation. It might be argued that when we pass an income tax law, in a measure that is true. Every act, unless limited, endures until repeal, but there is a difference in this bill in that it forces action. Inaction may be just as legislative as action, yet the Seventy-second Congress can not remain inactive. You act for it.

That is enough to force it to act probably contrary to its will. Such a situation is not present in the case of income tax law. Nor is such a situation present when we pass the prison-made goods bill, the Cooper-Hawes bill, which did not go into effect for three years. We had no desire to bind the Congress in existence three years hence and force it to act with respect to that bill. In this bill the proponents, realizing that there is a deadlock now, seeks to break the deadlock by subterfuge. A subterfuge that will create resentment and opposition.

I am willing right now to vote for a reapportionment on the basis of the 1920 census without let or hindrance. I shall be willing to vote in 1932 on the 1930 census. I am unwilling, however, to bind my fellows of the Seventy-second Congress, or the Seventy-third or the Seventy-fourth Congress.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. My colleague says he is binding himself so he can not act in 1932. Surely my colleague will agree that when he is here in 1932, as I hope he will be, he is going to be free to act on a reapportionment bill and every other Member of the House will be free to act.

Mr. CELLER. That is not so for this reason, because we will not then be free. We shall be compelled to act. Is that freedom of action? There is a great controversy looming between the cities and the country, and that is what is inherent in reapportionment of any sort. There is always going to be difficulty in getting a majority to vote one way or the other and you have gotten into a deadlock. The deadlock is present, and because of that deadlock there will always be difficulty in getting action on a bill of this character. The gentleman from New York indicated the deadlock because he said that a coalition of States which will lose Representatives is preventing reapportionment. If that is true, you may still have difficulty in the years to come in getting the required majority. You say here is the bill that will end the difficulty.

That will not end the difficulty. It will make the deadlock firmer. Coercion of any sort breeds resentment and makes the opposing factions more hostile. This coercive bill strengthens the arms of the warring sides.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. CELLER. I have only five minutes, but I will yield.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I may be able to get the gentleman another minute. The gentleman has just said that a deadlock in 1930 may prevent the repeal of this bill or the passage of another reapportionment bill. Is not that the best argument for the passage of this bill?

Mr. CELLER. No; it is not. That issue underlying the deadlock must be faced. It must be faced squarely, openly. It can not be decided by trick. The gentleman indicated that this very procedure was used in 1850. It was used then because of the looming of the quarrel and struggle on slavery, and they postponed the day when they had to determine the final proposition, as they did on all questions relating to slavery. Because of that failure to meet the issue there were compromises, postponements, evasions, finally war between North and South.

I repeat, the issue and the struggle underlying reapportionment is between the large States with large cities on one side and the rural and agricultural States on the other side. That thread of controversy runs through all the political struggles evidenced in this House. That thread runs through immigration, prohibition, income tax, tariff. It is the city versus the country. The issue grows more and more menacing.

This issue, in so far as it concerns reapportionment, must be faced squarely. This bill seeks to evade it, to cover it up.

The Congress, after the 1930 census, will have to face that issue squarely. After they have taken the census it is the duty of a Congress to act. Congress should have acted long since, but, not having acted, we can now, in order to cover up the dereliction of previous Congresses by this bill, involving, as it does subterfuge and circumlocution. [Applause.]

There is some talk about increasing the size of the House. That would be idle and wrong. No good purpose could be served thereby. The House is now unwieldy as to numbers. Increase the number of Representatives and you play further into the hands of the small oligarchy that now rules the House, because the greater the number the greater must be the delegation of authority to the few leaders or "bosses" of the House.

England clearly saw the error of increasing the number of members of the House of Commons in 1918 from 670 to 707. Six hundred and seventy had been the fixed number since 1885. But after trying 707 for six years it reduced the number in 1922 to 615—lower than it had been since 1885.

The French Chamber of Deputies comprises 580 members; but that chamber is often the scene of wild disorder, primarily because of the great number of deputies. Italy's Chamber of Deputies in 1925 had 560 members. Under Mussolini these members have become mere rubber stamps. Greatness in number did not make Italy's lower house more democratic; rather did great numbers play into the hand of Dictator Mussolini.

The German Reichstag has 493 members—a number larger than ours—but most of the other lower houses of parliaments the world over are smaller than ours.

The Canadian House of Commons has 245 members.

The Norwegian Riksdig—lower house—has 230 members.

It is probably unfair to compare assemblies of sovereignties with the parliamentary systems and those like our Government with purely representative system. Under the parliamentary system there is little or no initiative from the floor. Legislation springs from the premier, from the ministry. Little right is given to a member of the House of Commons, for example, to offer successfully enactments from the floor as we do in this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS of California. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the committee report submitted with this bill states that, by reason of failure to reapportion the membership of Congress following the 1920 census, 13,000,000 American citizens have been denied equal representation in Congress since that date. It further states that by 1930, when the next census will be taken, this number will have increased to 31,000,000 people thus deprived of equal and fair representation. The population of the United States, as now estimated, is about 120,000,000. Thus it will appear that more than one-fourth of our people are denied their equal rights as American citizens, or, to express it in another way, a population equal to the average population of 12 States is without representation in this body, and we are prone to boast of our free, democratic, and representative Government. It is no uncommon thing to hear gentlemen on the floor of this House proclaim their loyalty and deep devotion to that venerated document known as the American Constitution. We listen with justifiable pride and much animation to these patriotic orations and sink back in our seats with a sense of satisfaction and feeling of security for the welfare and perpetuation of our representative plan of government. This Constitution, for which we all profess our fondness, provides, in substance, that following each Federal census a reapportionment of the membership of Congress shall be made. It was not done following the census of 1920 and it now remains to be seen whether it will be done following the census of 1930.

There seems to be opposition to this bill, based on the alleged ground that it is anticipatory legislation and therefore unconstitutional, or that it is a delegation of the legislative power of Congress. This opposition comes from the States which will probably lose in membership. It is altogether proper to ask the gentlemen who are offering this opposition what remedy, if any, they propose to submit as an alternative for the measure now before Congress? Do they propose to continue to oppose any reapportionment so long as certain States will probably be reduced in membership? Are they willing to continue to disfranchise one-fourth of our entire population and openly defy the mandates of the Constitution for purely selfish reasons?

The makers of the Constitution undoubtedly anticipated exactly the condition with which we are now confronted, and it was for the purpose of relieving from this condition that the provision for reapportionment every decade was enacted. The Congresses preceding 1920 have had the courage to reapportion. The reasons for it now are far more potent than ever before, because there are now greater inequalities than ever existed before.

Let me give you some facts and figures which directly confront us in California. I think these will open your eyes.

When Congress was last reapportioned and my State of California was allotted 11 Representatives, we had a registration of voters in the State amounting to 393,000. On the 1st day of May this year we had a registration in Los Angeles County alone—not the whole State but in one county—of 722,000. The registration for this year has not closed and will not close until 30 days before the November election. If you add to this figure the normal increase in registration from May to November, you will find that at the November election in 1928 we will have 909,000 registered voters in Los Angeles County, as compared with 393,000 in the whole State in 1910. It is true that since the 1910 registration women have been enfranchised, so in order to make allowance for that we will cut the figures in half, which will give in November a registration of 454,500 voters. This indicates that in Los Angeles County, which now has only two Representatives in Congress, we have at least 200,000 more people than were in the whole State of California when we were given the 11 Congressmen we now have. Will any of you gentlemen who oppose this bill claim that this is fair or that this is genuine representative government?

Let me give you some more figures and facts, some that touch on the economic and commercial development of Los Angeles County, with which I am most familiar, and I assert that this trend of development is more or less general throughout the State.

The following table shows the progress between 1910 and 1920 as shown by the census figures, and between 1920 and 1927 as determined by official and semiofficial sources:

	1910	1920	1927
Post-office business	$1,477,000	$4,190,000	$9,781,000
Bank clearings	$811,387,000	$3,994,280,000	$9,387,948,000
Building permits	$21,684,000	$60,024,000	$123,077,000
Population of—
Los Angeles City	319,198	576,673	1,366,889
Los Angeles County	504,131	936,455	2,319,828

Upon analysis these figures show a remarkable check on themselves. During the first period of 10 years the post-office business practically tripled, the bank clearings increased by 400 per cent, and building permits tripled. In 1920 the city population was 187 per cent of that in 1910, while the county population became 185 per cent.

During the following seven years ending January 1, 1928, post-office business was multiplied by two and one-third, bank clearings by the same multiple, two and one-third, and building permits a little more than doubled. The city population became 237 per cent and the county population 248 per cent greater than in 1920 and over 460 per cent greater than 1910.

That the growth continues is shown by the income-tax returns, which certainly no one will knowingly pad. The tax returns to date for 1928 are $500,000 more than in the same period of 1927, with 10,000 more persons paying this tax, an increase of 5 per cent in both number of persons and the amount paid. The extraordinary growth in population, which is astounding the world, is after all only 8 to 10 per cent increase. The 1927 increase was a trifle over 5 per cent, or exactly the same as the income-tax figures indicate.

At present, based on the 1910 census, the ninth, tenth, and eleventh congressional districts of California, substantially covering southern California, have only 3 Members of this House, yet the 1920 census gave this territory a population of 1,285,220, entitling us at the existing apportionment rate to 6 Representatives. To-day Los Angeles County alone, the ninth and tenth districts, has over 2,300,000 people, and should have 10 Members.

Forget, if you please, the mere count of heads as justifying our demand for increased representation and consider for a moment the industrial value of that great western community, the taxes paid to the Federal Government, the foreign commerce, the innumerable things that are forcing California to the front rank among these United States.

The factory pay roll, based on a five and one-half day week, is $1,000,000 every working day; the moving-picture industry pay roll exceeds $100,000,000 per year; 43 new factories last year invested $42,000,000 in plants and equipment; over 8,000 factories turned out in excess of $1,278,000,000 (or over one and one fourth billions) in value of products each year; bank clearings exceed $900,000,000 monthly; $111,000,000 export trade last year, an increase of 12 per cent over the preceding year, while the national increase was but 2½ per cent. These figures exclude petroleum, which is another story of enormous wealth produced and largely spent in southern California. One hundred and ninety thousand factory workers furnish an underlying prosperity not equaled elsewhere. This is why Los Angeles last year was the only one of the first five cities to show an increase in value and number of building permits.

A normal year in 1927 gave California farmers $455,000,000 for their crops, and a total of $660,000,000 if livestock is included. Citrus fruits alone paid $120,000,000, or about three times the maximum output ever made in one year by the famous gold miners of 1849.

Los Angeles Harbor last year served 7,200 ships, carrying 26,500,000 tons of freight, valued at $910,000,000, the intercoastal tonnage alone exceeding the combined tonnage of all the northern coast ports.

The city has 4,400 miles of streets, the State has 79,000 miles of highways, 22 per cent of which are hard surfaced. We spent about $79,000,000 last year on our roads and highways.

The State has registered 1,703,685 automobiles. There is one car for every two people in my home county.

Based upon 50 per cent valuation, Los Angeles is assessed at practically $3,000,000,000 and among her banks are several which challenge the great New York Wall Street banks in wealth, prestige, and power.

Capt. Robert Dollar, the head of the numerous Dollar enterprises, including one of the most successful steamship lines of the seven seas, a man who knows the Pacific world, the Orient, the islands, the entire west coast probably better than any other living man, states that the coming development of the Pacific coast will demand a population of 50,000,000 people to fill its commercial needs.

These figures are cited, not in boast of sunny California, but to support our demand that adequate recognition be given us. This tremendous growth, this teeming hive of industry, this potential greatest city of the western world and perhaps of all the world, is represented here by two members. Like populations in the East, smaller areas of far less possibilities for further growth are represented by 6, 8, or 10 Members of this House. Combine with our great numbers the fact that we are all pioneers or the children of pioneers, alive, aggressive, and keenly conscious of our civic rights and duties, and willing to do our share, and the injustice of denying us a larger measure of representation in national affairs becomes all the more apparent. I submit that in all fairness and in all good conscience this bill should be passed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MOORMAN].

Mr. MOORMAN. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, in the outset, as a member of the Census Committee, I desire to say that I recognize it to be my duty to vote for a reapportionment bill of the right kind at the proper time. But any reapportionment based on the census of 1920 would be absurd, for the reason that another census upon which reapportionment can be better based is due in two years, in 1930. Also it would be unfair for certain reasons, namely:

First. That the census of population was taken as of January 1, 1920, which was considered unfair to the rural districts, especially in the years following the close of the World War; and Second. That the actual enumeration was not efficient.

Further, the census of 1930 is provided for in a bill that our committee recently unanimously reported out. It will have new and perfected features, provides for the taking of the census May 1, which is the time agreed upon by our committee when the actual population of the cities and rural sections can be most fairly ascertained, and, on the whole, it promises to be the most complete and dependable enumeration and statistical record of people and facts ever made. In this connection I would like to say there is some disposition to have the 1930 census taken as of November 1. Our committee was convinced that this would be another mistake. Road and weather conditions would prevent fair rural enumeration. This census is going to employ about 100,000 people and will cost about $40,000,000. It will reveal many facts that Congress should have before it to intelligently consider a reapportionment bill, which is a matter of most vital importance to all the States.

I respectfully invite your attention to the minority report, concurred in by nearly half of the Census Committee, as follows:

> We desire to submit briefly our reasons for opposing this bill.
>
> In the first place, this legislation is unnecessary and is an attempt to bind a future Congress.
> It does not propose to reapportion Congress under the census of 1920, but attempts to legislate for a future Congress relative to a reapportionment on the basis of a census to be taken in 1930. It also attempts to arbitrarily fix the size of the House at 435 Members without first taking into consideration the inequities and injustices that might be avoided by adjusting the size of the House under the census of 1930 to take care of all of the States.
>
> It proposes to lay down a formula which they call "major fractions," and which few Members of the House will understand and fewer still can explain.
>
> It is proposed also to delegate to the Secretary of Commerce the apportioning power, which is primarily vested in the Congress of the United States. Thus, in case Congress failed to act at the first session after the taking of the decennial census, the executive department charged with the duty of taking the census would also have placed in its hands the power of reapportioning the House of Representatives under that census.
> In order to avoid the absurd and ridiculous situation in which the passage of this bill would place the Congress, we respectfully submit that it would be better to wait until after the taking of the census of 1930 and then have the House reapportion its membership according to that census.

The real purpose and basis of this bill is clearly indicated in the plain words of the Census Committee majority report, to-wit:

> It is anticipatory legislation. It seeks to meet an emergency situation which might develop in 1930.

There is a disposition to attribute to Representatives from the States that will lose Congressmen a desire to indefinitely postpone reapportionment. This idea is, I am impressed, largely without basis. Due to the unusual and unsettled conditions in 1920, following the war and when many rural people were in the population centers and elsewhere, resulting in an admittedly unfair population enumeration, there has been much opposition to reapportionment on the basis of the 1920 census. However, Kentucky, under this bill, will lose two Members, based on the population estimated for 1930. Even the contemplation of this result arouses and warrants deep concern. The reduction of any State's present representation is disturbing sacred rights. I do not believe the present number of representatives of any State should be reduced. The results of reapportionment on the remaining districts of a State are sometimes almost as important as the loss of Members. I also believe the anticipatory feature of the proposed legislation is fundamentally unsound and that the bill is altogether unwise. It amounts to a surrender by Congress of more of its powers, and is the unnecessary delegation of its duties and rights.

The imputation that a future Congress, with all the facts of the new and complete 1930 census before it, can not or will not know or do its duty, or that such a Congress will not possess as much intelligence or integrity as this one, I think, is unwarranted. I believe that practically every Member of this House, under the Constitution and his oath, feels largely as the majority report indicates, in the following words:

> The committee is strongly of the opinion that the failure to reapportion is a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution. It holds the view that no section of the Constitution is more fundamental to our Government than this section. Without its observance representative government becomes a sham.

As to limiting the number of the House to 435, I understand the corresponding branch of the German Government has 493 members, the French Government 580 members, and the English Government 615 members. By the increase of our membership to a body approximately the size of the smallest of these, all States could be saved loss of present representation. The House would be but little more unwieldy than it is at present, if any more so at all. The comparison of the legislative records of the United States Senate, with only 96 Members, with that of the House, with 435, would indicate no loss of efficiency by the suggested increase in our numbers. Further, there is a drift of population and consequently of legislative power to the cities. The losses of Members under this bill will be greatest to rural sections and the gains largely to the population centers. This tendency is worthy of our careful consideration.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RUTHERFORD].

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel that what I may say will throw a new light on the bill under discussion, as the speakers who have preceded me have covered practically every point, but I wish to explain my position.

Some of the speakers have seen fit to impugn the motives of some who have favored the bill and of some who for good reasons have seen fit to oppose the measure.

Coming from a State that will not lose or gain a Member, no matter what method is adopted, I sincerely trust that the membership of the House will accord to me a sense of fairness and impartiality.

While the Constitution of our country does provide that an actual enumeration shall be made each 10 years, it does not definitely state or require that a reapportionment be made following each enumeration. While this practice was followed up to 1911, we have only one precedent where the Congress undertook to pass a law defining the duties of the succeeding Congress, as is undertaken in the bill now under consideration.

An effort was made in 1921 to reapportion the Representatives in several States, but the effort was defeated, and each succeeding Congress has failed to legislate on the subject.

My opinion is that if we have gone this far without making a reapportionment under the census of 1920, we should now wait until an enumeration of the population is taken in the spring of 1930. When the census of population is then submitted to the following Congress, the Congress will be in position to know how to act intelligently in the reapportionment of its Members.

The hearings before the Committee on the Census clearly showed that in many instances the census of 1920 was inaccurate, as it was taken in January, when the weather and roads were bad. The committee has sought to relieve this situation by reporting a bill authorizing the census to be taken on May 1, 1930.

When the 1920 census was taken, it was shown that the shift of population from the rural sections to the industrial centers had been greater than in any other period prior to 1920. A large number of our people had left the farms in order to take advantage of higher wages in the industrial centers.

My information is, however, that a great many of these people are now drifting back to the small towns and rural communities, and if this continues until 1930 we will have a more normal distribution of our population.

I am not in position to discuss the best method of reapportionment, as the statisticians who came before the committee differed very materially as to the methods submitted.

As the Bureau of the Census will be charged with the administration of the law now under consideration, I believe that the selection of the best method of reapportionment should be left to the bureau and not made one of the provisions of the law.

The advisory committee recommended the method of equal proportions, which has the indorsement of Doctor Hill, of the Bureau of the Census. Under this method a larger number of the small States will get the benefits.

I am opposed to any plan that reduces the representation of any of the States, even though the House membership will be increased to take care of this situation. In my opinion this is no more than a political gesture, as we are undertaking to direct future Congresses, which we have no legal right to do.

We are living in a very progressive age, and none of us can foresee what may happen in the course of a few years. For that reason we should leave this matter to a succeeding Congress to solve in the right way.

So far as I am concerned, I am not willing to delegate any more power to the different bureaus than is absolutely necessary. I think that any Congress is capable and competent of preparing and passing a bill that will make a fair and just reapportionment of the Representatives without delegating any of its rights to any department of the Government.

According to the method of major fractions provided in this bill, based upon the estimated census for 1930, 17 States lose 23 Members and 11 States gain 23 Members.

I quote from the advisory committee's report to the Director of the Census:

> The method of equal proportions leads to an apportionment in which the ratios between the representation and the population of the several States are as nearly alike as possible.

I quote further from said committee's report:

> If the method of equal proportions is used, the choice is a matter of indifference. Any or all of the possible forms of fractions will lead to the same apportionment. That is, the apportionment will bring one set of fractions "as near as may be" to equality, will also minimize the differences in the other sets of fractions. This is because when the "nearness" of ratios is measured on a relative scale the results do not depend upon the particular form of the fractions by means of which the ratios are expressed.

Doctor Hill made the following statement before the Committee on the Census, from which I quote:

> The method of equal proportions is the method by which the relative or percentage differences in either of the number of inhabitants per Representatives or the number of Representatives per inhabitants are as small as possible.

I will quote from another statement of Doctor Hill before the committee:

> Comparing three methods, the method of equal proportions is more—I will use the word favorable—is more favorable to the small States than the method of major fractions and less favorable than the method of minimum range. If it be desired to have a method that will favor the small States as much as possible, then the method of minimum range should be used. If it be desired to adopt a method intermediate between these two, not as favorable to the large States as the method of major fractions, nor as favorable to the small States as the method of minimum range, then the right method is the method of equal proportions.

Before voting on this bill I would like to warn the Members from the small States of the Union that the method set out in the bill will work to their injury. I have the utmost respect and confidence in the Bureau of the Census, and I think that the method suggested by the bureau should be adopted in lieu of the method of major fractions.

According to my best information this is the first time that the Congress has undertaken to define the method of reapportionment. It will be in the power of a future Congress to determine the number of Members, and when this is done it will be a very easy matter for the Bureau of the Census to determine the right number to each of the States of the Union. [Applause.]

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY].

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, the tremendous indictment was laid against Julius Cæsar by one of his fearless and patriotic opponents that after his return from Gaul he no longer conspired at the destruction of the constitution of the republic of Rome by mining it but that he now directed an open assault, a frontal attack upon the constitution. The result was a series of bloody civil wars, the destruction of the republic, and the establishment of a tyranny.

The basic principle of the American Constitution is "no taxation without adequate representation." The violation of that fundamental right led to war and the formation of the United States. The principle was written into the Constitution that adequate representation through a reapportionment of the people's branch of Congress, the House, should be made every 10 years.

To-day we see many Members of this House making a frontal assault on the keystone of the American Constitution. And many of these Members were instrumental in first mining the American Constitution by inserting therein a fundamental violation of its cardinal guarantees of human rights and personal liberty. They mined the Constitution with the eighteenth amendment, the sled-length proponents of which are so eager to enforce that they would blow up the provisions of the Constitution which guarantee the American citizen against unlawful search and seizure and against the unlawful use of firearms of Federal agents against the life and limbs of innocent, law-abiding citizens.

Thus we see these miniature Julius Cæsars to-day raising the hue and cry against "nullificationists." By that they mean those American citizens who are not for bloody sled-length enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, and who stand for the enforcement of the rest of the Constitution. These men would violate the bill of rights provisions of the American Constitution and and would nullify the proportional representation clause. They are the real nullificationists of this country. They are the ambitious Cæsars bent on tyranny. The only answer to a hard-riding Cæsar is the menace of civil war.

Not only do these nullificationists aim to deprive millions of American citizens of their just representation in Congress, but they also deprive these millions of their just voice in national conventions and in the Electoral College, the American's safeguards against violence in national elections such as we perenially witness in most Latin-American Republics. They would deprive these American millions of efficiently expressing their wishes in choosing the President of the United States, the Vice President, and the administrative branch of the Government, and indirectly the judicial branch of the Government.

The vote thief is the meanest of all thieves, for he steals from the citizen by connivance or violence his sacred possession and privilege.

The political gunman is the most vicious and terrible of all the foes of organized society. In his wake follow chaos and anarchy. He tears to pieces more quickly than any other gunman the fabric of government and destroys the safeguards thrown around the most cherished possessions of the human being—life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness.

Speaking frankly, the foes of reapportionment have some votes in Congress to which they are not entitled under the Constitution of the United States. They hold these votes and have for six or seven years by brute strength and recourse to rape of the Constitution. The most strenuous efforts have failed to make them disgorge their plunder. They know they have cheated other groups of American citizens out of these votes and that has been continuously impigned upon their consciences, but so callous their political code of honor that it would resist a woodman's ax.

They are as hard-boiled as the toughest vote thief or political gunman that ever trained a machine gun upon a Chicago citizen. They are more dangerous to the Republic, because they sit in higher places and know they are an example for the lesser fry of politicians to go out and do likewise.

They have been haled into court here in the House yesterday and to-day and are making their defense to the American people. They are trying to explain why some 200 men, because they are Congressmen, should be allowed to violate the Constitution and thwart the will of about 123,000,000 of American people.

The real reason is that they want to save their own political hides or the hides of some of their friends or of some unknown persons in their States who may want to come to Congress the easiest way and sit in a seat that was pilfered.

But they dare not say that. They try to fool the country and the voter by parliamentary quibbles, by technical discourses. They try to becloud the issue.

They attack the system of major fractions as being confusing and not easily understood. It was the system used nearly a hundred years ago, in 1840, and it was the system used in the last congressional reapportionment, made as result of the reapportionment of 1910. It is fair and just, but these gentlemen do not want fairness and justice.

The common defense of the gunman when he is finally haled before the bar of justice is to drag out the name of his good, old mother, and ask the judge to think of that good old lady rather than the guilty one.

So these opponents of this reapportionment measure are begging the House to think of the good name of Congress and not belittle it by delegating any of its power to the administrative branch of the Government, in this case to the Department of Commerce. Now, the Census Committee, of which I am a member, and which drew up this bill, thoroughly settled that question. The majority which brought out this bill know that the delegation argument is merely an obvious red herring drawn across the trail.

This bill does not provide for a delegation of congressional authority with the Department of Commerce exercising legislative authority and doing as it pleases. It is merely a well-defined ministerial direction to do thus and so and no more. It is directed merely to undertake certain hard and fast clerical duties and commissions. These clerical duties are mathematically circumscribed. There can be no deviation. They do not amount to a curtailment of the powers of Congress; they are merely the execution of the expressed will of Congress if the bill is passed.

It shows how weak the case of these nullificationists is when they have to resort to such quibbles and subterfuges.

Some of the gentlemen have had the effrontery to explain away the rank injustice of not consenting to a reapportionment upon the basis of the 1920 census by saying that the war closed in 1918 and perhaps there was slight shifting of population in the country in 1920 as a result of the war. Could any more frivolous reason be given for a breach of contract in a civil action or the perpetration of a crime as to say, "The war was an unusual thing, and it is the reason for 'going hay wire'"? Some of the gentlemen who helped to kill reapportionment are more frank and have said they will always oppose reapportionment even if they can not fall back on the Civil War or the Great War or the depopulation of some districts by the recurrent Mississippi floods.

This bill is a great personal victory for those who have fought for reapportionment through all these dreary years. It was only brought out of the Census Committee with a favorable report because the committee was increased in number by the House Republican organization from 15 to 21 members. That organization was kind enough to give me a place on that committee at my request, although one Detroit Member, my distinguished colleague [Mr. McLEOD], was already on that committee.

We are going to carry on the good fight even though we get a setback to-day. This cause is as righteous and as fundamental to good government as any cause ever argued here. It must win. The alternative is a lowering of the whole political morality of the country. The alternatives also are the rising of fierce passions and possible civil war.

This is a constitutional question of the first importance. Men stood on this floor 20 or 30 years before our Civil War and threatened civil war if they did not have their way in breaking that great national contract, the Constitution. Men were bullheaded, and we had the Civil War.

My mother's father and brother marched out of Detroit to the battle fields of that war. It was a terrible calamity. My mother to this day never speaks of those terrible days without weeping. Many newspapers in this country are carrying editorials pointing out the danger of civil war arising out of the gross injustice of Congress refusing to reapportion. Members would do well in taking heed of the first importance of this bill which they will vote on here to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROMJUE.]

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the question of whether or not this bill complies with the constitutional mandate is entirely out of the case because if the bill becomes law it will not be operative until after 1930, and the decade from 1920 to 1930 will already have passed.

However, I want to call the committee's attention to what I think is the most serious defect in the proposed legislation, if it should be enacted, and that is that in the very first section of the bill it is stated that the Secretary of Commerce shall certify to Congress as soon as practicable. Now, this is an indefinite statement. The statement is that as soon as practicable the Secretary of Commerce shall certify the census records and then upon that certification the Congress shall proceed, if it desires to do so, to apportion the Representatives to the various States of the Union.

Mr. FENN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROMJUE. Not just now.

My friends, I want to call your attention to the further fact that this authority to certify the population is vested in the Secretary of Commerce. I will admit, it is a power upon condition; that is, in the event the Congress does not apportion after the certification is made, then the condition operates, and you must take the recommendation or the record that is set forth in the certificate of the Secretary of Commerce.

The most important point I want to call attention to is this: Suppose, after the census is taken in 1930, some State—we will say the State of Oklahoma, or any other State for that matter—is satisfied it has had a fraudulent census, or an erroneous census, and we will assume that perhaps it has been a fraudulent or incomplete or erroneous census in some respects. This question will confront the Congress in the future on some occasion, and when it does confront the Congress, the State that charges that it has been defrauded or that an unlawful census has been taken has the right to get out a writ of prohibition against the Secretary of Commerce and stop him from certifying to the House of Representatives the census of that State, and as long as this is tied up in the courts of the country under a writ of prohibition, as the State would have the right to tie it up, the Congress is powerless to act, because you can not act until the certificate comes over, and you will find, gentlemen, that you are not clarifying the situation, but you are going to lead this question into the labyrinth of greater embarrassment and difficulty in the future.

As I said a moment ago, the Congress must wait for the certificate from the Secretary of Commerce before it can act, and the certificate having been tied up by a writ of prohibition by one or more States charging they have been defrauded in the census, the Secretary can not get it over for action until that is clarified in the courts and your hands are tied, and the question of practicability of certifying the matter over would certainly be very vital because if the hands of the Secretary of Commerce were tied by a writ of prohibition he would have the most practicable reason for withholding the certificate, and, as a matter of fact, the courts would restrain him from acting.

Under the present system it is true that there has been a failure to apportion this time, and once only in the entire history of the country. What other law, what other function of this Government has a better record—only once from the foundation of the Government down to now. Now, you are taking away from the dominant parties of this country the right to apportion to the people of the various States the number of Representatives which those States shall have; and where do you place that authority? I say it is a conditional taking away of the power of Congress and a vesting in a member of the President's Cabinet the power of apportioning the Members, but the condition will arise. What are you doing? You are putting into the hands of a ministerial officer, a member not chosen by the people, a member not chosen by the Congress, but appointed by the President of the United States; a member that has won his spurs and gained political prestige by his assistance to the President in a political campaign, be he Democrat or Republican.

The Constitution of the United States in its original form provided that—

> Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons.

The Constitution was some time after the Civil War amended and by the amending, the word "free" was eliminated so as to give consideration to the settlement of the slave question. Briefly, and so far as the Constitution refers to this matter after its amendment, it provides that—

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed.

No one will challenge the right and duty of Congress to make an apportionment following each census of every 10 years. This bill, however, in its present form should not pass for the following reasons:

This bill should not pass because its delegation of authority to a bureau chief, to one man, if you please, the Secretary of Commerce, is wrong in principle even though it be a delegation upon condition.

The answer to those who say it is to avoid the experience we have had following the last census—if Congress has not acted on the apportionment now said to be due—the passage of this law will not in any way compel or induce Congress to act on an apportionment following any future census.

Therefore in case of Congress failing to act in the future, if this bill becomes a law, the certificate from the Secretary of Commerce will make the apportionment of the Representatives among the people. If Congress does not act, as it may not in that future decade, as it has not in this decade, the certificate of the Secretary is final and can not be challenged, even for error or mistakes, because the bill says "each State shall be entitled," and so forth.

It is my honest and deliberate judgment, gentlemen, that among those who support this bill to-day, should it become a law, will be men who will live to see the time in which they will give serious consideration to the errors of this legislation.

If Congress will not act on the matter before the passage, time will some day prove it will not act after its passage. Then what will you have? Why, sirs, you will have instead of Democratic and Republican Representatives of the people, jointly apportioning among the people of the various States the number of Representatives to which they are entitled—you will have one man doing it, a member of the President's Cabinet, more or less under presidential influence and guidance.

If this bill should pass and become a law, it would be an effort on the part of the present Congress laying down a regulation to govern, bind, and hamper the action of future Congresses. It is said by some who favor this legislation that if a future Congress does not wish to abide by and follow the directions and restrictions of this bill, if it should become a law, the future Congress could repeal it. That is true. It could be repealed, but as the present Congress will not be bound or required to act under this law, if it becomes such, why should we force its provisions upon a future Congress? Future Congresses can meet the question when it gets to them, and besides it is considerably more difficult to repeal a law once it is written into the statutes than it is to enact a law in the first instance.

The Constitution in its present form has vested in the Congress of the United States to make the apportionment of the people's representatives among the various States, and I believe it is much better that Congress should function under the present condition of the Constitution than it is to vest even a conditional power in one man. I do not believe the different States of this Union and the people therein are willing to leave it to one man to say how many Congressmen they should have from their State, and especially when that one man is a member of the President's Cabinet.

If this bill should become a law, we might in the future find ourselves in a position after complications had arisen as I have heretofore pointed out, in which the election of the President of the United States might be contested so closely that it would be thrown into the House of Representatives to be settled and decided. Then if it devolved upon the Secretary of Commerce, a member of the President's Cabinet, to fix the number of Representatives each State should have, there is even a possibility that that representation might be so handled that the Secretary of Commerce could by his certificate increase the power of representation in some States or diminish it in others, whereby even the election of the President succeeding might devolve upon the action of the Secretary of Commerce.

That is putting the power too far away from the people and too close to the head of the Government. In these days we have greater difficulty in preserving the rights of the individual citizen and we should always be slow in taking the power away from the people and transferring it into the bureaus and into individual hands.

It is apparent to anyone conversant with the present conditions existing in this country that there is a very rapid drifting of power and population into the large cities of our country and away from the rural sections and agricultural people. The rural sections of the country already have too little power and influence and too small a number of Representatives for the most efficient work of the Federal Government as compared to the large cities and big industrial centers.

Thomas Jefferson, in my opinion the greatest statesman and most farseeing statesman the world has ever produced, never ceased to praise the rural sections of our country, and that particularly devoted to agriculture, as the one the most moral and ennobling. On one occasion he expressed himself to Mr. Madison by saying:

> I think our Government will remain virtuous for many centuries as long as the people are chiefly agricultural, and this will be as long as there shall be vacant land in America. When they (meaning the people) get piled up on one another in large cities, as in Europe, they will become corrupt as in Europe.

I wish to call your attention to this fact, that the Constitution in its present form in providing for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress to the several States takes into consideration the whole and entire population of the United States, excluding Indians not taxed; and that, without regard to whether the population consists of American citizens or people of foreign birth who are not yet naturalized.

In some of the large industrial sections, and particularly in the East, there are now in some localities as many, and in some instances more, people of foreign birth than there are native-born American citizens. And this bill, if permitted to become a law, is transferring more power by providing for an increased membership in many of these localities, and correspondingly it is lessening the comparative strength of many sections of the country where 90 or more per cent of the people are native-born Americans. So, in effect, the bill, if enacted into law, would have a tendency to take away from some States that are populated with a highly American citizenship and add to the States more power and strength in which there are a much higher percentage of people of foreign birth.

But while the Constitution fixes the basis of representation upon population, nevertheless this is the way the present bill would work if enacted into law.

It must be remembered that the census that was taken in 1920 was probably the most unfair and incomplete census that has ever been taken in the United States. It has been the custom of the Government in taking its census or enumeration of the population of the United States every 10 years, from the foundation of the Government to the present time, to take the census in the summer months, usually along about June, but the census of 1920, for some reason, departed from that practice and the census was taken for the first time in the month of January. This gave the large centers of population a great advantage over the rural sections of the country in ascertaining the number of people in the particular localities.

In the month of January the weather was extremely cold in 1920. The roads were exceedingly bad and where census enumerators in the more thinly settled States had to go over rough roads in cold weather to enumerate the population there was much less likelihood of getting an accurate and full list of all the people in such sections than there was in the cities and larger centers of population.

During the World War a great many people left the rural sections and went into the industrial sections to work, and while the war had ended when the last census was taken, a great many of these people who were really only temporarily away from their former homes had not yet returned, as they have since that time, to their former and real home residence.

The entire country will be more settled in 1930 and it is only reasonable to expect that a more complete census will be had.

And a striking and remarkable fact is disclosed by the operation of the provision in this bill, which is expected to work out under the major-fraction proposition, while in the State of Arkansas under the equal-proportion proposition would give that State seven delegates, the major-fraction proposition contemplated by this legislation would give Arkansas only six. At the same time the equal-proportion proposition would give the State of New York 42 Members and the major-fraction proposition would give this same State 43, and this is also true, as it is admitted by some who advocate the passage of this bill as between other large and small States; that is, that the major-fraction proposition would increase proportionately membership in the large States and decrease it in the small ones.

By the major-fraction proposition my own State of Missouri would lose 4 Members of Congress from that State, and while the bill provides for the membership of the House to remain at the same number, to wit, 435, if this bill should pass it would mean that Missouri would have 4 less Representatives in Congress and those 4 Representatives would be placed to the credit of some other States.

I am confident a more complete census will be had in 1930, and in my judgment it will show that Missouri is not entitled to lose that membership to some other States. Certainly I think it would not lose that many. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FREE].

Mr. FREE. Mr. Chairman, Article VI, clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States provides:

> The Senators and Representatives shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution.

We have all taken such an oath.

Section 2 of amendment 14 to the Constitution of the United States provides:

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being 21 years of age, and citizens of the United States or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the whole number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State.

Article I, section 2, clause 3, of our Constitution provides:

The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of 10 years, in such manner as they shall by law direct.

Unless we observe our oath by carrying out the provisions of our Constitution, we not only violate our oath but in reality become violators of our fundamental law.

Our system of government is based on the principle of proportionate representation in the House of Representatives. Unless we conform to the dictates of our Constitution, we are in reality breaking down our system of government.

It is not right to deny any State the representation to which it is entitled.

Nearly 18 years have passed since we have had reapportionment. This means that several States have for nearly 8 years been denied the representation to which they are entitled.

My State, California, is an example.

Under the Constitution, California has been entitled to at least three more Representatives than it has had.

Not only has our State been denied representation to which it is entitled, but an additional burden has been put upon the Representatives from that and other States similarly affected.

Some Members from our State represent over 1,000,000 people, and nearly every Member is representing many more people than they should on any basis of reapportionment.

Industries requiring legislative attention increase with population, as do also the problems of internal development, such as river and harbor development.

The mere matter of answering communications from constituents adds greatly to the work of a Member as population in his district increases.

It is not fair to the Members in districts where population has materially increased to place these additional burdens upon them merely because other districts have not had such increases, nor is it fair for States lacking population to deny to States with increased population the representatives to which entitled and which means in reality denying several States votes on legislation to which they are entitled.

The Fourteenth Census of population was taken as of January 1, 1920, and the Director of the Census submitted the figures of the total population of the United States to Congress on October 7, 1920.

During the Sixty-sixth Congress, third session, the Committee on the Census reported H. R. 14498, a bill providing that after the 3d day of March, 1923, the House of Representatives shall be composed of 483 Members. Under this apportionment no State would have lost a Member.

This bill as amended, providing for a House of 435 Members, passed the House on January 19, 1921, but the Senate failed to act upon it before the close of the session.

During the Sixty-seventh Congress, first session, the Committee on the Census reported H. R. 7882, a bill providing that after the 3d day of March, 1923, the House of Representatives shall be composed of 460 Members. Under this bill Maine and Missouri each would have lost a Member. An effort to amend this bill to read 435 failed. A motion to recommit this bill to the committee was agreed to by a margin of four votes, and no further action was taken by the committee.

The Committee on the Census did not report a bill during the Sixty-eighth Congress.

During the Sixty-ninth Congress an effort was made on the floor of the House to take up reapportionment as a privileged question and discharge the Committee on the Census from consideration of H. R. 111. The Speaker submitted the question to the House for its determination. The House, by a vote of 87 yeas and 265 nays, determined that the consideration of this bill was not in order.

On March 3, 1927, a motion was made to suspend the rules and pass H. R. 17378, a bill providing that after the 3d day of March, 1933, the House of Representatives shall be composed of 435 Members, but this motion was defeated by a vote of 187 yeas and 199 nays.

While this legislation will not become effective until after the 1930 census, yet it will be a guarantee that the Congress does not intend to openly violate the provisions of our Constitution, and will give some time for the States to work upon plans for redistricting the several districts.

Let us hope that this will appeal to the fairness and broad-mindedness of our Members. May fairness and not selfishness prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I have but one more speech, and I ask the gentleman from Connecticut to use some of his time.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

Mr. LEA. Mr. Chairman, the basis of representation in the Congress was one of the greatest and most practical of the problems of the Constitutional Convention. The adopted basis of representation was a compromise, which largely contributed to the ratification of the Constitution. Only by the constitutional assurance of equal representation in the House according to population, were the States induced to become integral parts of the Federal Government. As a distinct concession to the small States, the Constitution provides that each State shall have equal representation in the Senate. Ten large States now have half the population of the United States, with 20 representatives in the Senate; 38 States, having the other half of the population, have 76 representatives in the Senate. Inasmuch as presidential electors are granted the States on the basis of their representation in Congress, the small States, representing half the population, have 56 more electoral votes than the 10 large States having the other half of the population. Representation in the House was provided for by giving each State at least one Representative and representation otherwise in proportion to its population. In other words, for all practical purposes each State is given representation in the House of Representatives by the Constitution of the United States on an exact equality, founded upon a mathematical certainty.

The Constitution provides for the census to be taken within every 10-year period, "in such manner as" the Congress shall by law direct.

These provisions of the Constitution recognized the certainty of the increase of population and the inevitable changes in the distribution of the population. No unchangeable apportionment of representation was possible without destroying that equality of representation, according to population, that was deemed essential to the success of our representative form of government. The Constitution, therefore, trusted the Congress with the duty of readjusting representation to population for each 10-year period. It left the Congress no discretion, however, as to the basis of what that representation should be. Representation was to be in proportion to the population of the respective States.

Under these provisions the Congress was in substance given a discretion only as to two matters. The first was that the Congress could determine the number of Members who should constitute the House of Representatives. In the second place the Congress was given the power to determine the manner of taking the census by which the population is determined.

No question is raised here as to the manner of taking the census. Congress can readily agree upon that question.

Disregarding contentious trivialties, this bill presents but one substantial question, and that is whether or not we shall limit the House to a membership of 435, the present number. Members in favor of increasing the membership of the House have a legitimate reason for voting against this bill. In my judgment there is no substantial reason why a man who believes in confining the membership to 435 should not vote for the bill.

At the end of each decade, with the exception of the last one, Congress functioned by reapportioning as provided by the Constitution. In each case, with one exception, however, the membership of the House was increased, primarily, perhaps, to avoid reducing the representation of States which would otherwise lose Representatives by reason of their failure to increase population as rapidly as the average of the country. As a result Congress has been a constantly increasing body. From a membership of 65 it has increased to 435. Following the census of 1920, Congress failed to reapportion, partly because of opposition to increasing the membership of the House and partly because of the opposition from States that would lose representation on reapportionment.

In previous decades this same conflict resulted in a compromise by providing an increased membership of the House. Most of the slow-growing States retained their existing number of Representatives, and increased numbers were given to the more rapidly growing States. The feeling is now general that an increase of the membership of the House would impair the efficiency and usefulness of this body, which is already cumbersomely large. Hence we have stronger opposition to the increase of the membership of the House which was the means by which former controversies of this kind were settled. The disparity between population and representation between the different States will become more pronounced the longer reapportionment is delayed. Reapportionment in the face of the census of 1930 will probably be more difficult than it would have been 10 years earlier.

Under the periodic plan by specific action of Congress, reapportionment is made under pressure of States which would gain or lose representation by reapportionment and the opposing pressure against enlarged membership of the House. Such a controversy involves the interest of individual Members of Congress rather than the welfare of any State or the country at large. It is of no particular benefit to any State to enlarge its representation if the representation of other States is proportionately enlarged. Any constitutional apportionment will be based on equality according to population. Whether the membership of the House is increased or decreased the relative strength of the State remains the same. Granting that the membership of the House is large enough, the only benefit of an increase of membership accrues to individual Members who would otherwise lose their seats. The relative strength of the State would remain the same. While we all have a friendly regard for the individual welfare of our colleagues that should not be a dominating reason for determining the important question of State representation in Congress.

The bill presented to Congress, if placed in operation, would largely eliminate the importance of the personal and political considerations that have heretofore embarrassed Congress in making a constitutional reapportionment. The whole history of reapportionment justifies the plan of automatic reapportionment provided by this bill in preference to the periodic plan heretofore followed.

The bill pending before the House does not propose to reapportion on a basis of the census of 1920, but instead proposes a plan under which, should Congress fail to act within a given time after the census of 1930 and subsequent censuses, reapportionment shall take place automatically. In its substantial features the bill does these things:

First. Fixes the House membership at 435 permanently, or until Congress shall provide otherwise.

Second. Prescribes the mathematical rule under which the representation shall be apportioned to the States. This rule is in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, based on equality of representation.

Third. Requires the Secretary of Commerce, under whose direction the census is taken, to certify to Congress the number of Representatives to which each State shall be so entitled under that rule of computation that Congress prescribes.

It must be conceded that whatever may have been the duty of Congress following the census of 1920, there is no constitutional duty of Congress at the present time to reapportion on the 1930 census. That does not become a constitutional duty until after the 1930 census is taken. However, Congress has a right that can not be successfully questioned to provide for reapportionment in advance of the census. This bill simply provides a sensible and just means of reapportionment that would be effective if Congress fails to act after the next census is taken.

Since 1920 a number of States have been denied the increased representation to which they were entitled under the Constitution. A number of other States have had a representation in excess of that to which they were entitled. This inequality of representation as between the States is a political inequality and injustice that can not be viewed without just concern. The States that for six years have been denied that representation to which they were entitled would, by the enactment of this bill, be assured that they would not, after the next census, continue to be denied that constitutional representation to which they are entitled.

It has been persistently asserted that this bill is an attempt to confer discretionary powers of Congress upon an administrative body, and that it would therefore be an invasion of the constitutional powers of Congress. This contention is without any substantial foundation. The duties conferred on the administrative department are only ministerial. The duties consist merely of a mathematical calculation based upon a formula that Congress itself adopts in this bill. The duty assigned to the Secretary of Commerce involves no congressional discretion. There are literally a thousand instances in which Congress has conferred comparable duties with its right to do so unquestioned.

This bill gives Congress its opportunity to perform its constitutional function by providing in advance for reapportionment under the census of 1930. Its enactment into law would provide a permanent system for reapportionment on the basis prescribed by the Constitution. Its passage would give assurance to all States in the country that just representation would not be denied them; enactment of this measure would afford a strong protection against the recurring exercise of that political pressure which heretofore has been almost universally successful in forcing a material increase in the membership of Congress at the end of each decade. The bill offers no injustice or inequity to any State or section. Debate on this bill has made this fact remarkably evident. You have heard many speak in opposition. You have heard no speaker point out where this bill, if it became a law, would work any injustice to his State. It provides adequate representation for every State on the fair basis established by the Constitution. No speaker even asserts that this bill proposes to deprive his State of that equal and just representation to which it is entitled under the Constitution.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I find myself in the same position as the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER], that when Congress provides for reapportionment, provided it is on the basis of a membership in this House of 435, there is absolutely no chance for me to be reelected. Despite this, however, I agree with the gentleman from Iowa that the membership should not be increased, and I stand ready to carry out the provisions of the Constitution whenever you see fit to bring in a bill properly reapportioning the Members of Congress among the various States.

I place myself on record now as being opposed to increasing the membership of the House and propose to vote to retain the present membership—435.

I can not agree with my colleague Mr. LOZIER, who tells of the House of Lords and House of Commons and shows that the membership of both of those bodies is nearly double that of the lower branch of the American Congress, and advances his opinion why the American Congress, or at least the House, should increase its membership. Instead of being impressed, this argument to me was rather a good one why the United States Congress should remain as it is. According to the report of the committee, 13,000,000 people are now without fair and equitable representation. Where do these 13,000,000 people reside? You know they are in the cities, and the gentlemen from the rural districts know there will be a decrease in their number if you pass a reapportionment bill leaving the membership of the House as it is to-day.

Since 1790 the Congress has complied with the provisions of the Constitution and provided for reapportionment on the basis of population, with the exception of the 1920 census. In each instance the law was passed either in the year the census was taken or the first or second year thereafter; never later. Members of this House rise in their seats time and again and speak of those who they assert nullify the Constitution. Where are the champions of the Constitution now?

Missouri, part of which I have the honor to represent, is going to lose from one to four Members when you reapportion. No one regrets this more than I do; but as a Member of Congress I have a duty to perform, and when you bring in a real reapportionment bill and not a bill where you "pass the buck" you will find me supporting it, although by so doing I will be voting myself out of a seat in this body.

My colleague Mr. LOZIER speaks of the date upon which the next census will be taken. He advocates the late spring or early summer. Fine for the rural districts, when the farms are covered with labor secured from the cities and the city vacationists are sojourning on the farms. These people, who properly should be listed as residents of the cities, will be credited to the rural communities. The census, so far as population is concerned, should be taken January 1, as it was in 1920.

As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] says, no future Congress will be bound by the action you now take. As the report well states, it is anticipatory legislation. Its sole purpose is not to reapportion but to meet an emergency, provided it develops in 1930 after the census has been taken.

Under the terms of this bill you delegate authority vested in Congress by the Constitution to an executive branch of the Government. To this I am opposed.

Every Congress since the 1920 census was taken has shirked its responsibility on this question. If the incoming Congress assumes the same attitude, the responsibility is theirs, and it is not for us to tell them what they should do, but if action is demanded it is for this Congress to do it now. I am opposed to any attempt to permit the executive branch of the Government to assume the duties of the legislative branch. It is for this reason alone I oppose this bill.

The 13,000,000 people in the cities now deprived of proper representation are demanding that a proper reapportionment bill be passed, and when the time comes, if it ever comes during my service, when an opportunity to vote on the direct question is before me, regardless of its effect on me personally I will support the bill, provided it does not increase the membership of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR]. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take much time to discuss this bill. I feel at this time that the House has heard about all of the debate it cares to hear and that further discussion will not change a single vote one way or the other. There are one or two matters in connection with the discussion of the bill that I want to touch upon. A question was raised in the debate yesterday as to who was responsible for our having no apportionment legislation passed prior to this time. The statement was made that when the bill was brought in in the Sixty-seventh Congress providing for reapportionment on the basis of 460 Members a motion to recommit the bill without instructions was supported by Representatives from Michigan, California, and other States, who have since favored reapportionment. Therefore, it was charged that the Representatives from California and from Michigan were responsible for having no apportionment bill passed since that time. I think that charge is immaterial and irrelevant to the question before the House at this time, has no bearing on the question, and is of no importance anyway. The fact of the matter is this: When the bill providing for apportionment on the basis of 460 Members was brought in in the Sixty-seventh Congress those who felt that 435 was a large enough number for this House voted to recommit that bill, and it went back to the committee in the Sixty-seventh Congress. We had a right to assume and did assume that when the House went on record as favoring 435 Members the committee would report back a bill providing for a membership of 435.

Mr. LOZIER rose.

Mr. BARBOUR. No; I can not yield at this time. But it was not done, and even though the recommittal of that bill was responsible for no bill coming out again in the Sixty-seventh Congress we have since had the Sixty-eighth Congress and the Sixty-ninth Congress with no bills reported out, and the Census Committee absolutely refusing to report out apportionment bills in those Congresses. The members of the committee will recall that in the Sixty-ninth Congress several Members of the House of Representatives went before that committee and urged them to report out an apportionment bill. I took the position at that time before the committee that they should report out an apportionment bill of some kind whether it provided for 435 Members or 460 or 500, so that the House could pass upon the question; that the committee had no right to refuse to permit a bill to come before the House and have the House act upon it.

Another question that has been raised in connection with this discussion is whether or not the provisions of the Constitution with regard to apportionment are mandatory. I take the position that the provisions of the Constitution are absolutely mandatory. Article I of the Constitution provides that Representatives and direct taxes "shall" be apportioned among the States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers.

It is also provided that the enumeration "shall" be taken each 10 years.

Representatives "shall" be apportioned among the various States.

If those provisions of the Constitution are not mandatory, then they are meaningless. The only purpose of taking the census every 10 years is to determine the population of the country, so that representation can be properly adjusted and based upon the population as it exists at that time. If those provisions of the Constitution are not mandatory, they are meaningless, and all of the authority that we have upon these provisions of the Constitution is to the effect that they are mandatory. We have the positive, direct rulings of two Speakers of this House to the effect that these provisions are mandatory. That is the language used by two Speakers of this House, Speakers Kiefer and Henderson, and concurred in by other Speakers of the House. It is the duty of Congress to apportion within a reasonable time following the taking of the census. For the past eight years Congress has failed to perform that duty. Opponents of apportionment during that period have taken two positions. Some of them have favored an increase in the membership of the House and would not vote for a bill unless it provided for an increase, yet each time that the House of Representatives has gone on record since the census of 1920 it has declared against a House larger than 435 Members.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Let me finish, and then if I have time I shall be glad to yield. It has been contended that the census of 1920 was taken during abnormal times, that it was taken immediately following the war, that there had been a drift from the rural districts to the industrial districts during the war, and that that drift had turned back. Assuming that to be true, this bill proposes to make an apportionment upon the basis of the census of 1930, when times will be normal in this country if they are ever normal. The census will be taken after the 1st day of May, when the conditions complained of by the opponents of this legislation as having existed in 1920 in respect to the rural population will not further exist.

As things stand at the present time, there exists in this country inequalities in representation in this House that are absolutely unfair, unjustified, and unwarranted. We have one State in this Union with a larger population than another State, yet the State with the smaller population sits in this House with five Representatives more than the State with the larger population, based on the census of 1920.

That State with the smaller population has five more members of the Electoral College than the State with the larger population. We have a State with a population, according to the figures of 1920, of 1,000,000 more than each of two other States, and yet each of those two other States sit in this House with the same number of Representatives as the State with a million more population than either of those States. That is a condition that can not be justified for any reason whatsoever. It is absolutely un-American; it is entirely foreign to the provisions of our Constitution. This condition can not continue to exist. Those who are the strongest opponents of apportionment are willing to admit that this condition must be remedied some time. When will it be remedied? This bill simply proposes that if Congress does not act within a reasonable time after the returns from the 1930 census are available, during the first Congress that follows the reporting of the returns of the 1930 census, then the Bureau of the Census, on a basis of 435 Members, shall certify to the Clerk of the House how many Representatives each State is entitled to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired. All time has expired for general debate, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That as soon as practicable after the fifteenth and each subsequent decennial census the Secretary of Commerce shall transmit to the Congress a statement showing the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed, as ascertained under such census, and the number of Representatives to which each State would be entitled under an apportionment of 435 Representatives made in the following manner: By apportioning one Representative to each State (as required by the Constitution) and by apportioning the remainder of the 435 Representatives among the several States according to their respective numbers as shown by such census, by the method known as the method of major fractions.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, the failure to reapportion according to the population of this country is in effect an attack on representative free government itself. If this refusal to reapportion in accordance with the intent and spirit of the Constitution should be persisted in long enough to produce gross inequalities like those, for instance, in Great Britain, which brought about the revolution resulting in the reform act of 1832, it might be necessary for us also to undergo a revolution that would involve us in sectional strife and possible bloodshed in order to return to the basis which was provided in the Constitution of representative government according to population.

Stripped of all camouflage, opposition to this bill must at last rest upon one of two propositions; either that we do not wish to reapportion at all, or that in case we should reapportion we make the membership of this House large enough so that no State would lose a Representative.

I do not believe that we should agree to either of these propositions, and yet this, in my judgment, is where failure to pass a bill like this will land us.

What does this bill propose to do? It proposes that after the census is taken in 1930 and is reported to Congress the Congress shall proceed in the short session of the Seventy-first Congress—that is, in 1930–31—to make a reapportionment in accordance with the returns of the census. If the Congress then in existence shall do its full duty, then this bill if enacted into law will be of no effect. It will be the duty of that Congress to make the reapportionment without reference to such law. This bill, if enacted into law, in no wise affects that duty. In fact, it would call attention to that duty specifically, because it says in effect that in case that Congress shall fail to perform its duty the population as ascertained by the 1930 census shall then be apportioned upon the basis of 435 Members.

What could be unfair about an operation of this kind? Nobody could claim that any State is not receiving its equal proportion of representation, because the apportionment will be just as accurate as mathematics can make it. All that this bill does is to place back of us the assurance that in case Congress shall fail to do its duty, as it failed eight years ago and has done ever since that time, fails to reapportion, I say then this bill, on the basis of the census, with absolute fairness to all, shall go into effect, and the reapportionment will be made on that basis. Could anything be more fair? Can anyone claim that injustice is done or that any power or right is taken from Congress?

The duty of reapportionment will be put right up to us or to our successors in the short session of the Seventy-first Congress. If that Congress does not like the bill, if we pass it, then is the time for them to meet the situation and do their duty. In case they fail, as other Congresses have failed, and as I gravely fear they may fail, then there will be the assurance, if this bill is the law, that the spirit of the Constitution is to be no longer violated. A reapportionment made on the basis of the new census and in accordance with the terms of this bill will be fair. No State will have more or less representation than it is entitled to under the census.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Suppose that in its wisdom and judgment the Seventy-first Congress decides to increase the representation?

Mr. TILSON. There is no obstacle whatsoever in the way of doing that very thing. I hope that the Seventy-first Congress will be wise enough not to increase the membership of this House by a single Member, but there is nothing in this bill that would in any way prevent such action. It is one of the excellent features of this bill that it specifically provides for action by a subsequent Congress, but the best thing of all is that, if enacted into law, it will stand as a guaranty that no longer shall the constitutional mandate be indefinitely disregarded by the failure of Congress to do its duty.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, if it should not decide to do that, these figures will be of no value?

Mr. TILSON. Only in case Congress fails to do its duty will this bill become effective; but in case of such failure we should then have the consolation of knowing that a reapportionment fair and just to all the States of the Union would automatically go into effect. [Applause.]

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I find myself in disagreement with the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Connecticut, Colonel TILSON, to whom we have just listened. I can not by any means accord with his apparent belief that the failure of this Congress to enact this bill into law to be used as "a club" over a succeeding Congress will produce any great calamity.

This is a measure both of abdication and usurpation. It is proposed that the Congress supinely surrender to the executive branch of the Government a legislative prerogative and at the same time usurp a power and assume a responsibility which under the Constitution belong to a Congress not yet elected by the American people. [Applause.]

I am in favor of a fair and proper reapportionment, not by the executive branch of the Government, not by any Federal bureau or commission, but by the Congress following the next decennial census. I believe in compliance with that provision as with every other provision of the Constitution, in letter and in spirit. But two wrongs never made a right. If Congress was recreant of its duty following the last census, as has been charged, that wrong would not be righted now in the complacent surrender by Congress of its rights and powers and the shameless abandonment of the duties and obligations vested in Congress by the Constitution. [Applause.]

The fathers of the Constitution determined upon the complete separation of the three branches of the Government as essential to the perpetuity of constitutional government and vital to the security of the liberties of the people. All legislative powers were vested in Congress, and the powers of the executive branch were hedged about by definite constitutional limitations.

Ever since 1865, when the gray legions of the South were overwhelmed and overpowered by the illimitable numbers and inexhaustible resources of the North, there has been a continuous and radical change in the relations between those two branches of the Government, as ordained by the Constitution. Not only has there been a constantly increasing tendency to concentrate power in the Federal Government at the expense of the local governments, but the executive department has continued to encroach upon numerous prerogatives of the legislative department. Even worse than the arrogation of power by the executive department is the abdication by Congress of its rights and the abandonment of its obligations.

I will mention only a few of the many examples of that dangerous tendency that menaces our form of government. We have a flexible tariff law under which a Chief Executive on favoritism bent is able to confer a bounty upon a privilege-hunting, favor-seeking industry by increasing the tariff on pig iron 50 per cent with one stroke of a pen. [Applause.] We have a public buildings law, passed in the last Congress, under which we surrendered to two Cabinet officers our legislative prerogative in the construction and location of public buildings. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Then we have the Bureau of the Budget, in which Executive usurpation and bureaucratic dictatorship wear the mask of "economy" and lurk under the cloak of a "financial program." A congressional committee scarcely dares to consider a bill without the approval of some part of the Executive department, and worth-while legislation is strangled because, forsooth, some autocratic bureaucrat, not elected by the people, not responsible to the people, has decreed that it is "in conflict with the financial program of the President." [Applause.] We witness the shameful, pitiful spectacle of the Congress of the United States, clothed by the Constitution with all legislative power, invested with all legislative responsibility, year after year, in session after session, bowing more and more obsequiously to the dictates of a bureaucratic clerk. [Applause.]

Some of these innovations may not be, strictly speaking, unconstitutional, but they are unquestionably anticonstitutional. If they do not violate the letter, they certainly violate the spirit of our Constitution.

Now comes this proposal to enact a permanent law that would constitute the surrender of another legislative function. We ought to refuse further to dishonor ourselves by this base surrender of legislative power to an executive bureau. [Applause.] Every time we break down a constitutional barrier, every time we permit an invasion by one branch of the Government of the rights of another branch, every time we violate the spirit of the Constitution, every time we sacrifice the fundamentals of constitutional government on the altar of partisan advantage or political expediency, we find it more difficult than before ever to retrace our steps. [Applause.]

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The majority leader said a while ago in his speech that a subsequent Congress would not be embarrassed in any way if we pass this bill; that if they want to increase the membership beyond 435 or make any other amendment they could do it freely. Is it not a fact that if this bill becomes a law and a subsequent Congress undertakes either to repeal it or to amend it and such a bill goes to the Executive of the Nation, whoever he may be, and he should veto the bill, it would take a two-thirds vote to override it?

Mr. CHAPMAN. That is absolutely correct, and it has been admitted during the course of this debate that the sole intention is to make this bill "a club" over a subsequent Congress.

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. It has been eight years since the census of 1920 was taken, and is it not clear that since we have failed to reapportion we are the people who ought to wield that club and make the next Congress do it?

Mr. CHAPMAN. I think we are not responsible for what another Congress failed to do or for what a future Congress ought to do. As I said in the beginning, two wrongs never made a right. That responsibility must be faced by the Congress that meets next after the taking of the 1930 census.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. I was interested in the gentleman's statement about the bureaucrats. May I add right there that only this week I appeared before the mighty Appropriations Committee of the House and the chairman of the Appropriations Committee told me they were bound by the Undersecretary of the Treasury and the Underpostmaster General, and could not even grant me $25,000 with which to start a public building.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Unless we stop drifting as we have been drifting, and are drifting now, representative government will be undermined and destroyed, and on its ruins will rise an autocratic, arrogant, paternalistic, centralized bureaucracy. Then constitutional government will be dead. Let us get back to the principles of the fathers, maintain this Government as an "indissoluble Union of indestructible States," as a "government of laws and not of men," preserve the separation of powers under a dual form of government, and restore the equipoise which, as the result of executive usurpation and legislative abdication, has been destroyed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired.

Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEEDY: Page 2, line 4, strike out "major fractions" and insert "equal proportions."

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Members of the House will recollect that when the constitutional convention was in session the smaller States were hesitant about adopting that Constitution, and the delegates to that convention from the larger States manifested a very generous and kindly spirit toward the smaller States, as a result of which the Constitution was finally adopted. I refer to this instance because I would ask this committee, in the same spirit which characterized the proceedings of the original constitutional convention, to vote for the amendment which I have offered. It is not of major consequence, you will say, but it results in saving, my friend from New York [Mr. JACOBSTEIN] tells me, and he has made a very careful study of it, three Representatives among some of the smaller States, which would otherwise be lost.

I trust the committee will adopt the amendment. I understand the committee having the bill in charge does not oppose it and that there is no real ground for opposition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Has that method been used heretofore in any census that has been taken?

Mr. BEEDY. This method has never been adopted because Congress, unwisely I fear, in the original legislation governing apportionment, prescribed no method for computation, and the department adopted the method of major fractions which favors the larger States. I think, perhaps, it would be fair now to revert to the other method, which is conceded to be equally accurate. It does give a small advantage to some of the smaller States, not necessarily my own.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. Yes.

Mr. REED of New York. Is it not a fact that this is more or less a war between various groups of college professors, one group wanting to continue the plan we have followed during all of the years and another group wanting to try an experiment on the country?

Mr. BEEDY. I have not served on the committee for the last six years, but I will say that during the two years I was on the committee I did not think of characterizing the difference of opinion as a war between professors. It is true, however, that a professor from one college favors one method while a professor from another college favors the other method. It was generally conceded that the one was as accurate as the other, but that the larger States were slightly favored by major fractions, while equal proportions give a slight advantage to the smaller States.

Mr. REED of New York. I want to say to the gentleman that it is a controversy between college professors.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that at the time the districts were apportioned in the beginning of our constitutional Government the population per district was very small, so that the matter of major fractions or any other method made very little difference, but now that the districts have become very large in population it is quite probable that the method of equal proportions would be quite all right, the principal objection being that it is not so well understood in the country as major fractions.

Mr. BEEDY. It will save three Representatives, to be distributed among the smaller States under the census of 1930.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I rise to explain my interpretation of the amendment and to give the committee such information as I happen to possess.

It is true, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] said, that if you adopt his amendment, known as the method of equal proportions, you do favor the small States, the States with small populations. Everybody admits it; there is no argument about it; it is conceded by everybody.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. First let me make a brief statement.

If you adopt the amendment, everybody that lives in a large State should vote with his eyes open. By this proposed amendment you are favoring the small States, just as in the early days of our legislative history, from the very beginning, the method of reapportionment favored the large States.

The method of major fractions seems to be a sort of compromise that stands in between both. The early method of "rejected fractions" favored the large States, and the method of "equal proportions" now recommended by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] favors the small States.

It is true that the small States are likely to salvage from three to five seats in the House on the estimated population of 1930 under this reapportionment bill if the amendment is adopted. I want to call your attention to this fact, however: The small States are taken care of and were taken care of by giving every State an equal representation in the Senate. Every State has two Senators regardless of population, and that was the basis of compromise between the small and the large States.

Mr. GREEN. Will not the amendment of the gentleman from Maine come nearer giving representation according to population?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. No. So far as representation according to population is concerned both methods are equally accurate and equally fair. The difference between the two methods is this: In equal proportions you give to each individual in the State a weight according to the ratio between himself and the population of his State, whereas in the other method you give him a weight according not to the ratio between himself and the population of his State but the weight of his State as against the population of another State. Therefore, as I said yesterday, Mr. BEEDY in Maine has greater weight than Mr. JACOBSTEIN in New York, because I am only one of 11,000,000, and my ratio is smaller. Mr. BEEDY is one of 800,000, and you would have a greater weight under equal proportions than I. Equal proportions is simply a percentage proposition—it is a ratio based upon the relative proportion of the individual to the population within the State, and therefore it does favor the small States.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia and Mr. BUSBY rose.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I yield first to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The gentleman correctly stated yesterday that there has only been one act that was intended to be permanent in reference to this subject, and that was the act of 1850.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. That is right.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman tell us what was the basis, so far as the matter we are now talking about is concerned, that was incorporated in that act?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I stated yesterday on the floor that we have a precedent in the matter of anticipatory legislation, because in 1850 Congress passed an act which authorized and directed the Secretary of the Interior to make a reapportionment, and this was done. The population census was taken by United States marshals under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. The method was prescribed and the size of the House was prescribed. Two hundred and thirty-two was the size of the House, and it was divided among all the States of the Union by dividing the total population of the United States by 232.

Each State's quota was the quotient after dividing the population of the State by that divisor. Taking the total population of Virginia, Judge MOORE, dividing it by that divisor gives you the number Virginia would have. The same method was applied to New York and Pennsylvania and all other States. Then wherever there was a remainder left under 232, the State having the highest fraction got the additional Member, and they stopped at 232.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two additional minutes. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUSBY and Mr. BEEDY rose.

Mr. BUSBY. If the gentleman prefers to yield to the gentleman from Maine, go ahead.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. The gentleman from Mississippi rose first and I yield to him.

Mr. BUSBY. The gentleman has just discovered me. I want you to yield to the gentleman from Maine, if you have any preference.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I did not intend to indicate any preference.

Mr. BUSBY. I note from the hearings that Doctor Hill says that there are three methods: The minimum range, which would give the small States the advantage, the major-fraction method, which would give the large States the advantage, and the equal-proportions method, which would give neither the small nor the large States an advantage; and this is the one which the gentleman has described as giving the small States the advantage. What has the gentleman to say about that comment?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I have talked this matter over with Doctor Hill, who is the Assistant Director of the Census, many times, and with Professor Willcox, who is the author of the major-fractions method and who helped apply the method in 1910, and I have talked with Professor Huntington. I think if you adopt the amendment by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] and substitute it in place of the method of major fractions, there is not any question but what the small States will get at least three and possibly five more seats in the House than under the method of major fraction.

Mr. BUSBY. Oh, yes; but not get them unfairly.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Both methods are fair.

Mr. BUSBY. What does the gentleman mean by small States—with what size representation?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Of course, there is no absolute figure. The smaller the State the more advantage it gets from the method of equal proportions. For instance, there are some States in the Union that have less population to-day than they had in 1910, and naturally those States are going to gain more by the method of equal proportions than by the method of major fractions.

Mr. BUSBY. What is the fairer and more equitable method?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. There is no such thing as which is the fairer. It depends on what you want to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more to answer the question which he has been trying to answer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEEDY. I want to ask the gentleman if his position is the same this morning as it was yesterday, that it makes no great difference in the passage of the bill, and whether he would be willing to vote for my amendment?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. That is true. The fundamental proposition of the bill is not affected in view of the fact that the rural population is declining and that in the city is increasing. It may be that it is wise to give a slight advantage to the small rural States, and I am willing to make that concession, and expressly so in order to get the bill through the House.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Did not the gentleman introduce a reapportionment bill in the House?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. BRIGHAM. What method did the gentleman provide in that bill?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I asked that the method of equal proportion be used.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] and this debate thereon illustrates and emphasizes the folly of this proposed legislation. The statisticians, the men who have made a life study of the various formulas for apportioning representation according to population, have not been able to agree on which is the more equitable and just. The statisticians of the country are divided into four or five groups. We have the formula of "rejected fractions" advocated by Thomas Jefferson in 1793 in one of the most cogent and persuasive briefs and arguments that ever fell from his trenchant pen, in which he claimed that under the plain construction of the Constitution Congress had no right to consider fractions in making an apportionment.

Then we have the formula of "major fractions" used in 1842 in reapportioning representation among the several States and which was perfected by Doctor Wilcox, of Cornell University, which was the basis used by the statisticians of the Census Bureau and Congress in 1911 in making a reapportionment under the Census of 1910.

Then we have the "Vinton method," and the formula of "equal proportions," and then the "minimum-range" formula. In the contest between the major-fractions formula and the equal-proportions formula, Doctor Wilcox stands practically alone in advocating the system of major fractions. The American Statistical Association, composed of expert statisticians from the great colleges and universities who have made a life study of the subject, has rejected the formula of major fractions and advocated almost unanimously the formula of equal proportions. This system was first formulated by Doctor Hill, of the Census Bureau, and later perfected by other eminent statisticians.

The formula of equal proportions will make a difference in the Representatives allocated to 22 States—in other words the formula of equal proportions will either increase or reduce the representation in 22 States from what the representation would be under the major-fractions formula.

There is a bitter contest between the statisticians of this country since this bill was reported out. Under the leadership of Doctor Huntington, of Harvard, practically nine-tenths—yes, nineteen-twentieths—of the statisticians of the United States from the great colleges and universities have condemned in unmeasured terms the doctrine of major fractions and are aggressively advocating the equal-proportions method.

In other words the statistical world and the college professors are not agreed as to the method that should be used and since the bill was reported by the committee we have received numerous protests against the adoption of the major-fractions formula, and if you substitute the formula of equal proportions there will be another group of expert statisticians who will oppose that system.

The 1911 reapportionment is supposed to have been made upon the major-fractions formula, but it did violence to that system, because that formula was not faithfully followed in making the apportionment based on the 1910 census. In five or six instances, in allocating Representatives under the 1910 census, the major fractions were disregarded or manipulated. I call the attention of our distinguished Speaker and other Representatives from Ohio to the fact that they had a fraction of 22.65, and yet the 1911 apportionment act did not allocate an extra Congressman to Ohio, but this major fraction was disregarded. An additional Representative was given to Missouri that only had a major fraction of 0.64, while the Ohio major fraction was 0.65.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman think that the adoption by the House of the plan of equal proportions will gain advocates for this necessary apportionment bill?

Mr. LOZIER. I think it will both lose and gain support. It is simply a question of how these different formulas effect the several States. Under the major-fraction formula some States would have more Representatives than they would get under the equal-proportion formula, while other States would get more Representatives under the equal-proportions formula.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is to say, the major-fractions idea suits some people and the method of equal proportions can not be anything else than camouflage. One is as good as the other.

Mr. LOZIER. Either would make a difference in 22 States; some States would gain and some lose under either system. It simply illustrates that when you attempt three or four years in advance to select a formula and to commit the Congress and the American people to that formula, you are legislating in the dark, and the pending bill attempts to prescribe a formula that must be followed in 1930 or 1931.

I want now to call the attention of the House to the language, not of a Democrat but of an outstanding Republican, who in debating the question in 1921 as to the size of the House spoke as follows:

I have changed my opinion as to the practical thing to do on this subject, and while some may criticize me for so doing, I have the consolation of knowing that the old saying, crystallizing the philosophy of the ages, prefers those who sometimes change their minds above those who do not.

There is no question of principle involved here. It is a question of opinion, and while it was my opinion in former times, and I am still somewhat inclined to the opinion, that a comparatively small House is preferable to a large one, it is merely a matter of opinion, and I have no rule by which I can determine whether that opinion is sound or not. This I do know, and I say it without fear of successful contradiction, that this House, larger to-day by 70 Members than when I first came here, is a more powerful influence in legislation and the affairs of the Government than it has been at any time in the last 25 years. [Applause.] That may not be due to the increase. Gentlemen may believe that it is in spite of the increase, but this Congress, this session of Congress, has and will impress its view, will, and opinion on the legislation of this Congress more than any House has in many years. [Applause.]

They say there were giants in other days, and giants there were; and yet this House, man for man, never was finer or stronger than it is to-day. Statesmen are men who have departed this life. I expect that in the days when the gentlemen now here have passed to the great beyond men will point to many of them as we point now to the men of the past as master minds and men who were statesmen in the truest sense.

Gentlemen, whatever your opinion may be as to the size which this body ought ultimately to have, from the foundation of the Government at each decennial period save one, this House has been increased, and after having given much study to the subject in the last few months I have arrived at the conclusion that the House will continue to increase as the population grows until and unless there shall be a constitutional prohibition against such increase.

And there are many arguments for it. Some gentlemen say there is not enough time as it is for oratory, and if the number is increased gentlemen will not have as considerable an opportunity to speak as they now have. I do not think the country will necessarily suffer from that. Gentlemen all know that in every legislative body in the world legislation is largely framed in committee; that the changes on the floor are few and generally not important. We all of us know that with the increase of the number and importance of questions which Congress may be called upon to consider, we are brought face to face more and more with the necessity of having a wide geographical distribution of the representation on the committees of the House.

That is one of the problems we have constantly to meet. It can not be met if you reduce the House or hold it at its present number. There is much in the argument that increased population brings increased business, sufficient to warrant increased membership, and this is certain, that if the committees of this House dealing with the great problems that come before them are to fairly represent the various sections and interests of the country, there must be large enough representation upon the committees to give every variety of opinion an opportunity to be heard in committee. That can not be done with a small House. That can best be done by a House even of larger size than we have now. Who is he that shall say to the Representatives of 12 States of the Union, threatened here by what I hope is a minority with a reduction of their representation, that the number 435 is sacred and shall stand always as the size of this House?

That is not the language of a Democrat. That is the language of the former Representative from Wyoming, Mr. Mondell, the Republican leader of the House for many years. [Applause.] There is no reason why the membership of the House should be confined to 435 Members. That is not a sacred number. The Government is constantly enlarging its activities by the creation of bureaus and departments and commissions, and as a result the demands upon the time of a Representative have been increasing. The Member of Congress must spend much of his time in looking after departmental matters for his constituents. No Member of Congress can efficiently represent more than 200,000 or 250,000 people. I am not objecting to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine, but I say that it is folly for this Congress to attempt to commit future Congresses to any kind of a formula. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I can not follow the argument of the gentleman from Missouri based on his objection to the mathematical arrangement in the bill, and the difference of opinion existing on the formula. According to his views we are to make no change, we are to take no action, but to continue the present inequitable and disproportionate representation in the House because there is a difference of opinion as to the formula to be used. I can not see how any Member who is but slightly familiar with the genesis of that provision of the Constitution providing for apportionment can object to the bill now before the House. As a matter of fact, the Constitutional Convention had this question up for four or several days during the latter part of the month of June and early July.

After disposing of the question of whether representation should be based upon the question of wealth, and whether or not colored people should be counted, the question that the convention struggled with was that of fixing the apportionment at stated periods in order to carry out the idea of proportionate representation. When they adopted the present provision of the Constitution calling for a census every 10 years, and basing the apportionment according to that census, it was the belief of the Constitutional Convention—and you can not escape that conclusion if you read the debate—that it was mandatory. Pinckney, Randolph, Morris, all took part in the debate. It was left with the belief that there would be no time after a census, taken every 10 years, when the House would not be reapportioned. In fact, the 10-year amendment was one of the last to be adopted.

The question of apportionment had occupied the Constitutional Convention for several days in the consideration of the formation of Congress. All through the debate as to the formation of the two Houses, the Senate and the House, and the voting power of each State in the Congress the matter of proportionate representation was constantly referred to and discussed. The question came squarely before the convention on Thursday, July 5, 1787. Elbridge Gerry, of Massachusetts, delivered the report of a special committee which had been appointed a few days previously to study and make recommendations on the matter of apportionment. Omitting the matters not directly pertinent to the question of apportionment, the resolution reads:

The committee to whom was referred the eighth resolution of the report from the Committee of the Whole House, and so much of the seventh as has not been decided on, submit the following report: That the subsequent propositions be recommended to the convention on condition that both shall be generally adopted. That in the first branch of the legislature each of the States now in the Union shall be allowed one Member for every 40,000 inhabitants of the description reported in the seventh resolution of the Committee of the Whole House; that each State not containing that number shall be allowed one Member.

This brought the matter before the convention and was the subject of debate. An idea of the wide range of opinion, diversity of viewpoint, and bitterness of the debate may be gleaned from an extract taken from the remarks of Gouverneur Morris, of Pennsylvania. Reading from Madison's Debates:

Mr. Gouverneur Morris thought the form as well as the matter of the report objectionable. It seemed in the first place to render amendments impracticable. In the next place, it seemed to involve a pledge to agree to the second part if the first should be agreed to. He conceived the whole aspect of it to be wrong. He came here as a Representative of America; he flattered himself he came here in some degree as a Representative of the whole human race; for the whole human race will be affected by the proceedings of this convention. He wished gentlemen to extend their views beyond the present moment of time, beyond the narrow limits of place from which they derive their political origin. If he were to believe some things which he had heard, he should suppose that we were assembled to truck and bargain for our particular States. He can not descend to think that any gentlemen are really actuated by these views. We must look forward to the effects of what we do. These alone ought to guide us. Much has been said of the sentiments of the people. They were unknown. They could not be known. All that we can infer is that if the plan we recommend be reasonable and right, all who have reasonable minds and sound intentions will embrace it, notwithstanding what had been said by some gentlemen. Let us suppose that the larger States shall agree; and that the smaller refuse; and let us race the consequences.

The opponents of the system in the smaller States will no doubt make a party and a noise for a time, but the ties of interest, of kindred, of common habits which connect them with the other States will be too strong to be easily broken. In New Jersey particularly he was sure a great many would follow the sentiments of Pennsylvania and New York. This country must be united. If persuasion does not unite it, the sword will. He begged that this consideration might have its due weight. The scenes of horror attending civil commotion can not be described, and the conclusion of them will be worse than the term of their continuance. The stronger party will then make traitors of the weaker and the gallows and halter will finish the work of the sword. How far foreign powers would be ready to take part in the confusions he would not say. Threats that they will be invited have, it seems, been thrown out. He drew the melancholy picture of foreign intrusions as exhibited in the history of Germany, and urged it as a standing lesson to other nations. He trusted that the gentlemen who may have hazarded such expressions did not entertain them till they reached their own lips. But, returning to the report, he could not think it in any respect calculated for the public good. As the second branch is now constituted, there will be constant disputes and appeals to the States, which will undermine the General Government and control and annihilate the first branch. Suppose that the Delegates from Massachusetts and Rhode Island in the Upper House disagree and that the former are outvoted. What results? They will immediately declare that their State will not abide by the decision and make such representations as will produce that effect. The same may happen as to Virginia and other States. Of what avail, then, will be what is on paper? State attachments and State importance have been the bane of this country. We can not annihilate, but we may perhaps take out the teeth of the serpents. He wished our ideas to be enlarged to the true interest of man instead of being circumscribed within the narrow compass of a particular spot. And, after all, how little can be the motive yielded by selfishness for such a policy? Who can say whether he himself, much less whether his children, will the next year be an inhabitant of this or that State?

Later on Mr. Morris continued. He objected to that scale of apportionment, to wit, one for every 40,000 inhabitants:

He thought property ought to be taken into the estimate as well as the number of inhabitants.

John Rutledge, of South Carolina, concurred.

The gentleman last up (Mr. Morris) had spoken some of his sentiments precisely. Property was certainly the principal object of society.

This gives an idea of the wide range of difference that existed in the convention at the time. While many were fighting hard to bring about as democratic form of government as was possible, they were confronted by determined, stern opposition.

On July 6 Gouverneur Morris sought to recommit the report of the committee. All seemed to favor that motion. Rufus King, of Massachusetts, in support of the motion, remarked that—

He thought also that the ratio of representation proposed could not be safely fixed, since in a century and a half our computed increase of population would carry the number of Representatives to an enormous excess.

This view, indeed, was prophetic. Almost a hundred and fifty years have passed and we are confronted with that very situation. The population is increasing, and if we continue the same ratio adopted in 1910 the House will become so large as to be unwieldly and unworkable. Of course, I do not agree with other reasons urged by Mr. King at the time as to the necessity of considering wealth and property together with population. There may be some of my colleagues on the floor to-day who agree with that, but the times have so changed that if they do they surely do not dare to express such views.

Charles Pinckney agreed as to the matter of population. He was firm and decided in his opposition to any other factor being taken into consideration. Mr. Pinckney stated:

The value of land had been found on full investigation to be an impracticable rule. The contributions of revenue, including imports and exports, must be too changeable in their amount, too difficult to be adjusted, and too injurious to the noncommercial States. The number of inhabitants appeared to him the only just and practicable rule. He thought the blacks ought to stand on an equality with whites.

Mr. Pinckney came from South Carolina, and I want to pause to call the attention of my colleagues on the Democratic side of the House to the last sentence of his remarks that I have just quoted.

On July 9—

Gouverneur Morris delivered a report from the committee of five members to whom was committed the clause in the report of the ratio of Representatives in the first branch to be as 1 to every 40,000 inhabitants, as follows, viz:

"The committee, to whom was referred the first clause of the first proposition reported from the grand committee, beg leave to report—

"I. That in the first meeting of the legislature the first branch thereof consist of 56 members, of which number New Hampshire shall have 2; Massachusetts, 7; Rhode Island, 1; Connecticut, 4; New York, 5; New Jersey, 3; Pennsylvania, 8; Delaware, 1; Maryland, 4; Virginia, 9; North Carolina, 5; South Carolina, 5; Georgia, 2.

"II. But as the present situation of the States may probably alter as well in point of wealth as in the number of their inhabitants, that the legislature be authorized from time to time to augment the number of Representatives. And in case any of the States shall hereafter be divided, * * * or any two or more States united, the legislature shall possess authority to regulate the number of Representatives in any of the foregoing cases upon the principles of their wealth and number of inhabitants."

Roger Sherman, of Connecticut, immediately inquired—on what principles or calculations the report was founded. It did not appear to correspond with any rule of numbers or of any requisition hitherto adopted by Congress.

Nathaniel Graham, of Massachusetts, supported the committee report, and replied to the two reasons urged against it. Mr. Gorham stated:

Two objections prevailed against the rate of 1 Member for every 40,000 inhabitants. The first was that the representation would soon be too numerous; the second that the West States, who may have a different interest, might if admitted on that principle by degrees out vote the Atlantic. Both these objections are removed. The number will be small in the first instance and may be continued so, and the Atlantic States, having the Government in their own hands, may take care of their own interest by dealing out the right of representation in safe proportions to the Western States. These were the views of the committee.

Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, expressed apprehension, which the attitude of the House to-day, almost 150 years later, seems to justify.

Mr. Randolf disliked the report of the committee but had been unwilling to object to it. He was apprehensive that as the number was not to be changed till the National Legislature should please, a pretext would never be wanting to postpone alterations and keep the power in the hands of those possessed of it. He was in favor of the commitment to a Member from each State.

William Patterson, of New Jersey, was against it unless the future apportionments would be provided for.

Randolph, Patterson, Madison, and others then started the drive for the fixing of future apportionments. James Madison, jr., of Virginia, pointed out that the States—ought to vote in the same proportion in which their citizens would do if the people of all the States were collectively met.

A committee was then formed consisting of one member from each State. On Tuesday, July 10, Mr. King reported that the committee had decided to recommend that the first General Legislature should be represented by 65 Members in the following proportion, to wit: New Hampshire, by 3; Massachusetts, 8; Rhode Island, 1; Connecticut, 5; New York, 6; New Jersey, 4; Pennsylvania, 8; Delaware, 1; Maryland, 6; Virginia, 10; North Carolina, 5; South Carolina, 5; Georgia, 3. A lengthy discussion followed with many amendments offered to slightly vary this apportionment. The following extract from the remarks of Gouverneur Morris is indeed apropos of what is taking place on the floor of this House to-day:

Again reading from the proceedings as recorded by Madison:

Gouverneur Morris regretted the turn of the debate. The States he found had many Representatives on the floor. Few he fears were to be deemed the Representatives of America. He thought the Southern States have by the report more than their share of representation. Property ought to have its weight, but not all the weight. If the Southern States are to supply money. The Northern States are to spill their blood. Besides, the probable revenue to be expected from the Southern States has been greatly overrrated. He was against reducing New Hampshire.

Then Mr. Randolph moved as an amendment to the report of the committee of five—that in order to ascertain the alterations in the population and wealth of the several States the legislature should be required to cause a census, and estimate to be taken within one year after its first meeting; and every — years thereafter—and that the legislature arrange the representation accordingly.

Mr. Randolph was quick to point out the weaknesses of future legislatures. He pointed out that if the "mode" was not fixed for taking the census, future legislatures may use such a "mode" as will defeat the object and perpetuate the inequality. He stated further—if the legislatures are left at liberty, they will never readjust the representation.

How prophetic!

The next day the debate continued. Hugh Williamson, of North Carolina, stated that the convention should make—it the duty of the legislature to do what was right and not leaving it at liberty to do or not to do it.

He then suggested that the time for each census should be fixed and that—the representation be regulated accordingly.

All through the debate that followed it can be seen that it was the intention and the understanding of the convention that nothing was left to the discretion of future Congresses. It was definitely stated and so written into the Constitution that a census should be taken and that reapportionment immediately thereafter was binding and mandatory upon future Congresses. Mr. Randolph was quick to agree with Mr. Williamson's proposition and expressed his willingness that it be substitute for his own. He stated—

If a fair representation of the people be not secured, the injustice of the Government will shake it to its foundations.

Continuing, Randolph stated:

What relates to suffrage is justly stated by the celebrated Montesquieu, as a fundamental article in Republican government. If the danger suggested by Mr. Gouverneur Morris be real, of advantage being taken of the legislature in pressing moments, it was an additional reason, for tying their hands in such a manner that they could not sacrifice their trust to momentary considerations. Congresses have pledged the public faith to new States, that they shall be admitted on equal terms. They never would nor ought to accede on any other. The census must be taken under the direction of the general legislature. The States will be too much interested to take an impartial one for themselves.

Then followed a running debate as to the question of counting the colored folks or only three-fourths of them.

Several votes were taken as fixing the period between censuses. It will be remembered that in the original motion the committee's report left the time in blank. A motion to make it 15 years was voted down. Then a motion of 6 years and 20 years, respectively, was voted down, and finally 10 years was agreed upon, the vote being Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia voting in the affirmative and Connecticut and New Jersey voting in the negative. (My State, New York, on this and many other votes on the question was conspicuous by its absence.)

As I have just stated, when the Constitutional Convention agreed to fix the taking of the census every 10 years and that there should be a reapportionment immediately thereafter it was by no means intended that it should be left to the discretion, will, or caprice of any future Congress. The debate and the motions themselves indicate that it was intended to be mandatory, and even the opponents of the proposition left no doubt that they understood that the provision in the Constitution was mandatory upon future Congresses. Hence the bill before the House is not only timely and necessary in the face of the failure of past Congresses to do their duty by obeying the express mandate of the Constitution but entirely in keeping with the intent and desire of the framers of the Constitution to make it absolutely imperative that there shall be a reapportionment following the census every 10 years.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In just a moment. If the Constitutional Convention had had presented to it the formula or method such as we have in this bill to provide for the omission of any future Congress, it seems to me that they would have adopted it at that time. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Conceding what the gentleman has just said about the meaning of the Constitution, we have at this moment a question as to how fractions shall be dealt with. Does the gentleman not think that we ought to postpone determining that question until we know what the fractions are?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; because the principle of equal representation divided among the whole country is more important than the distribution of three Members among 48 States. [Applause.]

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can not yield. I have not the time. It seems to me that all that we propose to do here is in the event a Congress charged with the responsibility and constitutional mandate to provide a reapportionment fails to do so, to take the necessary precaution to provide an instrument whereby the reapportionment may be brought about.

It is all to my personal interest that there shall be no change. My colleagues from New York know well that if there is a reapportionment, considering the geographical location of my district, its population, the present popularity (?) of the present Representative in his own party, and the antagonism of the adverse party, my district will be the first district to be wiped out under this reapportionment. Notwithstanding that, I feel that the principle of representation, of carrying out the mandate of the Constitution for apportionment at stated intervals, is far more important to representative government than the political interest of any individual. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The debate on this amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I have a substitute amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers a substitute for the amendment. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. BEEDY: Page 2, line 4, after the period, add the following: "Provided, That said remainder of the 435 Representatives shall be apportioned so that the number of inhabitants represented by each Representative shall not vary in number in excess of 20,000."

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair that is not a substitute amendment.

Mr. GREEN. That is offered as an amendment to the amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the amendment, if adopted, will enable the committee to adjudicate the membership of this House.

I am for reapportionment. The population of the United States has increased about 20 per cent since the last apportionment. The trend of population is governed by economic conditions. It has drifted into the economic centers of our country. My State, under the proposed legislation, would receive one, or possibly two, additional Members beyond what it now has, as the people have gone there, as in other sections of the country.

The people of the United States should be represented, regardless of where they reside. Under the present calculation a Member of Congress coming from Florida would represent 299,800 people. Under the present schedule, if it goes into effect, if the Member comes from Michigan he would represent 220,000 people. If he comes from California he would represent 220,000 people, approximately. If he comes from the State of Ohio he would represent 260,000, approximately. If he comes from Vermont he would represent 352,000 people, approximately.

Now, do you gentlemen mean to tell me that our Committee on the Census can not work out a better basis on equal proportions and major fractions whereby the people in 1930 shall be represented, no matter where they reside?

If this amendment is adopted it will prevent the great variation of population to be represented by Members of Congress. The amendment should be adopted. I sympathize with my friend from California who represents half a million people.

My colleague from east Florida, Mr. SEARS, represents possibly three-quarters of a million people, and my colleague Mr. DRANE, represents probably more than a half a million people, and my district and the district of my colleague Mr. YON contain far more than the amount allotted under last reapportionment. But if you reapportion representation, why not reapportion regardless of whether the result applies to a small State or to a large State like California or Michigan or New York? If you adopt this amendment, you give the Congress a chance two years from now to have the matter properly adjusted in the bill, and each Member shall represent an equal number of people on this floor after reapportionment.

The amendment is offered in behalf of reapportionment. I want my State to receive six or seven Members of Congress as it should, instead of five, as it would receive under the schedule offered by your committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman is in error as to that. I am in the same boat.

Mr. GREEN. Florida should have 7 Members if Michigan is entitled to 17.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We have done nothing for 10 years to fix the basis of representation.

Mr. GREEN. I contend that representation should be according to population. I hope the House will adopt this amendment. I offer it to the end that we may have full representation according to population, regardless in what State the people reside. No discrimination should be made against small States. No undue advantage should be awarded to larger States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the parliamentary situation. Without objection, the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] will be withdrawn, thus making the present amendment in order.

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, the interest I have in this bill is more along business lines than political. I think every Member on the floor of the House will agree with me that during the last eight years the burden that has fallen upon the Member of Congress is many times greater than was ever known before to an average Member of Congress prior to that time. Members of the House will recall that only last year there was serious agitation for an additional office building, so that Members could have a larger space in which to transact the business of their districts. There is an unusual load falling upon certain Members of Congress. There are Members representing half a million people. There are others representing only a few thousand people. The time has come when this country is turning more and more to the Members of Congress to transact business in an efficient way, and more and more the people are turning to their Members of Congress for services unknown to a Representative years ago. It is manifestly unfair in this business age for us to go on in this way, with one Member trying to represent perhaps a half million people and another one 25,000 people.

I am for the bill, but there is one other point I want to stress, and that is this: Ever since we have been taking the census and making a reapportionment of the country we have been following the method of major fractions. The people of the country are familiar with that method and the Members of Congress are familiar with that method. Never in the history of the country has this other method been tried such as is proposed in this amendment, and I feel it would be safer for us to vote down this amendment and follow the lines which have been tested, tried, and proved satisfactory to the people and to the Members of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRIGHAM: On page 2, line 4, strike out the period, add a comma, and the following: "Provided, That any State whose representation would be reduced to the one Representative to which such State is entitled under the Constitution shall have apportioned to it an additional Representative if its population shall exceed by more than 25 per cent the average population per Representative for the United States, and to that extent the whole number of Representatives shall be increased accordingly."

Mr. CRAIL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The amendment is out of order in that it would be a violation of the Constitution of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state what provision of the Constitution?

Mr. CRAIL. The Constitution of the United States provides that apportionment of Representatives in Congress shall be based upon the number of persons in each State and the gentleman's amendment would abrogate that provision of the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the constitutional effect of amendments and their consistency or other relation to other portions of a pending bill have never been considered, so far as the present occupant of the chair is advised, a subject for a point of order. The main question arising upon an amendment is its germaneness or, perhaps in the case of committee amendments, the jurisdiction of the committee, but germaneness generally. The Chair does not think the gentleman states a point of order and accordingly overrules it.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I have offered this amendment for the purpose of calling attention to and providing a remedy for a condition of inequality in representation which will be brought about by the enactment of this bill.

All laws hitherto enacted by the Congress for the purpose of apportioning Representatives among the several States, with one exception, I believe, have been passed after the taking of the census when all the facts regarding the distribution of population were known and these laws have assigned to each State a definite number of Representatives. Furthermore, reapportionment heretofore has been usually by the comparatively simple process of adding to the House enough Members to take care of the gain in population in each State without taking away a substantial percentage of the Members from any State. Only once in the history of the country has the representation of a State been reduced by 50 per cent. In 1810 the representation of the State of Delaware was reduced from two to one.

The bill before us to-day provides for fixing the membership of the House at 435, the present number, and leaving it to the Secretary of Commerce to make the reapportionment of this number of Representatives among the several States according to a prescribed method—the method of major fractions.

Apportionment of Representatives by the method of major fractions means that a State will have assigned to it a Representative for each full quota of a certain determined number of population and one for a number of population which is more than one-half of such full quota. For instance, in the 1910 reapportionment a State received a Representative for each full quota of 211,877 people and an additional one if there was a remainder of 105,939 people or more.

If the reminder were less than 105,939 the State would not be entitled to a Representative for this lesser number. Therein lies the inequality between the large and the small State. Suppose a State is entitled to one Representative under the full quota of population and falls just under the major fraction which entitles it to another. The one Representative must not only represent his full quota, but an additional quota of 105,000 persons. In a large State this extra quota of 105,000 persons would be divided up among a number of Representatives. For instance, in New Jersey the extra quota could be divided among 12 Representatives and would not mean a large additional quota for each Representative.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object to the gentleman's request, will the gentleman yield to me to propound a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BRIGHAM. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close at the end of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes, the five minutes to be occupied, under unanimous-consent request, by the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I will make it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi modifies his request so as to make it 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRIGHAM. If we fix the membership of the House at 435 and our population continues to grow, the quota of population which entitles a State to a Representative must also continue to increase. In a few decades it may require 400,000 for a full quota, so that a State with 400,000 population will have one Representative and a State will not be entitled to two Representatives until it has a population of more than 600,000.

The increase in population has not been and probably will not be equal in its distribution among the various States. Agriculture requires extent of territory for its development and with the increased use of farm machinery fewer men are required to work a given number of acres. On the other hand, the development of industry does not depend upon extent of territory but rather upon nearness to raw materials, to a supply of labor, and to markets. Therefore we may expect the States dependent upon agriculture to remain stationary in population or at any rate to gain less rapidly than the industrial States and if the House is to have a fixed membership of 435 there will inevitably be a shift of Members from the agricultural to the industrial States with an increasing number of States which will be entitled to only one Representative in this House.

It has been proposed to amend the Constitution so that each State will have at least two Representatives here. When we consider that through the illness or the death of its one Representative the people of a State may for some time be deprived of representation in this body, I believe the justice of such an amendment is apparent. However, amending the Constitution is a long process, and I believe the amendment I have offered, providing that when reapportionment works out so that a Representative in a State will have to represent a constituency larger by 25 per cent than the average for the United States, then an additional Representative is assigned to that State. I believe such an amendment would tend toward more just and equal representation of the people in the several States. [Applause.]

Representatives from the States of Michigan and California have complained bitterly at the injustice done their States by failure of the Congress to reapportion on the basis of the 1920 census. There is nothing to prevent the States of Michigan and California to reapportion the number of Representatives they now have at any time it is considered wise to do so. On the basis of the 1920 census, with the present representation of these States in this House, a Member from Michigan, if the population of that State were fairly and equally apportioned among the different Representatives of that State, would represent 282,185 persons. A Representative from California, if the people of that State were fairly and equally apportioned, would represent 311,532 persons. I call attention to the fact that if reapportionment had been made on the 1920 census a single Representative from the State of Vermont would have represented here 352,428 people.

If the people of California and Michigan, Mr. Chairman, have a right to complain of the injustice done them by the failure of Congress to reapportion, I am sure that the people of Vermont would have had a right to complain if reapportionment had been made on the basis of the 1920 census according to the method it is proposed to adopt in this bill.

Mr. STOBBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGHAM. Yes.

Mr. STOBBS. How many States will that affect? The House will be interested in knowing that.

Mr. BRIGHAM. On the estimated population of 1930, I think it would affect two States—the States of Vermont and New Mexico.

Mr. STOBBS. In other words, it would add two more Representatives to the 435?

Mr. BRIGHAM. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CELLER: Page 2, line 4, insert: "All special agents, supervisors, clerks, enumerators, interpreters, and all other employees taking the census shall be appointed from civil-service lists after examinations conducted under rules and regulations promulgated by the Civil Service Commission."

Mr. LAGUARDIA and Mr. STOBBS made a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to argue the point of order?

Mr. CELLER. I would like to hear what the point of order is.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The point of order is that the amendment is not germane, and the gentleman from New York knows it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York states that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I think it is germane and for this reason: This bill seeks to set up a method or standard by which there may be a reapportionment so as to get due and proper representation of the people of the United States according to the census. We lay down the method and I am merely amplifying the method by which the census shall be taken upon which this reapportionment is to be based—it shall be taken by those qualified by fitness and ability to take the census. For this reason it is quite germane, relevant, and in no sense of the word outside of the provisions of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CELLER. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the bill in any sense provide for the taking of a census?

Mr. CELLER. It mentions specifically the census, and I indicate how the census shall be taken. These terms are well defined. Census means something which is definite.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK of New York. It seems to me this bill is adding new duties to the Bureau of the Census, calling upon the Bureau of the Census, of course, to get new employees, and the amendment is perfectly germane, because it provides that they must come from the civil-service list.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman indicate where that is provided in the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment of the gentleman from New York reads as follows:

All special agents, supervisors, clerks, enumerators, interpreters, and all other employees taking the census shall be appointed from civil-service lists after examinations conducted under rules and regulations promulgated by the Civil Service Commission.

It is clear to the Chair that this bill does not deal with the subject of the census or with the taking of a census and that the amendment is not germane to the section or to the bill.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. (a) If the Congress to which the statement required by section 1 is transmitted fails to enact a law apportioning the Representatives among the several States, then each State shall be entitled, in the second succeeding Congress and in each Congress thereafter until the taking effect of a reapportionment on the basis of the next decennial census, to the number of Representatives shown in the statement; and it shall be the duty of the Clerk of the last House of Representatives forthwith to send to the executive of each State a certificate of the number of Representatives to which such State is entitled under this section. In case of a vacancy in the office of Clerk, or of his absence or inability to discharge this duty, then such duty shall devolve upon the officer who, under section 32 or 33 of the Revised Statutes, is charged with the preparation of the roll of Representatives elect.

(b) This section shall have no force and effect in respect of the apportionment to be made under any decennial census unless the statement required by section 1 in respect of such census is transmitted to the Congress on or before the first day of the first regular session which begins after the taking of such census has begun.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the passage of this bill. The Constitution and the practice since its adoption seem to have fixed the duty upon Congress to pass reapportionment legislation as soon as practicable after the taking of each census. Justice Story so interpreted the Constitution when he stated in the case of Prigg v. Pennsylvania (16 Peters 618) that to make the apportionment is a "duty positively enjoined by the Constitution," and as the report of the Committee on the Census sets forth, Congress, without exception, has made such apportionment after the taking of every census until the census of 1920.

The argument that the Constitution does not in express language require Congress to make the apportionment is not very convincing in view of the express provisions requiring Representatives to be "apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers" and an enumeration to "be made every 10 years." There is no question about the express mandate to Congress to make the enumeration, to take the census, every 10 years and to apportion the Representatives among the several States according to their respective numbers. The only question left for argument is, When shall that apportionment be made? The plain inference or intent seems to be that it shall be made every 10 years after the taking of the census. That has been the uniform interpretation of that provision of the Constitution up to this time and it is too late to question it now.

It may well be asked, How can Representatives be apportioned among the several States according to population if Congress refuses to apportion after the census has been taken and it knows what the population is? If Congress can refuse to apportion after one census, why not after another or after all?

However, as is well known, this Congress is deadlocked on reapportionment legislation, and the next best thing seems to be to pass some legislation such as is provided in the bill before us, authorizing an automatic reapportionment after the next census based upon a membership of 435, unless the Congress at that time determines otherwise.

It seems to me that the main question involved in this legislation is whether this Congress thinks it advisable to fix the membership of Congress at 435 until future Congresses take affirmative action to fix a different number. I can not help but feel that those who argue against it on constitutional grounds are going out of their way to look for trouble. To me there is no question about the power and right of Congress under the Constitution to pass the legislation if it sees fit to do so. It is not delegating any legislative power or prerogative. It is merely assigning a ministerial duty of a very limited nature to the Secretary of Commerce. It does not permit the exercise by him of any discretionary power. It is difficult to conceive of the delegation to any agency of the Government of any ministerial duty of a more restricted nature. That it would be faithfully and honestly performed, no matter who may be Secretary of Commerce or what administration may be in power, must be assumed. I do not think that any Member of Congress will seriously question but what it would be.

In fact the legislation only requires the Secretary of Commerce after the taking of the census to do what Congress itself in effect has heretofore done before it could intelligently and fairly apportion the Representatives among the several States according to the population and make the definite assignment to each State in the law of the number of Representatives to which it was entitled, as has been the practice. As a matter of practice I presume Congress has asked the Bureau of the Census to furnish for its use the very information which this legislation requires. What reasonable objection can there be to providing by law for the performance of this purely ministerial duty by the Bureau of the Census under the Department of Commerce?

The only real question for us to determine is whether 435 is the right number for the House of Representatives.

I would prefer to see the size of the House reduced rather than increased. I would also favor the passage of apportionment legislation by this Congress, but as a practical proposition I realize it is impossible to accomplish either one of these results. Therefore, as the next best thing, I shall vote for this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin rose.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. HUDSON. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman mean the section or the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is being read by sections. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman [applause], I have been not a little surprised to-day to hear gentlemen very earnestly declare that the Constitution has no mandate requiring reapportionment. I can not understand how anyone familiar with the history of the Constitutional Convention and of the events in England which preceded it can make this contention.

The Constitution was formulated and published in the summer of 1787. In 1782, 5 years before, there began in England the great struggle which continued for 50 years to have just representation in the House of Commons. This struggle was long and violent. There were riots, there was bloodshed. The friends of the reform were defeated in 1782, but they fought on for half a century and triumphed at last.

Now, what was the reason for the struggle? Every reader of history knows it. There were districts in England—"rotten boroughs" they called them—with only 5 or 10 voters, and in some really only 1 or 2, and each district elected a member of Parliament. A lord sometimes owned such a district and sent his man to the House of Commons. In some instances 50 votes or 100 votes sent members to the House, while in other districts it required thousands of votes to elect a member. There was one district with a comparatively scattered population that had a larger representation in the House of Commons than had the city of London.

This was abuse, shameful, unpardonable; but special privilege had secured the advantage and the power, and it kept these for 50 more years.

Now, our fathers in the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia in 1787 knew all about the "rotten-borough" system in England; and therefore you gentlemen who assert that the provision for apportionment in our Constitution is not mandatory must also contend that Madison, Hamilton, Franklin, Washington, and the other immortals of that great convention, knowing well the awful abuses in England, did absolutely nothing to prevent similar abuses from growing up in the Government they were about to establish. Do you believe that? It is the most serious indictment I have ever heard made against the illustrious patriots who constituted that convention—that they neglected a thing like this.

I looked in the directory a few minutes ago, and I find that here sits a Member who represents 138,000 people, while on this side of the aisle is a Member representing approximately 1,250,000 people. Is the equivalent of the rotten-borough system to obtain here and curse this country, because Congress is to continue to ignore the provisions in the Constitution, requiring that the census shall be taken every 10 years, and that representation in the House shall be based upon numbers?

This provision was adopted by the Constitutional Convention for the express purpose of preventing the Representative of only 138,000 people having one vote on this floor, and while the Representative of 1,250,000 other people has only one vote on this floor. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one more minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I listened intently and with surprise to what was said here with much earnestness in denunciation of the pending bill, because, and especially because it is not to take effect until after the census of 1930 has been completed; gentlemen saying that this delay is simply a wrongful attempt to control some future Congress. Gentlemen denounce the proposed delay until after 1930. And yet, as I find the record shows, the very gentlemen who now protest against this provision of the bill before us, themselves voted on Tuesday last for the Hawes-Cooper convict labor bill, which expressly provided that it should not take effect for three years after its enactment. They are all on record as voting for it. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 2, line 21, all of section (b).

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, beginning on line 21, strike out all of subsection (b).

The CHAIRMAN. All time for debate on this section has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. In each State entitled under this act to more than one Representative, the Representatives to which such State may be entitled in the Seventy-third and each subsequent Congress shall be elected by districts equal in number to the number of Representatives to which such State may be entitled in Congress, no one district electing more than one Representative. Each such district shall be composed of contiguous and compact territory and contain as nearly as practicable the same number of individuals.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LOZIER: Page 3, beginning in line 3, strike out section 3.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to occupy five minutes, but I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this section embodies a proposition that is clearly invalid. The bill provides that the Congress shall allocate to the several States the number of Representatives to which they are entitled according to their population. When that act is done the power of Congress ends. The power of Congress does not exist to determine how and in what manner the States shall elect their Representatives or in what form the States shall lay off their congressional districts. There is no power on the part of Congress to prevent a State from electing all its Members of Congress at large, if it so desires. There is no power in Congress to in any way determine or direct how the States shall elect the Members of Congress to which they are entitled.

I call attention also to the fact that section 6 is clearly unconstitutional and remind my Republican friends that in 1921 the versatile and able constitutional lawyer, Mr. BURTON, of Ohio, condemned that section as invalid. Both section 6 and section 3 of the pending bill were embraced in the act of 1921. Both are invalid because they attempt to limit the power of the States over a matter that rests exclusively in the jurisdiction of the States and in relation to which Congress has no power whatever. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I am not complaining because my amendment was voted down a few moments ago, but I do want to call the attention of the House to what is in this bill, and if there is one member of the committee who is sponsoring the bill who can justify section (b) in the bill and give reasons for it, I think the House is entitled to know it.

Some of us who sponsor the bill are standing on the matter of principle and bringing about an express mandate of the Constitution, and some of us are doing it at expense of our own districts. This subsection (b) could not have been put in there except for some evil purpose.

Section 1 of the bill provides that the census shall be taken as soon as practicable and the Secretary of Commerce shall transmit to Congress. Now, turn to page 2, section (b), and they say that if he does not do it the whole law is void and of no effect.

What is the purpose of that section? I ask the chairman of the committee, I ask the gentleman from New York or any sponsor of the bill to stand up and explain section (b). I think the House is entitled to it. We want to go along with the committee and stand by you, but do not ask us to vote for a joker. Section (b) is absolutely dishonest and I think the House is entitled to an explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. In the election of Representatives to the Seventy-third or any subsequent Congress in any State which under the apportionment provided for in section 2 of this act is given an increased number of Representatives, the additional Representative or Representatives apportioned to such State shall be elected by the State at large, and the other Representatives to which the State is entitled shall be elected as theretofore, until such State is redistricted in the manner provided by the laws thereof, and in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of this act.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. First, I want to ask a question of the distinguished chairman of the committee. What would the situation be under this law in reference to a State which has not redistricted since 1910, where they still elect some of their Members at large? Take, for example, the State of Illinois. Under this section you provide for those States where the number of Representatives has been increased. You provide for election in the event of an increase; but as to those States where they remain the same and there are now Representatives at large, what would the situation be?

Mr. FENN. That is a matter for the State itself to determine.

Mr. NEWTON. I understood that as a general principle, but in section 4 you lay down a rule of reapportionment, which is that—

SEC. 5. In the election of Representatives to the Seventy-third or sequent Congress in any State which under the apportionment provided for in section 2 of this act is given an increased number of Representatives the additional Representative or Representatives apportioned to such State shall be elected by the State at large—

And so forth.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I suggest that the gentleman read section 6 in connection with this. That takes care of Representatives elected at large.

Mr. NEWTON. Section 6 applies to the nomination, not to the election.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. It is all left to the State that elects Representatives at large.

Mr. FENN. The endeavor of the bill is to make the States redistrict and reapportion. These are the same sections that have been carried in previous reapportionment bills.

Mr. LOZIER. If the gentleman will read the subsequent part of that section, I think his question will be answered—and the other Representatives to which the State is entitled shall be elected as theretofore.

That covers the State of Illinois absolutely. That matter was discussed in the committee, and that language adopted in order to meet the Illinois situation.

Mr. NEWTON. I think that does meet that situation.

Mr. Chairman, no one can read the Constitution of the United States and come to any other conclusion than that the duty of Congress to reapportion following every decennial census is mandatory. In addition to that, however, we should bear in mind that if representative government is to be maintained it must be kept "representative," not only in theory but in fact. There was no reapportionment made following the 1920 census. Various excuses have been made. The fact remains, however, that the opposition has come from those States which, under a reapportionment plan, would lose representation. No matter what the plan is that is presented, they are opposed to it unless the plan calls for such increase in the size of the House of Representatives as will prevent a reduction in their present representation. I do not see how anyone who has watched proceedings in the House can desire to see the membership increased. In order not to decrease the Representatives from any State the membership of this House would have to be increased to 483, or an increase of 50 Members. If the estimates are correct for 1930, when we then reapportion the size will have to be 534 Members to avoid cutting down the representation of any State. That is unthinkable. From the very commencement of this fight for reapportionment I have stood against increasing the total membership of the House, regardless of what State was affected. In my judgment, the House should not have been increased over 300 Members. With sufficient, competent help, the work could be done, and more efficiently. The pending measure, while not perfect—and no legislation is perfect—provides reapportionment. It keeps the House at the present size. It makes it effective in 1931, unless the next Congress should in the meantime determine otherwise and so provide. I trust that the constitutional mandate will be no longer disobeyed.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman for two minutes.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to detain the committee, because I think everyone has his mind made up. What the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] just said is very pertinent. My district cast more votes in 1924 than 11 Southern and Western States cast. I have a district which probably in the next census will prove to have a million and a half people. Are they not entitled to a more numerous representation in this House?

Mr. NEWTON. I suggest that they have it in quality now.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. That is a matter that lies with the State legislature.

Mr. HUDSON. This does not. There is no reason why the Congress should not pass this legislation at this time. Anyone who raises the constitutional question raises it as a barrage, as a smoke screen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. In the election of Representatives to the Seventy-third or any subsequent Congress in any State which under the apportionment provided for in section 2 of this act is given a decreased number of Representatives, the whole number of Representatives to which such State is entitled shall be elected by the State at large until such State is redistricted in the manner provided by the laws thereof, and in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of this act.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the section. I can not believe that the House will adopt this section if the Members thoroughly understand its effect. It would make possible the election of the entire delegation from a State like New York or Pennsylvania or Massachusetts at large; if one political party happened to have a bare plurality of 1 vote in the State, the entire delegation from the State would be elected all of that party, when there might be a large number of districts in the State in which the other party is in an overwhelming majority. In that case those districts would have no representation in the House at all.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

At the conclusion of the third reading of the bill I propose to offer a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Census where all these matters may be straightened out. In the next section there is a provision to elect Congressmen according to the way that governors in the various States are elected. I can take the constitutions of the various States and show you that that is practically impossible. I shall offer a motion to recommit at the conclusion of the third reading of the bill and I hope it will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to strike out the section.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DALLINGER) there were—ayes 31, noes 106.

So the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. Candidates for Representatives at large shall be nominated, unless the State concerned shall provide otherwise, in the same manner in which candidates for governor in that State are nominated.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; I shall give way to the chairman.

Mr. FENN. This section should go out. I thoroughly agree with the contention which I think the gentleman from Virginia would make in regard to this. I agree with him that it should be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to strike out the section.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the committee will rise and report the bill with the amendment.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, there is but one amendment.

Thereupon the committee rose; and Mr. TILSON as Speaker pro tempore having assumed the chair, Mr. CHINDBLOM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11725) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress, reported that that committee had concluded the consideration of the bill H. R. 11725, and under the rule he therefore reported the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question has been ordered under the rule. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi to recommit the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RANKIN moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Census.

Mr. RANKIN. On that, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore expressed himself as in doubt.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 186, nays 164, answered "present" 1, not voting 80, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. RANKIN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was recommitted was laid on the table.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREE

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HAMMER], one of the conferees on the several omnibus pension bills, is out of the city, and I ask that another conferee be appointed in his stead.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MOORE].

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the reapportionment bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the reapportionment bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, I shall support the majority members of the committee by voting for this reapportionment bill that is long overdue; but I would be unfair to myself and my constituents if I did not tell you that in my honest judgment, after the exhibitions we have seen recently on the floor of this House, that I am heartily in favor of reducing the membership by half, increasing the pay to $15,000, and deducting therefrom $100 for each day's absence, except for sickness or some preeminently legitimate excuse, in line with the bill I introduced in a previous session of this House.

I feel profoundly that it would make for better legislation, and I believe, as an incident, would be less legislation, which is what our people, overburdened with laws, need.

The citizens of the United States are the greatest crowd of joiners in the world, and every organization has some pet legislation it sponsors. This fits in with the general plan of the great Government bureaucracy that exists in Washington, seeking continually to enlarge itself, with ramifications and relations all through the United States. Each little red-tape boss and the particular crowd in his department, in his or her little bureaucracy, is seeking to add to his or her importance by increasing the force, the indirect benefit being self-gratification and the direct benefit increased salary—and more taxes for the people back home to pay.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill, H. R. 11725, for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress. It is true that there should have been a reapportionment after the result of the census of 1920 was ascertained; that, however, is water which has gone over the dam, and while Congress ignored its constitutional obligation to make the reapportionment at that time, it is certainly too late now to make it upon that census.

It would be manifestly unfair, because the population of the country has increased something around 20 per cent, which increase has not been equal throughout the country; certain sections have grown in population much faster than other parts of the country. We can, therefore, very well afford to wait two years, inasmuch as it has been so long since the last census. We can then obtain the basis upon which to rest the reapportionment, namely, the census of 1930.

The Constitution intended that the Congress should make the reapportionment after the census, and certainly never contemplated that one Congress would endeavor to hang over the head of some succeeding Congress a sword of Damocles, as it were, to be brought into operation in the event the Congress which should make the reapportionment failed in its constitutional obligation.

I am opposed to delegating to the Secretary of Commerce a work which should be performed, as well as a constitutional obligation under the Constitution, by Congress alone. I do not criticize the people for being restless and demanding a reapportionment, but certainly this bill, if it became a law, would not bring about a reapportionment any quicker than the Congress in session after the 1930 census could perform that duty.

Suppose, for instance, when that Congress assembles, it should decide, which is again its privilege, that a larger membership shall be provided for; or, say, perhaps it should determine that a smaller representation should be provided, and it should pass a bill along those lines. That bill would then proceed to the President for his signature. The President might determine that he did not agree with the reapportionment of Congress, but rather felt that 435, as provided under this bill, should be adhered to, and so the President should veto the bill. Then, unless the Congress was able to pass the reapportionment act over the President's veto, the act which we are being asked to pass to-day would take effect, and the Congress vested with the power under the Constitution to make the apportionment would be deprived of its constitutional right by this act of the Seventieth Congress.

We are merely juggling with figures at the present time, and, while many estimates have been made as to the probable representation of the various States of the Union, there are no figures upon which we can base a certainty. My State, Maryland, for instance, might secure six Representatives, as she now has. On the other hand, by some mere fraction, she might only have five. We men representing Maryland would feel very small, indeed, if it should turn out that we were really entitled to six under the cenus of 1930 and had obtained only five under this bill. This is a very dangerous measure. According to the language of the bill it is not merely a temporary proposition, but for all time should Congress fail to perform its duty of reapportionment. The Secretary of Commerce could step in and perform that duty for the Congress. In other words, it is delegating a perpetual power to one of the departments of the Government to perform a duty which the Congress in its wisdom or unwisdom fails to do, and whenever the Congress fails to do that, whether rightfully or wrongfully, the Secretary of Commerce under this act performs the duty for the Congress.

Certainly none of my constituents can expect me, nor do they expect me, to vote for a bill so directly opposite to the mandates of the Constitution, so directly opposite to the benefits and interest of the country, and so absolutely futile when we realize that Congress will meet and perform the duty when the time arrives. The fact that Congress has not performed the duty under the 1920 census should not be subject to the severe criticism which some people try to bring against it. We must remember that when the 1920 census was taken it was soon after the war, and much of the population in various States of the Union was of a floating nature, drawn from outside territory to the centers of governmental activities, and reconstruction and natural conditions had not resumed normalcy. What, therefore, might have been apportioned then to a State after its natural conditions were restored would be unfair, and perhaps in some instances in excess and in others insufficient.

We must further realize that at that time there were vast numbers of measures for the reconstruction and rehabilitation of the country before Congress. It is useless for me to mention these various measures, but we can all recall the vast amount of legislation which was necessary after the war.

I shall therefore oppose this bill; but if I am in Congress after the 1930 census is taken will use my utmost endeavor to bring about a proper, satisfactory, and constitutional reapportionment.

CONFERENCE REPORT—ACCEPTANCE OF DECORATIONS BY CERTAIN OFFICERS OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY AND MARINE CORPS

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report on H. R. 5898, to authorize certain officers of the United States Navy and Marine Corps to accept such decorations, orders, and medals as have been tendered them by foreign governments in appreciation of services rendered, for printing under the rule.

THE BENEFITS OF PROTECTIVE TARIFF

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the benefits of the protective tariff.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, all real Americans are proud of the high standard of living conditions enjoyed by the folks who toil on the farms and in the great industrial plants of this country.

Steady employment at good wages means more and better food, better clothing, better homes, more of them owned instead of rented, more opportunity for the children's education and advancement, a savings account for the proverbial "rainy day," and a chance to get acquainted with a few of the world's luxuries rather than to grind out an existence with bare necessities as the only reward for service.

A CONCERTED EFFORT TO DESTROY THE TARIFF?

The protective tariff policy, a fundamental of Republican faith, has been instrumental in the betterment of living conditions of our American workmen to a degree that has excited the wonder of the world. Never before in the country's history has there been such a concerted effort to break down this tariff policy. The most insistent demand comes from the international bankers, who, having loaned vast sums abroad, are vastly more concerned regarding industrial success in Europe than they are for the welfare of American workmen and their families. Like Shylock, these bankers cry out and demand their pound of flesh; and if in the taking the lifeblood of American industry is drained to the last drop, it will be to them but a mere incident. The attitude of the international bankers has brought great joy to the Democratic camp, and they welcome this new convert to the free trade, alias "tariff for revenue," faith, and Mr. Importer, from his retreat furnished gorgeously in orientals, shouts a loud "Amen, brother."

PROTECTIVE TARIFF IS AS NECESSARY TO SUSTAIN OUR INDUSTRIES AS IT WAS TO CREATE THEM

Under a protective tariff bill, in which the rates both specific and ad valorem have been incessantly attacked by the leaders of the Democratic Party as too high, there has developed a constantly increasing flood of imports into the United States. The total imports for 1927 are in excess of $4,000,000,000. The frequent statements of Democratic leaders and newspapers that we were shutting out the world and giving them no opportunity to trade with us are not borne out by the facts.

NO DUTIES IN FORDNEY-M'CUMBER BILL TOO HIGH; MANY OF THEM TOO LOW TO AFFORD REAL PROTECTION

Pottery products and glassware have been imported in great quantities in spite of the tariff. Potteries and glass factories have been running part time for more than a year. I am reliably informed that if the potteries of this country were to run at full capacity they could supply but 75 per cent of our needs. For a long time they have been running at about 50 per cent capacity, and the gap is being filled by imported goods.

Handkerchief manufacturers have felt the depression in their business because of the rapid growth of importations, and have applied to the Tariff Commission for an investigation looking to an increase of duty.

The candle manufacturers find themselves in the same predicament, and millions of candles for decorative purposes sold last Christmas were all labeled "Made in Germany."

Manufacturers of Pullman slippers found that they were gradually being put out of business due to the flood of similar products from Europe, and which, because they were made wholly of leather, came into the market duty free.

Glove manufacturers have just about held their own in competition with foreign-made goods, although imports have increased considerably under the present rates. Employment during the last two years in this business has been just fair. The fabric-glove industry has ceased its activities in the United States, and the cotton fabric gloves for sale at the store counters are all marked "Made in Germany" or "Made in Saxony." As always happens when an American industry is put out of business by insufficient protection the price of these fabric suéde gloves is very much higher than when we made them in this country.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN OUR COPPER MINES

Four hundred thousand tons, or 800,000,000 pounds, of copper were imported from foreign countries in 1926 in addition to 300,000,000 pounds of concentrates with copper content. The copper mines of Michigan and other Western States are struggling for existence.

DUTIES ARE TOO LOW ON AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

The rates on agricultural products should be raised high enough to keep out unnecessary imports or at least raise their price sufficiently to give our American farmers a chance to compete. We import hundreds of millions of pounds of vegetable oils every year. More than 78,000,000 pounds of cheese was shipped to America in 1926, over 8,000,000 pounds of butter, and 22,000,000 pounds of milk, milk powder, condensed milk, and cream. Conservatively, this would be the product of a million cows that would make a home market for alfalfa, bran, corn, and other feeds. Why not make the rates high enough to allow the folks in the dairy industry in the United States to reap this benefit?

We also imported 300,000 dozen eggs in shell, and of whole eggs, frozen, 10,000,000 pounds; of dried eggs and egg albumen, more than 15,000,000 pounds. Why not allow the American poultryman to enlarge his business and supply some of this demand?

Vegetable-oil imports take the place of hog fats as well as butter, cheapening the price of hogs and forcing the farmers to sell their pork in low foreign markets.

We imported 80,000,000 pounds of tomatoes in their natural state in 1926 and 83,000,000 pounds of canned tomatoes, besides 18,000,000 pounds of tomato paste, the canned tomatoes and tomato paste being imported from Italy. Mexico also ships into the States vast quantities of these same products.

FARM PRODUCTS THAT SHOULD BE GRANTED HIGHER RATES OF DUTY WHEN TARIFF BILL IS REVISED

Milk, sour milk and buttermilk, and cream, condensed or evaporated, and whole or skimmed milk powders.
Butter and cheese and substitutes.
Live poultry and dressed poultry.
Eggs, frozen or dried, or preparations of albumen.
Onions, tomatoes, turnips, buckwheat, and flax.
Hay, straw, and corn.

WHY NOT ALLOW AGRICULTURE TO BENEFIT UNDER A PROTECTIVE-TARIFF POLICY?

If in addition to the list I have suggested we can have a thorough revision upward of agricultural schedules, we can provide a tariff that will shut out unnecessary imports and improve the condition of our folks on the farms. We are now importing peanut oil and low-grade eggs from China, coconut oil from the Philippines, cattle hides from Argentina, cheese from Italy and Switzerland, wool from Australia and New Zealand, silk from Japan, and flax, fruit, vegetables, rice, nuts, and many other products from every country in the world.

If we have this great loss to our American farmers under the present tariff laws, what can we expect but absolute disaster to our people if the Democrats have their way and reduce the tariff rates all along the line?

EXCESS OF IMPORTS OVER EXPORTS

Let me call your attention to the fact that Europe is now shipping to the United States about $500,000,000 worth of agricultural products more than we are shipping to them each year. Rates on agricultural products must be based on the difference in production costs as in industrial products, for we desire that the standard of living on the farms shall be just as high as that accorded to the industrial workers. Let us have protection that really protects American workers, and play no favorites whether they live and toil in the North, the South, the East, or the West.

THE FARMERS' SURPLUS IS IMPORTED

If it were not for these excessive importations which take the place of products raised on the American farms, the problem of surplus would be greatly simplified. All sorts of experts, bankers, professors, and economists have been advising the farmer to slow up on production. If we can stop this flood of agricultural imports amounting to the vast sum of $1,000,000,000 a year, we shall not have to worry so much about what to do with the surplus. If we make the tariff rates sufficiently high to keep out these products, we shall soon be rid of the surplus problem.

PERCENTAGE OF FREE IMPORTATIONS

Do not lose sight of the fact that of the more than $4,000,000,000 worth of imports that we received from Europe in 1927 that 64 per cent of them came in duty free, and only 36 per cent paid duties at the customhouse.

FREE-LIST GOODS NOT CHEAPER TO AMERICAN CONSUMERS THAN DUTY-PAID GOODS

Ask the free trader why prices are as high and frequently higher on imported goods that are on the free list than they are on goods which pay a duty at the customhouse. Ask him to explain his party's charge that the duty is a tax and adds to the cost. Ask him to explain why the goods on the free list are increased in price if his theory is that the existence of a tariff is the factor that raises the price.

The beneficial results of free trade or tariff for revenue only have never made their appearance during any Democratic administration. The advantages of a protective-tariff policy under which industry has thrived, labor has profited and saved, living standards have advanced, and the United States the most envied Nation in the world, is well worth the careful study and consideration of the American people.

CRITICISM OF TARIFF NOT WARRANTED WHEN ITS BENEFITS ARE SO PLAINLY INDICATED

If the history of tariff protection showed that the effect of a protective tariff upon articles had been to enhance their cost, and that the people have been imposed upon and robbed in that way, there might be some plausible excuse for free trade or low tariff; but, on the contrary, history reveals quite the reverse.

Whenever a protective tariff has been levied upon any article which we have been able to produce successfully the ultimate and speedy result has been to greatly reduce the cost of such article, and to this there is no exception.

This being true, how can it consistently be claimed that a protective tariff is a robbery? It furnishes employment to our people and gives us the product at a reduced price.

It is no answer to say that the reduced price is the result of improved machinery and improved methods, for these very improvements are brought about by the stimulus and competition produced by the protective tariff.

COMPETITION KEEPS PRICES FROM BEING TOO HIGH

With fair protection we may always depend upon the active competition among our own people to keep prices as low as is consistent with the payment of fair wages to those who do the work, and that is all any American ought to desire. It is certainly not to be desired that our laborers shall be reduced to the same scale of wages as those of England or Europe, simply that the product of their labor may be had at a lower price. This is not demanded by the best interests of our country, nor do the people desire it.

PROTECTIVE TARIFF IS AS NECESSARY TO SUSTAIN OUR INDUSTRIES AS IT WAS TO CREATE THEM

The Democratic Party advocates a tariff for revenue only. The history of their attempts to make this policy work is a long record of failure. Whenever we have had a Democratic tariff bill it has brought about reduction of wages and a general leveling down of values. Such tariff bills have always failed of their primary purpose, which was presumed to be the raising of revenue. Bond issues and special taxes have always followed the Democratic policy of tariff for revenue only. The Wilson-Gorman bill, passed by the Democrats in 1894, carried an income tax amendment to provide for the estimated loss in customs revenue of $75,000,000. After the Underwood-Simmons bill, passed by the Democrats in 1913, had been in effect a short time President Wilson sent a message to Congress asking that special taxes be levied to meet the current expenses of the Government.

TARIFF FOR REVENUE ONLY SPELLS DISASTER TO PROSPERITY

The situation is like this: A few of the Democratic Members of Congress are protectionists. More of them would like to be, if they could only forget their early training and overcome the prejudice of certain of their constituents who are wedded to free trade. If you discuss the subject with Democrats, they will assure you that they are not for free trade, but that they believe special interests are benefited by the protective tariff. They never attempt to explain the hard times and shrunken pay roll that makes life miserable for our folks who work for wages under Democratic tariff laws.

DIFFERENT VIEWPOINTS

Then again, some Democrats believe in enacting what they term an "economic tariff," but always they set their faces against any suggestion that it should be a protective tariff. The title "protection" is anathema to them! The result is that when they write a tariff act they write one that fails to protect industry and its employees and also fails to provide revenue.

They have admitted that the Underwood bill provided "incidental protection," which, of course, did not help industry, and, as the records will prove, failed to provide necessary revenue. So you see that when the Democrats write a tariff bill they do not all stand on common ground. Some are for free trade and have advocated burning all the customhouses. My friend and colleague from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD] is more constructive in his desire to use them as schoolhouses. If that purpose is ever accomplished, I trust that the libraries of those schools will contain the historical reminiscences of the periods of suffering and distress among our people, both of the farm and of the mill, during the Cleveland administration. Compare their present condition and enjoyments and opportunities to-day and credit the favorable balance to a protective-tariff policy that has made for a general condition of advancement and prosperity.

ASK THE FARMER

Ask the American farmer what kind of a market or price he expects for his produce when the great industries of the Nation are running at half time or completely shut down. Ask them if the foreign-made merchandise on the store shelves is any cheaper in price than American goods of the same quality. Ask him if he prefers the importers to make exorbitant profits and send the money to Europe to help fill their pay envelopes, or if he would rather that money was added to the pay roll of American workers, who would spend it for what he bends his back and sweats his brow to raise. There is a new generation of American farmers, who were small boys during the Cleveland administration, but they remember something of the Wilson administration, when the Underwood-Simmons bill was in force. They all know that the World War saved us from industrial and agricultural disaster that we were headed for straight at that time.

IMPORTANCE OF GOOD WAGES

The question of a high wage, with opportunity for its increase with the development of industry and the skill of the workmen, is a vital necessity to continued progress of the people of this Nation. The workers and their families, who are the producers, are also the consumers, and their purchasing power must be gradually increased, for no longer are we satisfied that our American workmen shall be able to just barely exist, but must be able to purchase not only necessities but some of the comforts and luxuries and still have a margin that will permit them to keep an account in a savings bank or a building and loan association.

ASK THE FOLKS WHO WORK IN OUR GREAT INDUSTRIAL PLANTS—

If they remember that under the sort of tariff legislation the Democrats wrote the mills discharged thousands of employees and the remainder worked on part time.

Ask the wives and mothers who assumed the difficult task of trying to make the one dollar on half-time pay feed and clothe the family and pay the rent and doctor's bills, when it was hard enough to accomplish with a full-time pay envelope. They will not welcome a return of Democratic free-trade policies or even the makeshift tariff for revenue only. There are men and women still working in the shops who remember the long line of American workmen and their families during the Cleveland administration who waited for their loaf of bread and pail of soup in order to keep body and soul together.

What has happened can happen again, but I have an abiding faith in the common sense and understanding of the American people, and when they have even the shadow of a doubt as to the return of these conditions they will deny to the Democratic Party the opportunity of making it possible.

CONSOLIDATION OF ACTS RESPECTING COPYRIGHT

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 6104, to amend sections 57 and 61 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909, with a Senate amendment, and agree to the Senate amendment. The Senate amendment merely adds the word "as."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 6104, with a Senate amendment, and agree to the Senate amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill and the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York presents a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 213

Resolved, That after the adoption of this rule it shall be in order in the consideration of H. R. 13873, for the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations in charge of the bill to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the language on page 47, lines 3 to 12, inclusive, notwithstanding the provisions of clause 2, Rule XXI, or clause 7 of Rule XVI.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is presented at this time on account of the unanimous request of the Naval Affairs Committee and the Appropriations Committee. It is not very often that the Rules Committee goes as far as to make in order matters that are not in order on a regular appropriation bill, but certain conditions have arisen whereby the people in charge of the Government high explosives, whereby they feel that it is very important that these appropriations be made in order at this itme. It makes in order an appropriation for moving the high explosives which are stored at the present time along the eastern coast to the more sparsely settled regions of the West, also Pearl Harbor and the Philippines. I understand there is no opposition from any sources, and I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, which requires a two-thirds vote.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13873) making appropriation to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1928, and June 30, 1929, and for other purposes; and pending that motion I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee if we can agree upon time for general debate. I would suggest that we have 15 minutes on a side.

Mr. BYRNS. I understood the gentleman was very anxious to complete consideration of the bill as soon as possible, and while I have two or three requests for time, I am going to waive any remarks of my own. I think it will be entirely satisfactory to have 30 minutes on the side. This is in accordance with my understanding with the gentleman, and I have made some promises in view of the statement of the gentleman that we would have an hour.

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman can not get along with any less than that amount of time, I would suggest giving the gentleman one-half hour on his side and taking 15 minutes on this side.

Mr. BYRNS. That is entirely satisfactory. I do not want it for myself.

Mr. WOOD. Then it may be agreed that general debate shall be limited to three-quarters of an hour, 30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee, and 15 minutes by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13873, and pending that asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to three-quarters of an hour, 15 minutes to be controlled by himself, and 30 minutes by the gentleman from Tennessee. Is there objection?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Reserving the right to object, can the gentleman state what his purpose is with reference to completing the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOOD. It is the desire of the committee, if possible, to complete the consideration of the bill to-night. The Senate has asked us to get it over there to-night if possible.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13873, the second deficiency bill, with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations, in presenting the accompanying bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1928, and June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, submit the following in explanation thereof:

The estimates upon which the bill is based were submitted in Senate Document No. 47 and in the following House documents of the Seventieth Congress: Nos. 204, 212, 213, 218–223, 225, 227, 229–231, 234, 235, 237, 239, 240, 245, 249, 250, 254–263, 266, 267, 270–277, 279–285, and 287–299. Estimates totaling $3,110,000 submitted in House Document No. 74 of the present session in connection with the transfer of ammunition from Army ordnance depots at Curtis Bay, Md., and Raritan, N. J., action on which was postponed by the first deficiency bill, fiscal year 1928, are also considered in connection with this bill.

The total amount of Budget estimates considered in the preparation of the bill is $103,949,606.27.

The amount recommended to be appropriated by the bill is $99,032,885.76. This sum is $4,916,720.51 less than the Budget recommendations.

Of the $99,000,000 recommended to be appropriated in the bill, approximately $84,000,000 is due to new laws or treaties recently in effect and for which this bill affords the first opportunity for appropriation.

The aggregate of the bill is caused by several very large items. A broad distribution by general totals is as follows:

Settlement of war claims act (alien property)	$50,000,000.00
Purchase of Cape Cod Canal bonds	6,230,000.00
Acquisition of triangle properties in the District of Columbia	5,000,000.00
Public buildings projects under the act of May 25, 1926, as amended	17,513,500.00
Ammunition storage and redistribution, Army and Navy	3,108,159.00
Marine Corps, on account of extraordinary expenses in connection with expeditions to China and Nicaragua	2,353,747.69
Post Office Department, transportation of mail to foreign countries by aircraft	1,750,000.00

I desire to call your particular attention to this last item. It is the purpose of the Post Office Department, if this appropriation is made, to establish, as soon as practicable, mail routes to Cuba, to the Central American nations, and to some of the South American countries. This is very essential. Other nations have been trying to get the exclusive right of carrying aerial mail to these countries. Of course, the United States, occupying the position that she does and under her policy, could not consent and will not consent to other nations having such an exclusive privilege. We are therefore either compelled to enter upon this enterprise ourselves or else assume a dog-in-the-manger attitude and not permit other nations to do it.

It is thought that after a while this service will prove remunerative. At first it was a question of whether or not anyone could be induced to undertake this character of business.

The Postmaster General has informed us that he already has a number of corporations and individuals who have signified their intention to enter upon this work. The hearings upon this proposition are very edifying and illuminating. They demonstrate the possibility of carrying the mail through the air at a profit. It has already been proven that contracts that were originally let when it was thought they would be absolutely destructive to the concerns that undertook to carry the mail by air are to-day showing a profit, and in consequence of these contracts that are now being let for carrying the mail throughout the United States are being let at a very greatly reduced price.

Acquisition of additional lands for forest reserves	$1,000,000.00
Judgments and audited claims	2,879,412.45
All other supplemental and deficiency items	9,158,066.62

The following explanations are offered for the principal items in the bill. While the total recommended is comparatively large, it is accounted for in the main by a number of outstanding sums and these are dealt with in detail, the minor amounts being left for explanation upon such inquiry as Members may care to make concerning them.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

The amount recommended to be appropriated for public buildings under the provisions of the act of May 25, 1926, as amended, is $17,513,500. This sum comprises a total of 99 projects of which 96 are submitted under the provisions of section 5 of the act and 3 are under section 3. The total limit of cost recommended to be fixed for such projects by the Budget estimates is $74,845,000, of which $2,175,000 is chargeable under section 3 of the act and $72,670,000 under section 5. All of the projects submitted have been recommended by the committee in a total limit of cost $74,532,000, of which $2,175,000 is chargeable to section 3 and $72,357,000 is chargeable to section 5. The net reduction made in the total limits of cost is $313,000. This sum is effected in the following manner: The limit of cost of the inspection buildings at Douglas, Ariz., and San Ysidro, Calif., are increased from $60,000 to $65,000, and $93,000 to $105,000, respectively, to make provision for Public Health Service activities not fully covered in the original submission and now recommended by the Treasury Department to be so included.

The limit of cost of the building at Salt Lake City, Utah, is reduced from $1,115,000 to $910,000, the difference in the amount of the total cost being due to a recommendation on the part of the committee that the enlargement of the present structure be made to provide for the same amount of space contemplated by the original submission but to be accomplished by an extension in a direction where the additional land can be acquired at less cost and the addition to the building effected without disturbance of the present ornamental and monumental portion of the building as originally suggested. The limit of cost of the building at Sterling, Colo., is reduced from $225,000 to $100,000, due to the elimination of provision made in the estimate for construction of court facilities. Federal court has been held at Sterling for only a very brief time, and it is the opinion of the committee that the court business, present and immediately prospective, is not sufficient to justify the additional expenditure. The appropriation is so made that the building will be constructed in such a manner that accommodations for the courts may be added later. These four changes constitute the only alterations made by the committee in the program submitted for consideration. The submission of additional public buildings estimates at this time was made possible by the act of February 24, 1928, which increased the total limit of cost of public buildings outside the District of Columbia under the present law from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000. The amount of appropriations recommended in this bill, together with those previously made, places to the credit of the Treasury Department a total of appropriations as great as it is now possible to make and still keep the expenditures within the annual limits fixed by public-buildings legislation.

SETTLEMENT OF WAR CLAIMS

The sum of $50,000,000 is recommended toward carrying into effect the provisions of the settlement of war claims act (alien property), approved March 10, 1928. Of this amount, $25,000,000 is to be allotted for the payment of claims allowed by the arbiter for German ships, patents, and radio stations seized by the United States, toward which, under the provisions of the act, partial payments may be made under tentative awards pending final decision. The remaining $25,000,000 is to be credited to the special fund from which will first be paid the American claims. Awards for the payment to American citizens are now being certified by the Mixed Claims Commission through the Department of State. The committee recommends the appropriation of the full $50,000,000, so that the settlement of claims that have been pending for many years may be disposed of as rapidly as determination can be effected.

CAPE COD CANAL BONDS

The sum of $6,230,000 is recommended for the payment of the $6,000,000 of 5 per cent, 50-year, first-mortgage bonds of the Cape Cod Canal Co., authorized to be purchased under the provisions of the river and harbor act of January 21, 1927. Title to the canal passed to the United States on March 30, 1928. The earliest date on which the bonds can be called by the United States under the contract is January 1, 1929. The amount recommended includes $225,883.33 for interest on the bonds from March 30, 1928, to January 1, 1929, $4,116.67 for expenses of advertising, and $6,000,000 to cover the face value of the bonds.

ACQUISITION OF TRIANGLE PROPERTIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

An estimate of $9,750,000 was submitted for the acquisition of additional property under the authorization of $25,000,000 in the act of January 13, 1928, for the purchase of sites for Government buildings, and other purposes, in the so-called triangle area. The committee recommends $5,000,000 of the sum estimated. The Treasury appropriation act for the next fiscal year contains an appropriation of $2,680,000 for this purpose, which, together with the sum granted herein, will make a total available the first year under the $25,000,000 authorization of $7,780,000, or approximately one-third. The committee is of the opinion that this amount is all that should be granted at this time, and is further of the opinion that the sum should be used to make the most advantageous purchases possible from all of the properties contemplated to be taken under the act. The committee is further of the opinion that acquisition of such property in full should not be proceeded with wherever condemnation is necessary until a more comprehensive and adequate condemnation law is provided. Such legislation is now pending in Congress.

MARINE CORPS

The sum of $2,353,747.69 is recommended for the Marine Corps, in addition to a reappropriation of $863,336.31, making a total of $3,217,084, on account of extraordinary expenses incurred during the fiscal year 1928 for keeping the expeditionary forces in China and Nicaragua. The force stationed in each place is approximately 3,750 men. In addition to the appropriations made available in this bill, there has been expended from current appropriations approximately $220,000, which would otherwise not have been expended, making the total extraordinary cost for this fiscal year on account of the two expeditions approximately $3,400,000, of which 56 per cent is on account of China and 44 per cent on account of Nicaragua.

FOREIGN AIR MAIL

The sum of $1,750,000 is recommended to enable the Postmaster General to carry into effect the provisions of the act approved March 8, 1928, authorizing contracts for the transportation of mail by air to foreign countries and insular possessions for periods not exceeding 10 years. This amount will supplement the sum of $300,000 already appropriated for the next fiscal year for foreign air-mail service. With the expenditure of the amount recommended it is contemplated to extend the existing lines into Cuba and the West Indies and to undertake the establishment of lines to Mexico and other Central American countries and possibly South America. Very little definite information is available at this time in connection with the proposed routes. The Government has recognized the necessity of taking a leading part in the inauguration of such a service and hopes to be able as soon as funds are available to proceed upon definite lines and secure contractors for carrying the mail over the proposed routes. The project is an essential one not only for the development of air navigation but very important from the standpoint of development of a more rapid means of communication between the United States and Central and South America.

ACQUISITION OF ADDITIONAL LANDS FOR FOREST RESERVES

The act of April 30, 1928, authorized the appropriation of $2,000,000 for the fiscal year 1929 for the acquisition of additional lands for forest reserves. Of this authorization the sum of $1,000,000 is provided in the agricultural appropriation act for 1929, leaving $1,000,000 to be provided in this bill to supplement that sum. The amount carried in the agricultural act is made immediately available and is already committed by projects now approved by the National Forest Reservation Commission and unless the additional sum is granted now, the work of the commission will be practically at a standstill during the next fiscal year so far as the initiation of new projects is concerned.

JUDGMENTS AND AUDITED CLAIMS

The sum of $2,879,412.45 is carried for the payment of judgments rendered against the United States by United States district courts and for the payments of audited claims settled and determined by the General Accounting Office. These judgments and claim allowances are final and binding on the United States and their payment should not be delayed or avoided. In connection with the appropriations for the payment of judgments the committee has inserted a limitation, upon recommendation of the Comptroller General, prohibiting the payment of interest on any judgment for a period in excess of 30 days after the approval of the act in which is contained the appropriation for the payment thereof. The Comptroller General advised the committee that frequently in cases where judgments bear interest at 6 per cent from date of rendition to date of payment, the judgment creditors are slow to request payment because of the unusual interest rate and of the security of payment due from the United States Government. The General Accounting Office is prepared to pay judgments promptly after the appropriation is made for them and the committee is of the opinion that a period of 30 days affords sufficient time in which to make payment, and that thereafter interest should cease.

AMMUNITION STORAGE AND TRANSPORTATION, WAR AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS

The bill contains a total of $3,108,159 for ammunition storage facilities and redistribution of ammunition at ammunition depots for the War and Navy Departments, of which the sum of $1,193,998 is recommended for the Navy Department and $1,914,161 for the War Department.

The recommendations contained in the bill are the conclusions of a special subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations and the history, explanation, and development of the items contained in the bill are fully and completely set forth in the following special report which the Committee on Appropriations has adopted in full:

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS ON AMMUNITION STORAGE, WAR AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS

MAY 15, 1928.

From: Special subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations on the subject of ammunition storage, consisting of Messrs. FRENCH (chairman), BARBOUR, HARDY, TABER, CLAGUE, OLIVER, HARRISON, AYRES, and COLLINS.

To: Acting chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

The special subcommittee, composed of the entire membership of the subcommittees charged with the consideration of the annual War and Navy Department appropriation bills, designated by our late chairman, the Hon. Martin B. Madden, to consider the report (H. Doc. No. 199, 70th Cong.) on ammunition-storage conditions of the Joint Army and Navy Board appointed pursuant to the provision contained in the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1928, authorizes me to present the following report:

HISTORICAL

Following the cessation of hostilities with the Central Powers of Europe the need arose to house great quantities of ammunition of all classes. Existing storage facilities, both Army and Navy, were not adequate to shelter the accumulation without creating hazards to life and property, public and private. There remained no alternative, however, if the material was to be preserved, and at a number of Army and Navy storage depots vastly more explosive material was permitted to be stored than good practice warranted. This situation continued, being somewhat ameliorated from time to time by service expenditures and deterioration and a certain amount of redistribution, until lightning occasioned a disastrous explosion at the naval magazine, Lake Denmark, N. J., on July 10, 1926, which resulted in bringing ammunition-storage conditions forcibly to the attention of all concerned.

The Congress was not in session when the Lake Denmark disaster occurred. The then chairman of the Appropriations Committee (Mr. Madden), however, assured the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy Department that he would support him in securing reimbursement of his then current appropriation for such reasonable and necessary expenditures as he might make in rehabilitating the Lake Denmark depot, removing certain high explosives and properly storing the same at a point where the hazard would be negligible. Accordingly, estimates later were presented totaling $927,000 and appropriations made in consonance therewith in the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1927.

Subsequently, estimates aggregating $3,122,681 were presented and considered in connection with the second deficiency bill, fiscal year 1927, for taking care of the Army's ammunition-storage situation at Raritan, N. J., and Curtis Bay, Md. The Appropriations Committee did not include the items comprising the sum stated in the bill reported to the House. However, this bill, it will be recalled, did not become law.

At the commencement of the present session estimates aggregating $3,110,000 were again presented touching the ammunition situation at Raritan and Curtis Bay for consideration in connection with the first deficiency bill, fiscal year 1928. Simultaneously, an estimate of $2,300,000 was presented for the rehabilitation of Picatinny Arsenal, N. J., to correct the situation there occasioned by or growing out of the Lake Denmark disaster.

The appropriation on account of Picatinny has been made in accordance with the estimate. However, again the committee did not recommend appropriations on account of Raritan and Curtis Bay. Instead, the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1928, carried the following provision:

The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, through a joint board composed of officers appointed by them, shall make a survey of the points of storage of supplies of ammunition and components thereof for use of the Army and Navy, with special reference to the location of such ammunition and components as are in such proximity to populous communities and industrial areas as to constitute a menace to life and property. The results of such survey shall be embodied in a joint report which the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall make to Congress not later than March 15, 1928, with their recommendations as to what changes, if any, should be made in such storage facilities and their points of location and the feasibility of the joint use thereof by the Army and Navy.

REPORT OF JOINT BOARD

The report of the joint board thus created was transmitted to the Speaker on March 9, 1928, and by him referred to the Committee on Appropriations on March 12, 1928. The report is exceedingly well prepared and is sound both in its premises and conclusions. Its perusal by all concerned is recommended.

Paragraphs 4, 5, 6, and 8 of the report follow:

4. The most stringent laws on explosives in the United States are the laws of the State of New Jersey. These, together with the American Table of Distances, are the result of studies of the effects of every known explosion in the world since 1863 on which reliable data could be obtained. They are commonly recognized throughout the United States. Such few other States as have laws on explosives have generally copied those of the State of New Jersey.

5. The board has adopted the laws of the State of New Jersey, which incorporate the American Table of Distances, for its standard of safety. In the few cases not specifically covered by them, the board has adopted safety standards worked out independently—but with almost identical results—by the Army and Navy. All these safety standards are used as minima. As regards the "safety" of individuals and structures outside the boundaries of ammunition depots, the word "safety" is a relative term. No one is ever absolutely safe from injury. The average chance of the average individual of escaping injury has, by custom, been termed "safe." It is with such an understanding that the board uses the expression.

6. A common error, and an utterly unreliable safety guide in judging the safety of ammunition storage, is to assume that the danger is measured by the total amount of explosives stored. It is not the total amount in the depot that should be the guide but rather the amount in any one pile or building, the manner in which this is stored, and the kind of explosives that are stored in its vicinity. Certain explosives are merely fire hazards while others are explosive hazards; some are safe when stored by themselves and dangerous when stored with others; some are dangerous only when subjected to fire; the danger from practically all types may be greatly reduced by employing suitable methods of storage.

8. Military high explosives must, from the nature of their employment, be so insensitive to shock that they will withstand firing from cannon and so safe in storage that they may be carried year after year in the ships of the Navy. The board does not desire to convey the impression that military high explosives are not hazardous under certain conditions, but it does desire to point out that the hazard is relatively smaller than that of certain commercial explosives, such as dynamite, nitroglycerin, etc. The hazards of military explosives are fairly well known and can be removed or effectively controlled by following certain well-established principles, such as those adopted by this board for its guidance. A brief summary of the varying hazards of military high explosives follows:

The joint board states that stored ammunition creates three kinds of hazards: Fire hazard, explosion hazard, and missile hazard. Its recommendations are predicated upon the elimination to the extent practicable of all hazards and are designed, in addition to providing for the safety of life and property adjacent to the depots, to limiting by dispersion and proper storage any appreciable loss by fire or explosion of the ammunition reserve of our armed forces, which, from a national-defense standpoint, is of paramount importance.

In selecting destinations for ammunition to be moved—

Again quoting from the joint board's report—

the board * * * acted with due regard both to safety and to practical considerations, such as the correct strategic location of ammunition reserves, the vacant storage space and Government-owned land available, the ability to make peace-time ammunition shipments economically, the avoidance of storage conditions liable to cause excessive deterioration, and the reasonable limitation of the possible ammunition loss in a single fire or explosion.

The subcommittee wishes to direct especial attention to the personal interest of service people in the proper adjustment of this matter, as voiced by the joint board in paragraph 14 of its report, reading as follows:

14. The board does not consider it amiss to state that no agency has any more personal interest in the safe storage of military explosives than the personnel of the Army and Navy itself. The people who live and work in the ammunition depots are the officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees of the Army and Navy. Their families usually live on the reservation with them. No one is more vitally interested in safe storage than these persons who are most likely to suffer in case of explosion.

HEARINGS

The special subcommittee has held extended hearings, which have been printed and are presented herewith. All of the members of the Joint Army and Navy Board appeared before it, and in the consideration of the Navy's problems members of the Naval Affairs Committee aided to the fullest extent in working out a definite program with the view to getting it under way without delay. The Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations, and the Chief of the Naval Bureau of Ordnance appeared before the subcommittee, and the Secretary of the Navy, in compliance with the subcommittee's request, furnished cost figures for making effective the joint board's recommendations with respect to naval-ammunition storage.

OBSERVATIONS

The subcommittee is impressed with the need for providing completely, properly, and promptly for the accommodation of Army and Navy ammunition. It is alive to the prevailing uneasiness in certain sections occasioned by the nearness of ammunition storage. It believes that the remedy lies in the complete adoption of the primary recommendations of the joint board, except as to Raritan, N. J., and Curtis Bay, Md., hereinafter referred to. It sees no occasion for the abandonment of any of the existing stations. Each is necessary in the dispersion scheme, and some of these need to be enlarged in area, and each has a current mission or a potential one in time of national emergency. The joint board's recommendations are designed in the interest of safety to neighboring communities as well as to station personnel and property.

The subcommittee finds that the Navy is in a worse plight than the Army as regards ammunition storage. Particularly is this true as to east-coast storage and conditions in Hawaii. The establishment of additional depots would seem to be the only remedy.

The report of the joint board includes comment and recommendations with respect to naval ammunition storage points, but includes no cost estimates. These have been supplied to the committee by the Secretary of the Navy, as previously indicated.

The total cost to carry out the joint board's recommendations is as follows:

Army (primary recommendations)	$2,959,012
Alternative recommendation as to Raritan (hearings, p. 253)	251,732
Alternative recommendation as to Curtis Bay (hearings, p. 253)	105,761
Navy	9,179,500
Total	12,496,005

The estimate before the Committee on Appropriations, submitted for the Army only in connection with the first deficiency bill, fiscal year 1928, is in the sum of $3,110,000.

RECOMMENDATIONS

ARMY

The subcommittee recommends the complete adoption of the joint board's primary recommendations, except as to Raritan and Curtis Bay, for which it recommends alternative proposals looking to the removal of all separately loaded high-explosive shells, exclusive of a small number of shells loaded with explosive D, which are not considered hazardous. This will involve an additional expenditure of $357,493. With the other adjustments to be made at these two places, the subcommittee is advised specifically and definitely by the best authorities that there can be no room for complaint from sources without the reservations. The same can be said also with respect to other Army storage depots when the joint board's recommendations shall have been consummated.

The subcommittee recommends an appropriation of $1,194,161 to commence the Army's program, to cost in all $3,316,505. There follows a list of the points or objects of expenditure, the total cost for or on account of each, the amount recommended for appropriation at this time, and the amount remaining to be appropriated:

The subcommittee recommends the inclusion of the following paragraph in the second deficiency bill, fiscal year 1928, to make effective the foregoing recommendation with respect to the Army:

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT

Ammunition storage facilities, Army: Toward providing ammunition storage facilities (limit of cost, $3,316,505), in accordance with the primary recommendations contained in House Document No. 199, Seventieth Congress, except as to Raritan, N. J., and Curtis Bay, Md., as to which such primary recommendations are modified to call for a total expenditure on account of each of such places of $593,015 and $257,280, respectively, $1,914,161, including $204,000 for the acquisition of land, and such sum shall remain available until June 30, 1930.

NAVY

The subcommittee recommends the complete adoption of the joint board's primary recommendations. The Navy's chief problem in the United States is the lack of storage facilities for proper dispersion and housing, creating a condition in east-coast depots that should not longer be tolerated. The subcommittee concurs in the joint board's recommendation that the solution lies in the establishment of an additional depot and, since the fleet is maintained in the Pacific, believes that such a depot should be established at some isolated point served by transportation lines within a reasonable radius of the west coast. The joint board had the benefit of studies made by the Navy Department during the last two years, within which time some 20 projects were examined and particular attention was given to two sites that seemed most desirable—one at Secret Valley, Calif., and the other at Hawthorne, Nev. The latter was recommended by the joint board and has been recommended by the Naval Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives after extensive hearings (see H. R. 13682), the thought being, first, that it can be established at a saving of about $457,000 over the Secret Valley site; second, that the character of the terrain is considered to be more suitable; and third, that meteorological conditions are as good, if not better. Your committee concurs in the conditions recorded. The cost completely to establish the Hawthorne depot has been estimated at $3,500,000. (For details, see hearings, p. 171.) With such a depot the Navy would be enabled to relieve the situation on the east coast, where adjustments then can be made that will make all the depots along the Atlantic seaboard comply with the safety standards which guided the joint board in framing its recommendations.

NEW EASTERN DEPOT NOT RECOMMENDED

Your subcommittee considered the question of establishment of an eastern ammunition storage depot adequate for either the Army or the Navy, or both, and the possible abandonment of three or more of the existing depots in the East which are in closest proximity to centers of population. The question was considered and rejected by the joint board.

Your committee decided not to recommend the establishment of such a depot for the following reasons:

1. The cost would be not less than from five to twelve millions of dollars, including site.

2. The cost of removal of ammunitions now stored in eastern depots that would be vacated would entail a cost probably in excess of $8,000,000.

3. The investment in existing depots is so large that it would be impossible at this time for the Government to receive more than 20 to 25 per cent on the dollar for the original investment, and upon this basis the loss to the Government on account of present facilities would probably exceed $15,000,000.

4. Upon the completion of the program recommended by your committee, it is not believed abandonment of any eastern depot is justified upon the ground of hazard to life or property.

5. The building up of an eastern station removed from centers of population would mean certain hazards along lines of railway communications in the shipment of explosive materials over and above whatever handling hazards may now exist.

6. The omission of establishment of a new eastern storage depot will not be in conflict with any material construction plans recommended by your committee, and were it desirable to establish such a depot in the future it could be done without involving loss on account of the proposed program with the possible exception of very minor storage facilities that your committee recommends for existing eastern stations.

Beyond the mainland area of the United States, the Navy's major problem is the lack of adequate and proper storage facilities in Hawaii. Here the existing situation, if the subcommittee be correctly advised, should not be countenanced any longer than is necessary to provide relief. The program there calls for an expenditure of $3,540,000. In the Philippines a bad situation prevails, growing out of the transfer of naval activities from Olongapo to Cavite, at which latter point the ammunition storage facilities are rather of an improvised nature and need to be replaced. The cost is estimated at $1,000,000.

These three items are the sizable Navy projects. The others are all contingent upon the establishment of a new depot in the United States.

The total cost of the Navy's program, as recommended by the Joint Army and Navy Board, has been represented by the department to be $9,179,500. The subcommittee recommends the adoption of this program and an initial appropriation toward its accomplishment of $1,195,839, which will cover all land purchases necessary to be made and allow a margin of $475,000 to be expended in the discretion of the department on other phases of the program.

There follows a list of the points or objects of expenditure, the total cost for or on account of each, the amount recommended for appropriation at this time, and the amount remaining to be appropriated.

The subcommittee recommends the inclusion of the following paragraph in the second deficiency bill, fiscal year 1928, to make effective the foregoing recommendation with respect to the Navy:

PUBLIC WORKS, BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS

Ammunition storage facilities, Navy: Toward providing ammunition storage facilities in accordance with the recommendations contained in House Document No. 199, Seventieth Congress, first session, $1,193,998, of which sum $638,998 shall be available for the acquisition of land and $80,000 shall be available for the employment of classified personal services in the Bureau of Yards and Docks and in the field, to be engaged upon such work and to be in addition to employees otherwise provided for.

The foregoing includes no authorization to meet the situations as to a depot at Hawthorne and as to facilities in Hawaii and in the Philippines. The subcommittee has been assured, however, that such authorization will be forthcoming at the proper time and in sufficient time to make the appropriation proposed completely effective.

The adoption of the foregoing recommendations will bring the appropriations proposed both as to the Army and Navy within the Budget estimate of $3,110,000 now pending before the committee.

In conclusion, the subcommittee desires to suggest the wisdom of having a permanent joint board to supervise ammunition storage, such a board, perhaps, to have jurisdiction over the execution of the programs now recommended for adoption, and to see that, if and when adopted, no further undesirable situations are permitted to creep in; in other words, to be an agency to guard against a repetition of the conditions now confronting us. The subcommittee suggests the inclusion of a provision somewhat as follows in the second deficiency bill, fiscal year 1928:

The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, through a joint board of officers appointed by them, shall keep advised of storage supplies of ammunition and components thereof for use of the Army and Navy, with special reference to keeping such supplies properly dispersed and stored and to preventing hazardous conditions to arise endangering life and property within and without storage reservations. Such board shall advise and confer with such Secretaries on the execution of the recommendations contained in House Document No. 199, Seventieth Congress.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. ACKERMAN. I understand from the gentleman, from what he has learned concerning the removal of the explosives from the area affected, that absolute confidence can be placed by the citizens that everything will be made safe?

Mr. WOOD. I do not think there is any doubt about it. The hearings had by the committee of which Mr. FRENCH was chairman are full and complete. Both sides were heard and the committee feel that they have taken away all possible danger and have done their best to remove the high explosives, and that such a thing as the Lake Denmark disaster will not occur again. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

THE INAUGURATION PARADE

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, war is a remnant of the jungle. It is anticivilization, anti-Christian. It is not civilized, much less Christian. In a so-called Christian civilization it can only be retained as a means of settling differences by fanning the flames of race hatred, bigotry, greed, and commercialism.

And the war spirit is fostered by glorifying war on all imaginable occasions. In most of our public celebrations there is much more of the spirit of war than of the spirit of peace.

Our Independence Day celebrations have degenerated, if they may be so characterized. Once they were the occasion for addresses by inspiring orators, for thrilling surges of patriotism that inspired the participants to even deeper love of country, for exercises that, while bright and joyous, never lost their solemnity. Now there is too little of that, too much of shooting, shouting, fireworks, sham battles, military displays.

Many other celebrations and activities, entirely peaceful in their very nature, are made to partake of a war-like atmosphere by the predominating military exhibits that make up the parade intended to add impressiveness and magnitude to the celebration.

I confine myself to-day to the parade that marked the inauguration of the President of the United States on March 4, 1925. It is the only inaugural I have witnessed. And I sincerely hope it will be the only inaugural of its kind I shall ever be called upon to witness.

An idea of the extent of the military participation can best be obtained by referring to the news reports of the parade. You will find that the parade was almost exclusively a war parade. The division of troops consisted of the following:

Two troops of Cavalry as escort to the President, the Twelfth Infantry Regiment, an Engineer band, a battalion of Engineers, the Fifty-sixth Regiment Air Service, the Third Cavalry band, the First Battalion of the Sixteenth Field Artillery, the Sixth Field Artillery band, Tank Corps personnel with 48 tanks.

The marine and naval contingent comprised a regiment of naval men from Hampton Roads Naval Base; the Navy band; the Fifth Regiment of Marines from Quantico, Va.; the Marine Band; a detachment of troops from Marine Barracks and the navy yard in the District of Columbia.

As I watched the parade, with its display of uniforms, guns, machine guns, caissons, tanks, and all the accessories of war, I wondered if we were back in Germany or in France in 1914, inciting the populace to a World War under Kaiser Wilhelm or the French militarists, or whether we were in the United States in the year 1925, a few years after the war to end war, gazing upon one of the most impressive and colorful spectacles in a Nation populated by citizens devoted to peace and peaceful pursuits.

I grew sick at the sight of all these war paraphernalia. Mark you, there were 48 rumbling, trundling tanks. Not one, that might have been fairly paraded as evidence of the development of national defense, but 48 of them.

If guns and swords, bayonets, and machine guns, tanks, and all the man-killing and man-maiming instruments of modern warfare are to be exhibited to the gaze of a patriotic throng in attendance at the inauguration of their Chief Executive, why not complete the picture and satisfy the morbid, blood-thirsty beings hungry for such a spectacle by exhibiting as a part of the parade a few more of the instruments used in times past and present for taking human life.

In other words, if the inauguration of a President of the United States in a time of peace—at a time when the clamor of the whole civilized world is for the ending and the outlawry of war—if the inauguration features are to be overshadowed by a parade glorifying the wholesale murder and slaughter called war, why not "do it up brown," why not make it complete, why not show it up in all its barbaric, satanic bestiality and gruesomeness?

Let some one impersonate Socrates drinking the hemlock. His life was snuffed out for bearing witness to the truth against the autocrats of his day.

Give us an arena, with real lions and animals dressed in the clothes of human beings torn to pieces by them.

Erect a replica of the Roman instrument of torture and killing, and have some soldiers nailing a human form to the cross and hoisting it in the air.

Let forms representing human bodies be dragged at the end of triumphant chariots.

Let us have a Procrustean bed and something representing a living human being that might be stretched to conform to the size of the bed, or might have its limbs sawed off for the same purpose.

The picture would be decidedly incomplete without a human torch in effigy. Let us have a burning at the stake.

Of course, the gibbet must have a place in the procession. Let us have the trapdoor and all, with something representing a human form dangling in the noose.

Naturally, we must have a float showing some one being roasted alive over a real fire.

And if it should be difficult to secure anyone willing to enact this fiendish rôle, surely it should be comparatively easy to obtain a modern version of this hellish torture, an electric chair in which we roast and toast people alive in our would-be Christian civilization.

But the real features are neglected in the modern warfare exhibit. Let us have it in all its hideousness. We see the rifles, machine guns, artillery, and tanks; why have the barbed wire, the shattering grenades, the poison gases, the flame throwers, the trench daggers with metal knuckles, the numerous other death and torture dealing weapons and instruments been omitted from the spectacle? Give us a large float, with a miniature city populated by mice and guinea pigs, so that we may have a hint of what lethal gas can do and will do in the next war. Let us see war in its hideousness, with the wire, trenches, lice and vermin, reek and stench, disfigurement and gore, instantaneous death, and lingering death, and even living death.

In short, if the parades at the inaugural ceremonies are to portray war instead of peace, let it not be simply glorification of war by giving us a picture of beautiful uniforms, gleaming ornaments, shining weapons giving off the sunlight's glint, prancing steeds with sleek coats and polished hoofs, medals and insignia, salutes, and martial music. Let us have a true picture, an honest portrayal of man's inhumanity to man, in the hundred different ways of torturing and killing our fellow humans.

I have cited but a few examples. I might insert a list of over 2,000 instruments of torture and killing employed by punitive groups from antiquity down to the present time. The vast majority of them, and the most inhuman among them all, the most devilishly devised, have had their origin in a so-called Christian civilization. And there are devices and instruments, methods and plans now being perfected which challenge our very imagination and our conception of wholesale death, which, if ever used, will make the World War shambles dwindle into the insignificant.

In the name of decency, in the name of humanity, in the name of every Christian in this Nation, in the very name of the Prince of Peace I solemnly protest against making our festive events and ceremonies—and especially the inauguration of our Presidents—the occasions for glorifying war and the taking of human life. If we want the world to believe us even half civilized, let the instruments of killing, of wholesale murder and slaughter, be banished forever from our public parades.

O, Mr. Chairman, I am not protesting against any and all participation in such ceremonies and parades by representative groups and detachments from each arm of our national defense. Certainly our well-drilled, well-equipped, well-disciplined troops are to us as citizens a matter of pride; we recognize their proper place in our scheme of Government, and any parade might well be considered incomplete without their rhythmic, swinging march.

And certainly those aged heroes of the more distant wars, who constituted the President's guard of honor, belonged in the position of honor which they were accorded in conformity with the President's wish. Yet they did not exhibit the weapons and instruments they used in their war to inflict death and torture, did they?

Nor do I protest against the military and naval bands which participated in the cavalcade. Our Army, Marine, and Navy bands are admittedly in the forefront of such musical organizations, and their stirring strains of marches and national airs could not well be dispensed with. Yet in time of war these musicians have a somewhat different task. Why not present some of them, if you please, with their stretchers, aid kits—yes, and their spades.

Why not equip the battalion of intrepid, well-groomed policemen who marched in the parade with their revolvers, bludgeons, black marias, and all their punitive instruments?

Had I the time I could easily point out a hundred different ways in which the parade could exemplify the pursuits of peace instead of war, in which it could be representative of all departments in the Chief Executive's branch of our Government, instead of a War Department field day. It should not be necessary. Visualize a parade showing the marvelous advance and progress in science, art, and invention, and in all fields of endeavor which make for progress in human liberty, mercy, and brotherhood. What limitless, endless opportunities for showing, not instruments for the taking of human life, typical of the human cruelty and hatred and revenge that finds its expression in the ghastly horror of modern war, but devices for conserving and prolonging human life, enhancing and furthering the pursuits of peace and the spirit of brotherly love between man and man.

Whoever may be the one to be inaugurated as our next President, to whichever party he may belong, whatever be his nationality or his creed, I appeal to him, I adjure him—I believe I do so in the name of all liberty-loving, peace-loving Christian men and women in the Nation—I appeal to him to make his inaugural parade not a messenger of war, but a message of peace, so to arrange and order it that it shall conform to the views and opinions of the Christian civilization which he is chosen to represent, and yet shall give fullest expression to the citizens who set aside that day in which to pay their respects and to honor their new President. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, within a short time after the 1924 quota restriction law was enacted, civic organizations and, especially, the women's organizations of America, appealed to Congress that the law be amended by eliminating some of the extremely harsh and unjust provisions.

Extra and special appeals have been made to humanize the law, so as to enable the reuniting of families.

Such organizations as the national board of the Young Women's Christian Association of the United States, represented by Mrs. Harry M. Bremmer; the National Catholic Welfare Conference and Council of Men; the National Council of Jewish Women; the Federation of Labor of America; the National Women's Trade League; the American Jewish Committee and Congress appeared before the committee and so clearly and strongly demonstrated the need to humanize the law, so as to make possible the reunion of the families, that I firmly believed that the committee would not ignore the extraordinary strong pleas and arguments and would act favorably.

Notwithstanding the fact that about 30 Members introduced bills to amend the 1924 immigration law to make possible the reunion of separated families, the committee instead of acting favorably upon these country-wide requests and appeals reported the so-called Jenkins bill, H. R. 12816, and gave the country the implication that the reuniting of families would be made possible by this bill.

Therefore, I feel it to be my duty to call attention to the fact that the Jenkins bill does not embody the remedial and relief legislation sought and requested by these civic and labor organizations of the country.

All it does in addition to the present immigration law is to grant a few husbands and the children of American citizens up to 21 years of age a nonquota status.

It gives a preferential status up to 50 per cent to the parents of American citizens, skilled agriculturists and their children up to 18 years of age, and the remainder of the quota to the wives and children of the lawfully admitted aliens who have established a permanent residence in the United States.

Many Members and people who are not thoroughly familiar with this proposed legislation may actually believe that relief is being accorded to these unfortunate aliens who have for years sought to bring over their wives and children, but such, I regret, is not the case.

This bill in no way grants them any aid or relief from the cruel, harsh, inhumane, present 1924 restriction act.

First. A majority of these separated families are and come from countries that have an extremely small quota and, consequently, it will take years and years before they can be benefited or aided or secure any relief.

Second. This preferential status only applies to countries having a quota over 300 and therefore it will not apply to some of the small countries most discriminated against.

The gentlemen who reported this bill can not truthfully deny these above-stated facts. This bill will aid only a very few, namely, husbands of American citizens and children of American citizens between the ages of 18 and 21; and the number of these is negligible.

The report of the State Department states that on March 1 the applications on file numbered 700 such husbands and 3,425 children; however, a large number of these have been admitted since and charged to the quotas of the respective countries.

As to the preferential status: The present law gives a preferential status to the parents of American citizens, to the skilled agriculturists, and, also, to children of American citizens up to 21 years of age.

So the present Jenkins bill does not, in any way, aid or assist or make easier the coming of the parents of American citizens; the only thing in addition to the few exemptions to the husbands and children of American citizens from 18 to 21 years of age it gives is a preferential status of the balance of the quota to the wives and children of aliens permanently residing in the United States.

As I have stated, the quotas the countries, where these stranded wives and children are, is extremely small, and the relief granted in this bill to them is merely nominal, as almost every one of these countries in issuing passports to their emigrants give preference to the wives and children of those now residing in the United States, and our consuls abroad are following this policy as well.

As I have good reason to believe that a good deal of publicity will be given through the press, that Congress has passed legislation that will relieve the inhumane condition and that will enable to bring about the reuniting of these many unfortunate families, I am making this explanation for the purpose of familiarizing the Members of this House with what this bill actually provides, and what relief, if it can be called a relief, it will give, so that they will not be misled when answering the appeals of these organizations and their constituents.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, it is to be deplored that the Immigration Committee and this House refuse this nearly unanimous appeal of the good American mothers that compose these many civic organizations in America, and are swayed by a few so-called patriotic—but more properly unpatriotic—intolerant organizations, represented by a few professional lobbyists and propagandists.

Though there might be justification for the liberalization of the immigration law in other respects, in view of the millions of unemployed no one is requesting it or has sought to increase the large number of unemployed or that would permit of entry of any that would take the places of American laboring or wage-earning people. Had that been proposed I am sure that the American Federation of Labor, who are at all times guarding the interests of the American wage earner, would not have joined in the recommendation for this legislation to bring about the reunion of the families. They realize that none of those that would be permitted to come, whether the parents of American citizens or the wives and the children under 18 years of age of the residing alien would in any way affect the present deplorable labor situation, therefore, the reason for refusing the sought for legislation can not be justified on these grounds, but is only due to the prejudice and intolerance brought about, as I have often stated, by a limited number of professional restrictionists.

I can not help but say that the present administration and the Congress is pursuing a shortsighted policy which is detrimental to the best interests of our country.

How much nobler and grander it would be if our country would pursue a broader and more liberal policy and bring about friendly feeling and good will instead of incurring the animosity of those many groups in and out of the United States.

I feel that the Members have received, just as I have, hundreds of requests and appeals for legislation to reunite the eight to ten thousand families that are now separated.

I regret that these requests have fallen upon deaf ears, just as the appeal to nullify the national-origin scheme has. The time before it is to go into effect has been extended for one year instead of being repealed, as was promised by the administration and the Republican leaders. I can not understand why that action has not been taken, especially in view of the fact that the three Secretaries, the Secretaries of State, Labor, and Commerce, the administration, and the leaders of both Houses have been obliged to concede that there was no possible way to ascertain even approximately the allocation provided for in the discriminatory 1924 act.

I have on several occasions pointed out that it was a scheme for the purpose of further discriminating against certain nationalistic groups in the United States. I not only conceded but maintained that although we have the right and the power to do whatever we desire, we should legislate in the interest of America and that all legislation enacted should be considered only from that point of view. Firmly believing that it was for the best interests of our country to treat all of our peoples, it mattered not of what nationalistic group, fairly and justly, I pointed out, as I have stated, how discriminatory and biased this national-origin scheme was.

I argued that under the estimates submitted by the gentlemen who developed this wonderful scheme, countrymen of some of our citizens who beyond doubt would have demonstrated their worth in the future will be deprived and prevented from coming to the United States if this scheme is enforced. I also demonstrated that this legislation was preeminently in the interests of Great Britain.

I maintained further that the national-origin scheme according to estimates, would reduce the immigration from Germany from 51,227 to 20,028; from Sweden, from 9,561 to 3,072; from Norway from 6,453 to 2,053; from Denmark from 2,789 to 945; from Czechoslovakia, from 3,073 to 1,359; from Poland, from 5,982 to 4,535. On the other hand, I pointed out that the number that would be permitted to come from Great Britain would be increased from 34,007 to 85,135.

These statements that I made on this floor are borne out and fully substantiated by the table, which has been worked out and submitted by the three Secretaries after two years of investigation under the provisions of the law, and which is as follows:

The immigration act of 1924—Immigration quotas

Country of origin	Present quotas based on 1890 foreign-born population	Provisional quotas on basis of national origin
Armenia	124
Austria	785	1,486
Belgium	512	410
Czechoslovakia	3,073	2,248
Denmark	2,789	1,044

The immigration act of 1924—Immigration quotas—Continued

Country of origin	Present quotas based on 1890 foreign-born population	Provisional quotas on basis of national origin
France	3,954	3,837
Germany	51,227	23,428
Great Britain and North Ireland	34,007	73,039
Irish Free State	28,567	13,862
Norway	6,453	2,267
Poland	5,982	4,978
Portugal	503	290
Rumania	603	516
Sweden	9,561	3,259
Switzerland	2,081	1,198

Their reports to the President and the President's report to the Senate show that these tables are unreliable and that it is impossible to reach with any degree of accuracy the correct number of nationals according to origin. These reports further show that Great Britain and northern Ireland would receive over 50 per cent of the entire immigration and all the balance of Europe under 50 per cent. In addition, the 100,000 Canadians that come into the United States outside of the quota, would give England and its colonies nearly 75 per cent of the total immigration.

The fact that these professional restrictionists have made no effort to place Canada and Mexico on a quota basis and have refused to pass the Box and my bills to stop the great Mexican and Canadian labor influx, satisfies me that they are not as sincere as they profess to be, but are mainly interested in retaining America for England. As to Mexico, the railroads and sugar-beet interests seem to have convinced these restrictionists that Mexican immigration is more beneficial to America than European immigration.

These gentlemen with their English leanings set up the English race as superior to all others without justification, and show undue interest in keeping out other nationals for fear that the English stock in America would suffer by the influx of Germans, Swedes, Norwegians, Poles, Bohemians, Lithuanians, Russians, Rumanians, and others by them designated as inferior and undesirable people.

Every one who honestly considers the contributions on the part of these various non-English nationalistic groups in the United States, it matters not how prejudiced he may be, is obliged to concede that these people who are being discriminated against, have beyond doubt contributed in a great measure not only to the prosperity and financial development of our Nation, but to our literature, art, and science as well. The character, history, and civilizations of these nations was recognized long before the English race was known.

Gentlemen, any one familiar with the national-origin scheme knows the source from which the power comes and also knows that this scheme and the pressure behind it is directed and commanded by the secret organizations which seem to control the action not only of the committee, but also of the House. How long will this be tolerated? How long will this great House of Representatives permit itself to be bossed and controlled by it?

This national-origin scheme, which is nothing but prejudiced biased class legislation fostered by a nefarious organization whose purpose seems to be the destruction of equality, should not only have been extended—it should have been repealed and a fair, just, and humane law substituted in its stead.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have four articles on the subject of Sunday observance—one from the Boston Post; a short extract from a veto message recently delivered by Governor Fuller, of Massachusetts; a short statement from Harry Lauder, the great Scotch comedian; and an article by the late Senator Watson, of Georgia; all of which would take about 10 minutes to read. I ask unanimous consent to extend my present remarks in the RECORD and to include the articles and statements just mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, my bill to provide for Sunday as a day of rest in the Nation's Capital has been attacked as an effort to destroy "religious freedom" and bring about the "union" of church and state. Of course, this contention is absolutely without foundation. Sunday legislation is in furtherance of "religious freedom" and of both the church and the state, but in no sense provides for their union.

No man in Georgia ever made a more determined fight for religious freedom and against the union of church and state than the late Senator Thomas E. Watson, of Georgia. It is therefore quite fortunate that Senator Watson expressed fully his views on Sunday laws in an article recently carried in the Watsonian, which I now quote practically in full:

A DAY OF REST

By Thomas E. Watson

A few more years, and the charging columns of traffic will have stormed the ancient battlement of the sacred city, and the steady stream of gain seekers will flow on, unimpeded by its barrier.

Already the beer gardens, the dance halls, the baseball and football teams, the railroads, and the newspapers drive right through its hallowed precincts. Already the busy contractor in the great city makes the hammers ring while the church bells chime.

Well, I am an old-fashioned man—simple in some things, I reckon. God knows I am little fitted to sermonize, but I am not ashamed to say that I feel a profound reverence for that old landmark—the Sabbath day. To see it go down under the hurrying feet of mere selfish money hunters would, in my eyes, be a far-reaching calamity.

This is said in no spirit of narrow sectarianism. Far from it. But I believe a periodical rest day is so very needful to the world; so true an economy of time, of energy, of strength; so moral and elevating in all its tendencies, that were religion entirely removed from the debate I would, as a lawmaker, vote to compel a weekly halting of the human hordes.

I have read somewhere that in crossing the plains, in the emigrant days, the teams which halted for Sunday always caught up with, and then passed, those which had traveled on without the halt. I do not doubt that such would be the case in any similar test.

The French Republic, in its general reforms, undertook to eliminate the seventh day, Sabbath, and to make every tenth day the Sunday instead. Historians tell us the attempt was a failure; that men and beasts wore away under the lengthened strain, and that France had to return to the old seventh-day rest.

In this country we have a heartless, tireless, pitiless race for wealth, such as the world never saw before. The great lines of duty are becoming dim. The grand ideas of moral responsibility are fading away. The sublime conception of life as a trusteeship of noble powers, aspirations, and opportunities, is battling for its very existence.

Every year this maddening rush for money; this insane "get-there" push for success, regardless of methods, sees us drawing nearer to the fatal brink over which so many nations have gone down in ruin. Whenever we lose entirely the belief in human accountability to Eternal powers; whenever we are possessed utterly by the creed that life ends at the grave, and that therefore we must "eat, drink, and be merry"—then, indeed, we are doomed.

Money will be the God we worship. The basest passions of our animal nature will assert supreme authority over thought and speech and act. From January to January there will be the rush, the roar, the march, the deadly combat, the shout of onset, the cry of the wounded, the cheers of these relentless civilized savages whose only care, purpose, effort, religion is to get money. In this mad saturnalia, so very destructive to the better attributes of manhood, the catchwords of the procession will be precisely the same as those under which all the old pagan nations went headlong to perdition, "money and woman and wine."

Strike Sunday out of the habits and thoughts and reverences of men, and we will have lost a priceless heirloom of the past whose value we did not know until it was gone.

I love the day of rest, quiet, and reflection. With folded hands one can stop and think. There's no thought that rivals are passing while we pause. They are halting, too.

There is time to look back upon the road already traveled and number the mileposts. On this day we are not afraid that somebody will drive by us and get ahead.

There is time to deal honestly with one's self, and to inquire with what cargo we are sailing on to the unknown seas—a most serious inquiry.

There is time to look over the leaves of our "Brief of Testimony," and to see what kind of case we are carrying to the great High Court.

There is time for all these and for many things yet better than these; and when Monday comes no man goes fresher or stronger to the unfinished tasks of life than he who can say, "I remembered the Sabbath day and kept it holy"—each being the judge of how he construes the word "holy."

Blessed forever be the old Sabbath of our fathers! Let every man frame his own creed and be true to it—but to me it is a sublime thought that when the sun comes up, on the seventh day, he glances over a world of rest; that the allotted tasks have been done; that strife is hushed; that rivalry enjoys a truce; the arm of labor is relaxed; the rush of capital is arrested; greed is at bay; conscience is alive; duty is on guard; and the white tents of peace are dotting every plain and valley on all this great globe.

Mr. Chairman, surely the fearless Thomas E. Watson would never have penned these words if he believed that Sunday laws were in the least antagonistic to the great principles for which he so nobly fought. There is practically no limit to the quotations in favor of Sunday laws. Great men from every calling of life have advocated Sunday laws. The solid fight against Sunday laws comes from those who either wish to make Sunday their greatest money day or who believe in some other day of the week as the true Sabbath or who hate our Christianity or who deny the existence of God. Probably the highest-salaried stage entertainer in the world is the great Scotch comedian, Sir Harry Lauder. Those of us who have heard him know he is not only an entertainer but also a man full of sympathy and love for all humanity. He gave his only son to make the supreme sacrifice in the World War and himself, too old to fight, went to the battle front and cheered the boys by his patriotic songs of bonny Scotland, of home, and of victory.

It is a real pleasure to quote from this great man. Here is what he says about Sunday observance:

SIR HARRY LAUDER'S SUNDAY

I am against Sunday theater shows, and I have told my fellow artists that if we fail to uphold our religion and our Sunday, men will scorn us, women will weep for us, and children will be taught to hate the name of the theater; and the curses of the generations to come will be forever at the stage door. * * * When for the first time I came to America I had four Sunday performances, and a more miserable engagement I never fulfilled. I felt I was doing something against my religion, something which I had been taught by my mother was wrong. It was unnatural for me to work on the Sabbath, and I felt the shame of it. I am a Scot, and I would die rather than dishonor God's Word. It would be better for me to go back to the mines where at any rate Sunday is looked on as God's gift, and when a man can refresh himself for the next week's labor.

Now, let me quote from a recent veto message of Governor Fuller, of Massachusetts, as follows:

This bill not only permits the sale of bread and other foods but also permits the delivery of the same on Sunday.

Such legislation is unnecessary. Massachusetts will do well to have no part in the commercializing of Sunday. There never was a time when a day of rest and quiet each week was more needed than it is to-day. To make Sunday just another week day is against the best traditions of Massachusetts and against the best interest of its people.

I welcome the opportunity of saying that I stand foursquare against the legalizing of business and also professional sports on Sunday, and I want to prophesy that if the sacredness of Sunday, with all the sentiment and beauty that the day inspires, is violated by legalizing business and by professional sports on that day, it will not be long before it is a regular working day for those to whom it might otherwise be at least a day of rest.

It is not a far flight from legalizing the working of women evenings—recently indorsed by one branch of the legislature—to working the men on Sunday. I look forward to that time when the laboring men and women of America will be working on a five-day rather than a seven-day week, of which this proposed legislation appears to be a forerunner.

I wish to give this additional quotation from a recent issue of the Boston Post:

Governor Fuller indicated plainly yesterday that he would have promptly vetoed the bill allowing professional sports on Sunday had it reached him. The governor's strong words against commercializing Sunday will be gratifying to those who fought the bill.

It is grossly unfair and unbecoming to charge those who opposed this bill with being fanatics, meddlesome persons, and extreme Puritans. Reverence for Sunday is a New England tradition and one close to the hearts of thousands of people. Many believe, and with truth, that once Sunday observance is broken down the whole moral atmosphere of the community will suffer a decline.

There is a mistaken idea that churches ought to cater to what is sometimes called "popular sentiment." Principles must never be yielded for the purpose of a little temporary applause. Governor Fuller very properly aligns himself with those who demand a proper reverence for Sunday and who will never surrender their right to defend its traditional sacredness.

Mr. Chairman, I receive a great many letters and newspaper clippings attacking me and the bill which I introduced to provide Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia. I consign a large part of these to the wastebasket if they are not from my district. I answer my own people, regardless of what they may write about. I have never received a mean letter from my district, though, about this bill nor about any other bill. I do wish to answer a courteous letter from Portland, Maine.

I do not wish by correspondence to try to change any person's sincere religious belief; and I do not purpose conducting a correspondence law school for those who praise the Constitution when they can twist it into a shield for their wrongs and crimes and condemn and would destroy that noble document when its plain mandate contravenes their criminal proclivities and purposes. I regard the Constitution as a shield of justice rather than as a protection of the dagger of the assassin. It is the stronghold of a liberty-loving, righteous, God-worshiping people rather than the hiding place or rendezvous of the criminal, the libertine, and the atheist. Its every mandate is for the protection of personal liberty rather than personal libertinism.

Again, I do not purpose arguing either in writing or otherwise with an atheist or a fool. There is no sense in wasting good ammunition at nothing. I want a target when I shoot.

"God made him; therefore let him pass for a man." I receive letters almost daily from individuals "cussing" out all churches, all ministers, all chaplains, believers in Christ or God, announcing that our Constitution is godless, our Nation godless, and those of our people fools and criminals who believe in any kind of religion. I do not answer such letters. I know all the universe proclaims the existence of a God, but why argue with an individual who denies the greatest truth of all time and the only truth of eternity? If God Almighty, with His eternal, all-powerful wisdom and power, does not convince the atheist, why should I attempt such a task?

There can be no greater argument in behalf of the Great I Am than the eternal, everlasting work of His own hands.

The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament showeth His handiwork.

Another class of individuals I do not purpose arguing with is those who think argument consists in calling each other mean names or applying derogatory epithets to the measure one favors or principle one advocates. Such people admit their inability to argue a proposition and simply get mad, say mean things, and make ugly faces. I do not care to rush into such a conflict, even though I feel I could put up the better argument. I do not choose to enter into a wrestling contest with a skunk, even though I am larger and stronger. I am glad, though, to give to any person honestly seeking after the truth my reasons for favoring a rest bill for the District of Columbia.

The fight on my bill to provide a day of rest for the District of Columbia is most remarkable. "Politics makes strange bedfellows." The infidels in their crazy fight on all religions, on Christianity, and on God are the most bitter against me and the bill sponsored by me. Almost if not quite as determined as the atheist are those that bow down to the mammon of unrighteousness and make the dollar their god, rather than serve the best interest of humanity and their country. Then there are those opposing my bill who are not Christians but who believe in God, who are fighting shoulder to shoulder with the atheist in their effort to make this a godless Nation and a godless people. Why should this aid, comfort, and help be given to the atheist by these historic, biblical people of God? They even believe in a "Sabbath," and yet fight a bill providing for one day of rest out of every seven. Why are they fighting Sunday legislation? Do they prefer atheism to one day of rest out of every seven? Do the Sunday box receipts at the movie and theater enter into the matter? Are they worshiping gold instead of God?

Then there is still another class of people fighting all Sunday legislation everywhere. Who are Christians? They are believers in God, but are making a determined stand with the atheist and nonbelievers who oppose all believers in Christ, the Bible, and God. These good Christians are furnishing ammunition and guns to the infidels and nonbelievers, which munitions are being used in a broadside against all churches and church people. These splendid Christians who honestly believe Saturday is the true Sabbath are applauding, shouting "Bravo" and "Well done" when those who deny the divinity of Christ score what seems to be a hit in their battle against Christianity. They are vigorously supporting those who favor Sunday movies, theaters, and baseball in destruction of the Christian Sunday and are giving aid and comfort to those who put gold ahead of God, and are offering Christ for "30 pieces of silver." I am wondering why all this is happening. I had as soon embrace a live rattlesnake as arm up politically or otherwise with an atheist.

I fear we Christians ofttimes engage in a warfare on each other destructive of ourselves and all we hold near and dear simply because we differ on an inconsequential detail. So far as my bill is concerned, let me say it only seeks to provide one day of rest out of every seven. It is not a religious bill. What other day could be better used in this country, where most people use Sunday as a day of rest? And now, having made these observations, let me answer more specifically the letter of my friend from Maine.

He inclosed a newspaper clipping which tells the whole story. As usual, the newspaper item is misleading and absolutely unfair to my bill. It does not appear what paper carried the item; however, it does not at all state the truth about the bill. An effort is made to show that my bill is the bill of the rich man rather than for the protection of the poor. I shall not quote the item in full. Anyone who will take time to read the bill will see that this item and thousands like it was written either with the deliberate purpose to deceive or with a criminally careless indifference to the truth.

It has been urged from time to time that Sunday laws are unfair to the poor workingman and that I am attempting to legislate a hardship on the laboring man by endeavoring to provide one day of rest out of every seven. I pride myself on being the friend of the poor. None of my people are people of wealth.

My father prior to his marriage was a track hand on the old Atlantic & Gulf Railway, in Georgia. He finally became section foreman and received $40 per month. All my people earned a living by their manual labor. When I was a boy I walked and carried many a dozen eggs 5 miles to market, at 15 cents per dozen, and then walked back home with a bucket full of potash, Arm and Hammer Brand Soda, and so forth, in payment for the eggs. I plowed many a week until I was glad to see Sunday. I learned to love Sunday as a day of rest. .

No; I am not an enemy of the man who toils. I am his friend, heart and soul. They are my kind of folks. I have never knowingly voted or worked against the people who toil. As God has given me to see the light, I have always voted and struggled for the man who is poor and who earns his living by honest toil. My record in this respect is open to all, and I am proud of it.

How am I seeking to hurt the poor laboring man by a bill to provide for one day of rest out of every seven? If I was seeking to eliminate Sunday as a day of rest and require in the District of Columbia and elsewhere that all departments of Government, all factories, and other enterprises continue operation every day without any day of rest, I could be justly said to be fighting the poor workingman. The Sabbath was ordained for the workingman who toils on the six days. The man who does no work does not need physically to rest on the seventh. Too many people in this country are in the class of the idle rich, who do not work on any day. God Almighty ordained that man should rest one day after working six, because it is not right for man, slave or free, to work every day with no day of rest. Neither is it right for any oxen or beast of burden to be deprived of the one day of rest out of seven.

The laboring man owns one day of rest out of every seven, just as he owns his wages, his dinner pail, his home, or his life. The injunction in the commandments against theft are for the protection of the laboring man's property, the one against murder for the protection of his life, and the one against the destruction of the Sabbath is for the protection of the laboring man's one day of rest out of every seven. The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath. Truly the Sabbath was made for the laboring man just as the "eight hours a day" law was made for the laboring man.

I received a few days ago a petition signed by a few people of my district, objecting to my bill and all efforts of Congress to control labor.

This petition is on a prepared form, and therefore probably hundreds and thousands of them are being signed and mailed to Members of Congress. Truly these people have not thought fully of the import of their recommendation. The safety of the public is at stake. Millions of lives are hazarded if the engineer is forced to pull the throttle and keep his eyes on the rail after his faculties are exhausted. Surely reasonable laws regulating the hours of labor of the workingman were made for mankind. It is just as important that man rest after working six days as it is that he rest after working eight hours. "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath."

Man was not made to be destroyed on the Sabbath; surely he was not made to be exploited or debauched on the Sabbath. The Sabbath was set apart as a day of rest for man to regain his fagged physical energies and give such attention as he might wish to his moral and religious welfare. The Sabbath was made for man; it is therefore right to help our fellow man on the Sabbath. To give of one's goods, chattels, and moneys for the benefit of the poor and suffering is commendable. It is likewise right and noble to devote part of one's day of rest to assistance of the suffering and the poor.

"The Sabbath was made for man," and unselfish service of man on the Sabbath is in accordance with the purpose of the Sabbath. If works of necessity and charity were stopped by legislation or as a result of Sabbath observance, then man would become the tortured slave of the Sabbath.

Man was not made for the Sabbath, the Sabbath was made for man. It was made for the poor and needy. It was made for the laboring man. It was made for the man who has toiled all the six days and needs so much as one day of rest.

The fact that man on that day turns his face to the God who gave him life and worships makes the day no less "for man" and no less desirable. Neither is the day less desirable or necessary because through the ages it has afforded the laboring man—even the poorest of the poor—one day out of seven with his wife and children in the home and permitted an opportunity for the family to strengthen the ties of love which bind the family and tie it to the great brotherhood of man and fatherhood of God.

"The Sabbath was made for man," but that is no reason for its destruction. Food was made for man, not man for food, but that does not legalize chicken stealing, cow stealing, or hog theft. Life was given to man "for man," but that takes none of the offense away from murder. Our Federal Constitution was made for man, not man for the Constitution, and yet it is well to preserve that instrument. Our Government was made for man, not man for the Government; nevertheless, one seeking the downfall of his Government is no less a traitor.

"The Sabbath was made for man," and, oh, what a fortress of protection it has been for man and especially for the tired and worn man of toil. It has blessed his home, his family, his country; has helped him to lead his sons and daughters to a better life, and has enabled him by precept and example to point to rest everlasting.

"The Sabbath was made for man," not to perpetuate him in slavery either of body or soul but to enable him to climb to a new level of physical, moral, and religious freedom. "The Sabbath was made for man"—the laboring man, if you please—and it has saved his body from physical wreck because of overwork, has sweetened his rest, made his home a foretaste of heaven on earth, has enabled him in the past to raise his sons and daughters to be the purest and best of all the earth and the greatest men and women of all time, and has enabled him—the workingman—with a day set apart for his own use, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience and enjoy communion with his God, the Creator of mankind.

Yes, "the Sabbath was made for man"; for man's best interest, for his home, his church, his country, and his God. The commercialized amusement interests seem to think both man and the Sabbath were made for them. They care nothing for man except as he brings his cash to their money changers. They care not for the Sabbath, or Sunday, except that they are making it the biggest business day of their week. They favor Sunday in so far as it closes other business, governmental departments, and places of employment, and gives them a monopoly on Sunday business. The commercial amusement interests make no fight on Sunday as a rest day in so far as their patrons are relieved of work to attend their shows. They favor Sunday in so far as it helps their pocketbook. They oppose Sunday regulation if it hurts their pocketbook. If they are so opposed to Sunday observance, why do they not use their money and the influence of their confederates to make a fight to prevent any recognition of Sunday as a practice or custom? They want Sunday as a money-making enterprise. These same people who protest so loudly about their freedom of religion being imperiled by Sunday legislation are content that everybody else close so as not to be in competition with them and so as to furnish a crowd for their cash windows. Are they sincere in their alleged fight for freedom of religion? Why do they not oppose celebration of Christmas as the birthday of Christ? They are strong for Christmas holidays. That helps business.

Are not "freedom of religion," "separation of church and state," and "intolerance" overworked by those who are the most intolerant and who do not care what becomes of church, state, or religion, just so their particular whim is not disturbed nor their greed for gold molested? I shall have more to say presently of these matters.

"The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath." I am equally sure the Sabbath was not made for the commercialized amusement interests, although an effort is now being made to deliver it to them.

I am just wondering how Christians who recognize Saturday as the Sabbath decide that they will be deprived of "freedom of religion" if movies, theaters, and commercialized baseball should stop on Sunday. How do they arrive at the conclusion that a law stopping and preventing on Sunday the vulgarity of the public dance hall and the profanity of the pool room will immediately cause a union of church and state? If they are so afraid of the union of church and state by the passage of a law providing for one day of rest out of seven, why do they not oppose chaplains, the exemption of church property from taxation, and every other recognition of the church by the state?

These good people know that neither of these nor a decent Sunday law will bring a union of church and state or in the least interfere with the fullest of religious freedom.

Chaplains are proper. They go as ministers to the boys in the Army or at war who could not get to confer with ministers otherwise. If I have any criticism of the chaplains of the Army it is that all faiths are not represented fully enough. The making of a reasonable amount of church property free from taxes is not harmful, neither does it interfere with the right of religious freedom.

My bill (H. R. 78) to provide for Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia would not in the least infringe any of these splendid guaranties. My bill, though, stirs up a fight, for there are those who favor Sunday when it closes his competitor's place of business, but objects if he must close at the same time. He prefers to stay open while all others are closed. He gets all the trade.

The commercialized amusement interest favors Sunday and Christmas in recognition of birth and resurrection of Christ so long as they help business, but cry for all the protection of every known and unknown right when their financial interest is disturbed in the least.

The keeping of Sunday as a day of rest by the public does not prevent others from keeping other days. Most of those who complain of unfair Sunday law do not observe any day. They look at the whole as a gigantic money-making scheme. Shall those who have always fought the Christian Sunday now become the masters of the Sabbath to destroy it as a day of rest by making it the great day of financial desecration and profit? Many who oppose Sunday legislation have a double motive. They hate the Christian Sunday and hope through the movies and theater to lead our children to hate our Sabbath and our Christianity and want us to pay them millions of dollars every month for the outrage.

My bill to provide a Sunday rest law for the District of Columbia is not an abridgment of freedom of religion; neither is it objectionable as being religious. It is true it is in accordance with one of the Ten Commandments. So is the law against murder. In fact, there is Scriptural authority for practically every statute, both civil and criminal. That does not make them objectionable. They say Christian people favor the bill. That is true, but a very few Christians oppose it, and, so far as I know, all non-Christian believers and atheists oppose it. This does not make it a religious measure. It is said it will help religious people. I believe it will. I certainly would not favor it if I thought it would help only atheists and nonbelievers. All good laws help Christians, churches, schools, homes, and the best people generally.

I favor separation of church and state as much as anyone, but separation of church and state does not mean to make ours a godless Constitution for a godless Nation of godless people. Some want to separate the church from our country by destroying all churches and making our citizenship a godless people. Others object to people who believe in the divinity of Christ having any part in making our laws. Others object to any people of the Protestant faith advocating reasonable laws and urge that the Constitution is being assaulted. Still others urge that this should be a government of infidels, for infidels, and by the infidels.

The union of church and state, which is objectionable, is the control of the government by one or more churches in the state prescribing a specific religion for all. The sponsoring of a measure by religious people does not make it objectionable. I am frank to say, though, I would look with great disfavor on a bill not advocated by any believers in God.

My bill does not interfere in the least with complete religious freedom or with the fullest separation of church and state.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS].

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, transportation is the big problem before this country to-day.

At various times during the past several years I have pointed out to the Interstate Commerce Commission the excessive and, as we believe, discriminating freight rates that obtain in the Pacific Northwest. The Portland differential, fruit rates, and wheat rates east and west constitute three separate problems.

The differential in favor of Portland operates to eliminate Seattle and Tacoma as competitive buyers in that great wheat territory south of the Snake River in Washington and Oregon. Directly and indirectly the Portland preferential is said to cost the wheat growers of that section 3½ cents a bushel, or about $450,000 annually.

Several unsuccessful attempts to correct this injustice have been made. Another hearing is contemplated. So the controversy has continued for several years, and so it must continue till a fair deal is secured for our wheat growers and grain buyers in that territory. Meanwhile these repeated hearings and the delay are imposing a heavy burden on our people which in justice they ought not to bear.

But this is not all. The whole agricultural freight structure in the Pacific Northwest needs revamping.

HOCH-SMITH RESOLUTION

To facilitate freight adjustments on agricultural products the Congress passed the Hoch-Smith resolution in January, 1925. That resolution provides, in part, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That it is hereby declared to be the true policy in rate making to be pursued by the Interstate Commerce Commission in adjusting freight rates that the conditions which at any given time prevail in our several industries should be considered, in so far as it is legally possible to do so, to the end that commodities may freely move.

* * * * * * *

In view of the existing depression in agriculture, the commission is hereby directed to effect with the least practicable delay such lawful changes in the rate structure of the country as will promote the freedom of movement by common carriers of the products of agriculture affected by that depression, including livestock, at the lowest possible lawful rates compatible with the maintenance of adequate transportation service: Provided, That no investigation or proceeding resulting from the adoption of this resolution shall be permitted to delay the decision of cases now pending before the commission involving rates on products of agriculture, and that such cases shall be decided in accordance with this resolution.

A hearing under this resolution will be held at an early date at Seattle. We are entitled to a prompt decision.

FARMERS WEARY OF DELAYS

At the time we passed the resolution and every day since we passed it it has been common knowledge that the farmers were gripped by an almost unprecedented depression and that the railroads were more prosperous than ever before. Regardless of these facts ceaseless investigations by the Interstate Commerce Commission have gone on for three years. Of course, there are two sides to all questions and in fairness all parties at interest must be heard. However, witnesses should not be permitted to filibuster. No good purpose is served by taking thousands of pages of testimony that can never be considered. The Congress provided in the Hoch-Smith resolution an instrument for speedy adjustments and the reduction of excessive rates on farm products, but the Congress and the country are already weary of delays.

True, beneficial adjustments have been given to certain sections of the country and on certain products but vast areas are still waiting. A freight reduction inaugurated several years after a farmer is bankrupt and out of business doesn't greatly concern that particular farmer. My wheat farmers and apple growers need their freight reduction benefits in 1928.

If general reductions are not more speedily obtained under the Hoch-Smith resolution then I predict the repeal of section 15a of the transportation act at no distant date.

At this time I want to present a general discussion of western grain rates in the United States and Canada by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, April 23, 1928.

RATES ON GRAIN IN THE UNITED STATES AS COMPARED WITH CANADA—PROGRESS UNDER HOCH-SMITH RESOLUTION

Hon. JOHN W. SUMMERS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR DOCTOR SUMMERS: This will have further reference to your letter of April 30, which I acknowledged on that date.

Before dealing directly with the Canadian-American wheat-rate situation to which your letter primarily refers, I think it well to deal briefly with the general grain-rate situation in the western United States. As far as I know, there never was material complaint with respect to the general adjustment of grain rates for export from the western part of the United States prior to the war. Due to increased costs of materials and supplies and wages of employees, the expenses of operating railroads in this country increased heavily between 1915 and 1920. Under such increased costs it became impossible to continue operation of the carriers in this country under the rates formerly in effect. While there has been a considerable drop in prices since 1920, the prices of almost everything still average about 50 per cent higher than in 1914. Freight rates were first increased in 1918 by 25 per cent, and again in 1920 by varying percentages, the increase in western territory being 35 per cent, except that in the territory west of the Rocky Mountains the increase was only 25 per cent. Speaking generally, these increases applied alike to all traffic except that on grain the increase of 1918 was limited to a maximum of 6 cents per 100 pounds, so that the rates on that commodity that were more than 24 cents were not increased as much as other traffic.

During the depression of 1921, which was particularly pronounced in the grain-raising regions of the West, this commission conducted an investigation of grain rates throughout the West and reduced the rates on wheat, hay, and their products to the extent of removing one-half of the increase imposed in 1920. On coarse grains and their products the same reduction and an additional 10 per cent (reduction) was made. The effect quite generally was to reduce wheat rates 13 per cent and coarse-grain rates 20 per cent. The commission reduced all other rates on July 1, 1922, by 10 per cent. It is therefore apparent that, speaking generally, grain rates in the West have been reduced to a greater extent since 1920 than rates on other commodities.

In 1923 the commission conducted another investigation of grain rates in the West. Its decision was rendered on July 10, 1924, and was to the effect that the evidence did not warrant further reductions in rates. Rates and Charges on Grain and Grain Products (91 I. C. C. 105). A copy of the commission's decision setting forth the facts upon which this conclusion was reached is inclosed.

A third investigation of grain rates in the West was started on December 30, 1926, and is known as part 7 of the commission's general investigation under the Hoch-Smith resolution, No. 17000. The first hearing in this case was held at Dallas, Tex., commencing May 9, 1927, and lasted 3 weeks. Further hearings have been held at Wichita, Kans., 5 weeks; at Minneapolis, Minn., 8 weeks; and at Chicago, 11 weeks, the latter hearing ending in March of this year. Three additional hearings are to be held, the first to commence at Seattle, Wash., on May 22, and the other two to be held at Los Angeles, Calif., and Portland, Oreg., respectively, and to follow immediately after the close of the Seattle hearing. Self-evidently much of the testimony with respect to the Montana-Idaho-Washington situation will be developed at these later hearings and therefore is not yet in the possession of the commission.

Notwithstanding that grain rates in the western part of the United States have been reduced since 1920 to a greater extent than have rates on other commodities, it is true that, speaking generally, rates for like distances in Canada are somewhat lower than those in the United States. I make this statement, although I do not have complete and accurate information with respect to the rate situation in Canada because railways in that country are not required to file with this commission their tariffs applying between points in that country. However, I will endeavor in this letter to give you such information as is in my possession with respect to the relative wheat-rate situation in this country compared with Canada.

In 1924 the United States Tariff Commission made an investigation of this subject, and its report to the President was printed by the Government Printing Office under the caption, "Wheat and Wheat Products." According to that report the average weighted rate on Canadian grain to ports on Lake Superior such as Fort William and Port Arthur was 14.1 cents per bushel. The Tariff Commission estimated that comparable rates from American points to Duluth averaged 4.77 cents per bushel higher. These respective figures reduced to rates per 100 pounds would be 23.5 and 7.9 cents. The same report found the westbound rates from the Canadian Provinces to Canadian ports to be about the same as the westbound rates from points in the United States to Puget Sound ports, and higher than the eastbound Canadian rates to the Lake ports. I have every reason to believe that the figures prepared by the Tariff Commission are substantially correct.

Since that time there has been comparatively little change in the rates in the United States, but some change has been brought about in the Canadian situation by reason of an order entered by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada on September 12, 1927, which was made as a result of an investigation made pursuant to a resolution by Parliament adopted June 5, 1925. Briefly stated, the order of the Canadian commission made no changes in the eastbound rates from main-line points to ports on Lake Superior. It did, however, extend to points on branch lines which formerly had higher rates, rates to the Lake Superior ports substantially the same as those from main-line points. As I understand that the rates quoted by the Tariff Commission represented largely main-line hauls, the relative situation in the United States and Canada with respect to transportation eastward through Great Lakes ports and thence by water therefore remains about the same as it was found by the Tariff Commission in 1924. Said order also required that westbound rates to Pacific ports be made substantially the same as eastbound rates for like distances to Lake Superior ports and made a reduction in the export rate all-rail from Fort William and Port Arthur to Quebec for export, from 34.5 cents down to 18.34 cents.

I am not prepared to express a definite opinion as to the precise effect of the Canadian commission's order upon the transportation charges actually paid by Canadian grain producers. I am inclined to think that the heavy reduction from Fort William and Port Arthur to Quebec will have comparatively little effect, because, as I see the situation, it consists principally of bringing down the all-rail rate from these ports to a basis which will still be higher than the water or water-and-rail rate already available via the Great Lakes from Fort William and Port Arthur. Presumably the principal effect of this change will be to have a greater percentage of the grain move over the railroads and a less percentage via the Lakes, although it may not even have this effect, because the water rates will still be lower. Grain produced in the United States and shipped to Duluth would pay from Duluth to Quebec by water substantially the same rate as grain from Fort William and Port Arthur to Quebec by water. Therefore the net disadvantage of American grain would be represented by the difference in rail transportation from the point of production to Duluth as compared with Canadian grain transported to Fort William or Port Arthur.

If shipped by water from Duluth to Buffalo, and thence by rail to New York, the charge for the rail transportation from Buffalo to New York would be 13.5 cents per 100 pounds, to which would have to be added the water rate from Duluth to Buffalo. The latter rate fluctuates considerably. Sometimes it is as low as 1.5 cents per bushel, not including elevation, insurance, and similar charges, and at other times it is considerably higher. The total charge from Duluth to cars at Buffalo probably would be under ordinary conditions from 8 to 9 cents per 100 pounds.

The effect of the reduced westbound rates to the Pacific coast ports will probably be to increase the movement through the Pacific ports as compared with the eastbound movement to Atlantic ports, but I do not know whether or not it will actually reduce the transportation charges paid by the producers to any material degree.

I am not aware of any recent reduction of 3 cents per 100 pounds or any other amount in export rates on grain from Montana, such as mentioned in your letter.

I think it might be well also to call attention to some factors which bear upon the relative rate situations in Canada and the United States. The railroad policies of the two countries are vitally different. In the United States we have private ownership and management. There are many strong and powerful systems and many weaker lines. The stronger lines are, generally speaking, in position to make rates lower than those in effect on the weaker lines, but the policy of Congress, as declared by the transportation act, 1920, is to maintain a system of rates which will build up an adequate transportation machine for the country as a whole on a basis which will enable the weak lines as well as the strong lines to live and serve adequately the communities along their lines. The important thing, however, is that the lines of this country are wholly dependent upon the revenues derived by them from transportation. The situation in Canada is materially different. Practically all the mileage in Canada is owned by two systems—the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific. The former is owned by the Government of Canada. It embraces practically all the weaker lines in Canada. The Canadian Pacific is a strong line comparable to the strong carriers in this country, such as the Union Pacific. Consequently, Canada is in position to impose a level of rates which will be as low as a strong line, such as the Canadian Pacific, can stand, regardless of the effect upon the revenues of the Canadian National, deficits in which are made up from the public treasury. That such deficits have in fact been incurred by the Canadian National is evidenced by the fact that in 1925 it failed to earn enough to pay the interest on its debt by $42,197,664 and failed likewise in 1926 to the extent of $29,894,072. I have not available the figures for 1927.

Many years ago the Canadian Pacific was granted a charter to build a line from Lethbridge, Canada, through what is known as the Crows Nest Pass into British Columbia. At that time it was given an extensive land grant and a subsidy of $3,500,000. In return it agreed, among other things, to reduce the then existing rates on grain to the Lakes by 3 cents per 100 pounds and to maintain those rates perpetually unless permitted by the Canadian Government to raise them.

Those rates were made effective in 1899, at which time costs of railway operation were materially less than they are to-day and at which time the level of rates in the United States were, generally speaking, lower than it is to-day. Between July, 1919, and July, 1923, the Canadian Government permitted the Canadian Pacific to charge higher rates than were permitted in this so-called Crows Nest Pass agreement, but on July 7, 1923, it required a return to the rates which were made effective in 1899. Those rates applied principally from main-line points, and are those upon which the computations of the Tariff Commission above mentioned were made, and, of course, they are also the rates upon which the reduced rates from branch-line points to the Lakes made effective in September, 1927, were based.

At one of the hearings in the grain-rate investigations now being conducted by the commission a witness for the Great Northern Railway introduced an exhibit purporting to show the taxes per mile of road paid by the Great Northern in the States in which it operates as compared with the taxes paid by Canadian lines which operate immediately north of the Canadian border. According to this exhibit the taxes per mile in the States of Washington and Idaho are, respectively, $1,264 and $1,602, whereas in comparable parts in British Columbia the taxes of the Canadian lines per mile of road are shown as $301. The exhibit indicates that the Great Northern paid in the period covered by the exhibit taxes amounting to $9,280,137, whereas if the taxes had been at the same rate per mile of road as paid by the Canadian lines such taxes would have been $1,623,706. The difference of $7,656,431 represents 42 per cent of the gross revenue received by the Great Northern for transporting grain and grain products in the same period. In other words, the carrier contends that if its taxes were at the same rate as in Canada it could reduce its rates on grain to a basis as low or lower than that in force in Canada and still make as much net revenue as it now makes.

I do not, of course, vouch for the accuracy of the exhibit or for the deduction drawn therefrom by the carriers, but I am informed that its substantial accuracy was not questioned. If said exhibit does portray a true relative picture of the taxes paid in the United States and Canada, it would go a long way to explain the existing difference in rates in the two countries.

Pages 67 to 72 of the commission's annual report to the Congress for the year 1927 contain an outline of the investigations made by the commission under the Hoch-Smith resolution. As you can undoubtedly obtain a copy of that report from the Library of Congress if you do not already have it in your office, I will not attempt to reproduce that information in this letter. Since that report was issued hearings in all of the 11 parts therein mentioned have been proceeding as rapidly as the commission's appropriation and staff permitted.

Very truly yours,

J. B. CAMPBELL, Chairman.

In the foregoing letter Chairman Campbell states that the general commodity price level now is about 50 per cent higher than in 1914, but I remind the commission that the primary market wheat price—the price received by the farmer in the State of Washington—has probably not averaged more than 25 per cent during the past several years above the pre-war price.

The railroad taxes referred to in this letter are assessed, collected, and expended by the towns, counties, and States through which the roads pass and, of course, can not be influenced in any way by act of Congress.

The following brief table of comparisons is vitally interesting:

Carload wheat rates in cents per 100 pounds in United States and Canada

Distance (miles)	To Portland, Oreg., from—	Rate per hundredweight
244	Walla Walla, Wash.	18½
265	Yakima, Wash.	21½

325	Connell, Wash.	21½
356	Lewiston, Idaho	24
611	Shoshone, Idaho	42
701	Twin Falls, Idaho	44

Wheat, fruits, and vegetables yield enormous revenues to the roads, but the rates are very burdensome to the growers. It seems a speedy, general adjustment of rates in the Pacific Northwest would be mutually beneficial to agriculture and to the roads.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes at my disposal I shall call the attention of the House to a little monkey business that is going on between the White House and the Capitol, and that has been going on ever since I have been here. The President comes in with a message and asks the Congress to do this, that, and the other. We start out to do these things, and we spend money on them. Then there is a howl from the White House, and it is generally the congressional leaders on the Republican side who lead the pack in the House protesting against the expenditure of the money. That is hypocrisy and political bunkum of the lowest order. The other day one of the bulldogs of the Treasury in the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], read to the House a warning, in which he itemized certain problems that were going to be attended to by the Congress, and he pretended to be alarmed at the cost of them. I took occasion to read the message of the President one day when I did not have much else to do, and found that the President sent word to Congress that he wanted all of these things done. I am wondering whether the President expected these things to be attended to without the expenditure of money.

The President said something about flood control in this message. We passed a bill for flood control, and the President in conference with some distinguished statesmen put a "the" where an "a" should be and changed a comma to a semicolon, and the bill was thus so amended as to satisfy his idea of economy and was signed, with no substantial change in the bill at all. Notwithstanding this, the chairman of the Rules Committee was alarmed at the cost of flood control. Then the President said something about doing something about Muscle Shoals. We tried to do something about Muscle Shoals, and the gentleman from New York again was alarmed. Then we have Boulder Dam, with the same thing occurring, and also with respect to the Virginia Road, and the same thing also in respect to the vocational education bill. The President wanted something done about farm relief. Of course, we hear about that in every session of Congress. Then there is the good roads bill. The President had a message on that, too. He also said something about the Clark memorial, and yet on May 8 the chairman of the Committee on Rules takes a fling at Congress because Congress tried to do something about this program that the President sent to Congress, which he said we ought to take care of.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. Can the gentleman from New York point out to the House any message from the leading Democratic candidate for the Presidency with reference to farm relief, Muscle Shoals, or any other national problem except prohibition?

Mr. BLACK of New York. I will say that when the leading Democratic candidate of the Democratic Party becomes President there will be cooperation between the White House and the Capitol, and when the leading Democratic candidate becomes President, when he sends a message to this Congress, he will mean it. During his service as Governor of the State of New York he has sent messages to the legislature and has made a Republican legislature do things that were desired by the people, whereas the President in the White House now, in his six years' service, has not succeeded in doing anything to make the Congress follow his leadership.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLACK of New York. I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of speaking until the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] misstated the effect of the flood control bill, which he says was approved by the President with no substantial change in the bill after its passage by the House. A week's effort to expose the viciousness of the bill as it passed the Senate and House appears to have been wasted in seeking to enlighten him. Anyone familiar with the facts knows that the bill as changed and modified will save the Federal Government several hundred millions of dollars, depending in amount upon the exact plan hereafter adopted. Possibly the gentleman from New York was not present during consideration of the bill, and that may account for his error.

I will not repeat what has been set forth in the RECORD beyond a brief correction of his statement that should not go unchallenged. The flood control bill was before the House committee for about five months, during which time over 300 witnesses were heard. A bill was reported out by the House committee, but opposed by six Republican members of the committee. Their minority report disclosed many unjust provisions in the bill which would cost the Federal Government $1,400,000,000 instead of $325,000,000 carried in the bill, or a billion dollars more than the camouflaged amount named in the bill. These figures were actual estimates reported by Army engineers. I was a member of that minority.

The flood control bill was not pressed for passage in the House, but immediately thereafter the Senate committee held brief hearings on a Senate flood control bill and this bill was rushed through the Senate with less than two hours' discussion, passing the Senate unanimously, carrying $325,000,000, although its estimated cost by engineering experts reached over a billion dollars. After passing the Senate in order to influence House action that had been halted by the minority report disclosures, the Senate bill with modifications was hurriedly reported by the House committee. That bill was debated by the House for over a week's time and its viciousness and extravagance was exposed so that when the House voted on my motion to recommit the bill a total vote against the bill in favor of such motion reached 167, or far more than enough to sustain a veto. Additional support was assured for that emergency if necessary. This result, in view of its unanimous passage by the Senate and overwhelming sentiment at the outset in the House, was a surprise to those who expected to railroad the bill through Congress and override the President on a sympathy plea.

The flood control bill that passed the Senate and with slight modifications was reported to the House provided that the Federal Government must buy or condemn approximately 4,000,000 acres of land for flood ways or secure flowage rights. This it was estimated by Army engineers would cost the Government $200,000,000 or more based on the brief survey they had made. The House bill also compelled the Federal Government to buy all land along the Mississippi River that was overflowed because of Government levees on the other side of the river or else to secure flowage rights.

No estimate of this enormous cost could be offered by anyone because it was simply a blanket insurance of all land so affected along 1,000 miles of the river. Next under the bill the Federal Government was made liable for all costs of relocating railways and railway damages estimated by railroad engineers at over $71,000,000. Estimates of these and other costs reached anywhere from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 for flowage rights, damages, and other governmental liability under the bill.

This bill with slight changes, I believe, was voted for by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Then the Republican side of the House confesses extravagance on the flood control bill as originally introduced.

Mr. FREAR. I have stated the facts, although I voted against it; but, as to that, did not the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] vote for it, and did not all of the Tammany Democratic delegation from New York vote for it?

Mr. BLACK of New York. I did vote for that. I am glad to say I did it.

Mr. FREAR. That is what makes possible the enormous waste of which the gentleman from New York complains.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Republican side always does well when it follows the lead of progressive Republicans like the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. Let me say that no more valuable Member of the House can be found than my distinguished friend from New York, Major LAGUARDIA, and at this time I express my appreciation for his aid in exposing the objectionable features of the flood control bill when before the House, and in compelling its acceptance as finally passed. That exposé enabled the President to secure concessions which saved to the Federal Government several hundreds of millions of dollars, as first stated. The bill was so emasculated and expurgated by the conferees that its best friend would not have recognized it in the bill which finally received the President's signature and became law.

In a brief word, the 4,000,000-acre purchase of flood-way lands was eventually stricken from the bill. The unlimited damage to 1,000 miles of Mississippi River lands due to Government levees built on the opposite side of the river, was also finally stricken from the bill. In their stead is a modest provision that flowage damages must be beyond those of 1927 or of any other flood before the Government is responsible. It is estimated this will not cost the Government 2 per cent of the enormous land purchases proposed in the Senate and House bills, or far less than the annual interest charge on the bill as originally reported. It will save to the Federal Treasury from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000 or possibly over that amount. But this is not all. The $71,000,000 in the Senate and reported House bills for railway damages is also now stricken from the bill. To these changes should be added a nonpolitical commission, unlike the Senate body, that now should arrive at an uninfluenced judgment in recommending a flood-control plan. The President and not the commission is to determine acceptance of the plan. A right to offset benefits to land against the limited flowage area as now anticipated and a provision that declares a policy of one-third contribution for all future flood-control projects are other important changes.

I repeat the Mississippi flood control bill passed by the Senate and House bears slight resemblance to the sheared and scoured measure accepted by the President after it had been cut down and radically changed by the Attorney General, Chief of Engineers, and other advisers.

Not one necessary or important part of the bill is missing, for every essential feature remains with an ultimate reduction on the 10-year $1,000,000,000 to $1,500,000,000 estimated project in the bill as passed by the Senate and House to an amount not greatly in excess of $325,000,000 originally named for the project.

I assume the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] was not familiar with the course of the flood control bill or he would not have sought to make political capital out of a bill for which he voted. I rarely seek to draw political lessons from financial legislation, because party lines are not always well defined and political liability is second to official responsibility, but I call attention to the fact that of the 167 votes on my motion to recommit the bill which thus saved several hundred million dollars to the Federal Treasury at a minimum estimate, over 160 votes were from Republican Members, including every Member from my own State, while of the Members willing to swallow the billion dollar bill as first submitted, practically every Democratic Member, with two or three exceptions, voted for the full limit.

These included the entire Tammany Democratic delegation from New York as stated, with possibly one or two exceptions. Whatever restrictions and savings were accomplished by the week's fight against the reported bill belong entirely to Republicans who made certain a vote that would sustain a presidential veto.

During the last Democratic control of the House a decade ago I devoted much work in exposing different "pork barrels" with the Federal Treasury furnishing the cash that went into needless uncommercial waterways and public buildings. Several of these bills were blocked in the House or Senate, but if the hopes of the gentleman from New York and of his party colleagues are realized in the next House or if the next administration should be Democratic, I point to their last record as a warning of what may be looked for in the future.

This is not a prediction, but is in answer to any attempt to minimize the change in amount and character wrought in the Mississippi flood control bill as finally passed by Congress. No measure in recent years has approached that bill in importance and no greater improvement has ever been brought about during my experience by an unyielding, courageous, constructive minority than is found in that same bill as finally passed by Congress. Everyone believes in flood control, but in addition to eliminating vicious, extravagant provisions and reducing the cost of flood control to a comparatively low figure, opportunities for graft, pork, and waste have been reduced to a minimum in the bill as finally passed.

I submit that it was well worth the effort.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I saw an article in this morning's Post by George Rothwell Brown. I heartily agree with the sentiment expressed in this little squib. It is as follows:

> The spilling of the blood of more marines in Nicaragua leads to the conclusion that if this isn't a war we'd better get out, and that if it is, we'd better send down a force large enough to win it.

I do not intend to launch into a severe criticism of the administration's Caribbean policy, although I am not at all satisfied with it. I want to be fair, knowing we have certain duties and responsibilities that we must, as a Nation, discharge so long as we maintain the Monroe doctrine. Yet it would seem this could be done in a more satisfactory manner than by pursuing the present policy. I was hopeful that the International Conference of America recently held at Habana, Cuba, would accomplish something in the way of a treaty or arrangement whereby the United States could be taken into good fellowship with the other nations in this hemisphere.

There have been a great many speeches made in both branches of Congress within the past three months severely criticizing the administration's policy in Nicaragua. It is an easy matter to criticize. In fact, this is a Nation of critics. This is especially true in a presidential election year. It is one thing to criticize and altogether another thing to offer constructive criticism.

That our policy in the Caribbean is unpopular in Latin-America is stating it mildly. It is unpopular even in the United States among the masses. The press throughout the Nation, regardless of political affiliation, complains bitterly of our policy in Nicaragua. The Latin-American press denounces such a policy in the most vehement manner, and the press in other foreign countries refers to the policy as our dollar diplomacy.

As a Nation we have certain obligations to meet. We must protect American lives and property in foreign lands. That does not mean, however, that as a Nation we are to follow the adventurer into a foreign land with an army to protect him and his property. There is a limit to which our country has to go to carry out the doctrine of protection to American life and property. So long as we adhere to the Monroe doctrine we have still another obligation to meet. It is unnecessary for me to explain that doctrine, which is or should be familiar to all, even the school children of this country. European nations have interests in most, if not all, of the Latin-American countries. They also have an obligation to meet in protecting the lives and property of their nationals in the South and Central American countries, but the Monroe doctrine forbids an aggressive move on the part of any nation foreign to this hemisphere toward any of the Latin-American Republics. Therefore, under certain circumstances we are compelled to assume that responsibility or else abandon the Monroe doctrine. I am a firm believer in the Monroe doctrine, for it was established, not alone for the protection of the weaker nations of this hemisphere but also for the protection of the United States. It declares:

> Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early state of the wars which so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is, not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the government de facto the legitimate government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it; and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy, meeting in all instances the just claims of every power, submitting to injuries from none. But in regard to these continents circumstances are eminently and conspicuously different. It is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can anyone believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference.

It can be seen that the statesmen of this Nation at the time the Monroe doctrine was established recognized the fact that if the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of this continent, it would endanger our peace and happiness. It denies the right of any foreign power to establish or extend a system to any part of this hemisphere which might be considered dangerous to our safety. It also was intended as a safeguard to the South and Central American countries from foreign aggression.

It is plain, however, that the Monroe doctrine confers no power upon the United States to interfere with the internal affairs of any other country. This was so declared by Monroe himself within a short time after its adoption. He said:

> The new states are settling down under their governments, elective and representative, in every branch similar to our own. In this their career, however, we have not interfered, believing that every people have the right to institute for themselves the government which in their judgment may suit them best.

A more recent interpretation of the Monroe doctrine was made by that eminent lawyer and statesman, Mr. Root, in which he said:

> The declaration of Monroe was that the rights and interests of the United States were involved in maintaining a condition, and the condition to be maintained was the independence of all the American countries. * * * A false conception of what the Monroe doctrine is, of what it demands, and what it justifies, of its scope, and of its limits has invaded the public press and affected public opinion within the past few years. Grandiose schemes of national expansion invoke the Monroe doctrine. Interested motives to compel Central or South American countries to do or refrain from doing something by which individual Americans may profit invoke the Monroe doctrine. Clamors for national glory from minds too shallow to grasp at the same time a sense of national duty invoke the Monroe doctrine. The intolerance which demands that control over the conduct and the opinions of other peoples, which is the essence of tyranny, invokes the Monroe doctrine. Thoughtless people who see no difference between lawful right and physical power assume that the Monroe doctrine is a warrant for interference in the internal affairs of all weaker nations in the New World. Against this suppositious doctrine many protests, both in the United States and in South America, have been made, and justly made. To the real Monroe doctrine these protests have no application.

It is clear that we have no right to interfere with the internal affairs of any of our southern neighbors by reason of anything that appears in the Monroe doctrine, which simply declares that the European nations shall keep their hands off of the Latin-American countries; but in no sense does it provide that the United States shall exercise powers and authority not therein specifically provided. We should frankly admit that just so long as we insist upon a strict adherence to the Monroe doctrine on the part of foreign nations, there are certain and well-defined obligations that must be met by this Nation.

The most serious question, to my mind, is what is the best plan or method of meeting these obligations. It is unnecessary for me to reiterate that our policy in Nicaragua at this time is losing us that friendship, respect, and confidence of our Latin-American neighbors. It seems to me this could be obviated. I realize that it would never do to advocate a League of Nations of this hemisphere, because it would be misinterpreted if for no other reason than a political one. But there should be a coalition of all of the American nations, calling it by any name—Pan American Union or Association of American Nations, it matters not what it may be called, just so articles of agreement may be entered into whereby when it becomes necessary to police any one of such nations by outside forces, then all of the other nations shall be consulted as to the policy or manner in which it shall be done. I am confident that if this Nation should invite Central and South American nations to join with us in policing any incorrigible state, whether it be Nicaragua, as at this time, or some of the others in the future, it would be well received on the part of those countries. It was a great disappointment to many that such an arrangement did not materialize at the Habana meeting.

Now that we are in Nicaragua there is no doubt but that we shall have to remain until the present difficulty is settled. However, with the present trouble settled we should not assume that it will not be soon repeated either in Nicaragua or some one of the other countries; so why not prepare for the next difficulty by formulating some kind of a coalition of these countries whereby all of the American nations can be taken into consultation, and by so doing establish a feeling of friendship, respect, and confidence, instead of jealousy and suspicion, which now exists. Certainly this can be done without the United States having to surrender any of its prerogatives or powers it now rightfully possesses.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] in order that he may answer my question.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the pending bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it is particularly gratifying to me to vote for this bill, H. R. 13873, a bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and prior fiscal years; to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1928, and June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, for the reason that on page 78 there is an item reading:

New Orleans (La.) quarantine station: For commencement of construction on a site owned by the Government of a new quarantine station, together with necessary auxiliary structures and facilities, outside service lines, and approach work, $150,000, under an estimated total cost of $425,000. This item is written into the deficiency appropriation bill under the authorization contained in section 5 of the public buildings act approved May 25, 1926.

From the time I first came to Congress I have worked with all of the energy that I could throw into the work for the purpose of securing a quarantine station and a marine hospital for the city of New Orleans and a light ship off the entrances of the Mississippi River. I think that I can say with pardonable pride, in view of my intense interest in the subject of public buildings that were needed all over the United States, and particularly in New Orleans, as a result of the cessation of building during the war and for several years thereafter, that my addresses on the subject on the floor of the House, my reminders to the country of the deplorable conditions that existed in the marine hospital particularly, tended to stimulate and accelerate the movement that led to the passage of the act of 1926, the first great constructive measure of legislation on the subject of public buildings and their construction in the United States. I will always remember with profound pleasure the interest I succeeded in arousing in the subject after I had spoken upon the Washington-Lincoln Memorial Bridge on the day that measure was under consideration. I was assured by any number of friends that that modest speech was going to produce some result. I hope it did for I will always feel that it is an honor to be associated in the most insignificant manner with an act that took the construction of public buildings out of the field and realm of the pork-barrel scheme of legislation, whereby political influence and not necessity made for the location of Federal buildings. That act, I repeat, has made for the construction of buildings where they would serve a useful purpose, where they are needed. That act unquestionably is the harbinger to other acts that must follow as a consequence of the merit which is so clearly to be seen to-day in such legislation. Some day we will arrive legislatively to the common-sense and therefore intellectual height to make lump-sum appropriations annually for the improvement of our waterways with a mandate to the engineers whose force should be increased to make for expeditiousness in the work that lies in the future to go ahead and improve the rivers in a scientific manner instead of in accordance with the system that prevails to-day, which makes for the adoption of projects that are unrelated to each other and therefore prevents that development which would make for a perfect waterway transportation system.

In no other way can we make our great rivers and their tributaries the wonderful assets they should be to this Republic. But that is another story, as Kipling says. To return to our mutton, as the French proverb has it. When the movement was first started for a public-buildings program in 1924 I joined in the movement enthusiastically and most hopefully. I knew that New Orleans had a claim for a marine hospital and quarantine station and a lightship that no commission or governmental agency that might be created could ignore. We had the facts, and facts are the truth, and I knew that "ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free" could be relied upon to vindicate and make triumphant our demands for the treatment to which we were entitled. I knew from the attention given to my feeble efforts on the floor of the House when I recited in simple language the wretched, dilapidated, and antiquated conditions that existed at the marine hospital; how our sailors who served our country on ships that went into every port in the world were crowded into fire traps—wooden structures that would be a disgrace to Haiti; how the Government, a great, proud, opulent Government, ignored business and maintained a quarantine system that would be deemed to be obsolete in Patagonia; I knew, I repeat, from the profound interest manifested that similar conditions existed in other parts of the country and that a movement would soon be strong enough to pass any well-thought-out bill through the House. To the chagrin and disappointment of the advocates of the first House bill, that of 1925, it failed in the Senate. I was one of the House Members that vainly endeavored to persuade Members of the Senate to pass the bill because it was a trail blazer and would mark for the wonders which have been accomplished under it. But the leaven that leavened the lump was at work. Public opinion—the mightiest factor in the life of the Republic; substantially the highest law of the land spoke in no uncertain tone—authoritatively decreed that procrastination should come to an end, so that the next year the bill of 1926 became the law.

I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that my work in some small way with that of my colleagues who voted for the bill of 1925, though it failed, marked the way for the act of 1926. That paved the way for the amendment of 1927. Under the amended act the country will erect buildings wherever they are needed, and the scandalous manner in which they were constructed a number of years ago will be regarded only as an episode in the life of a country which had to undergo its growing pains and pass through the hectic period of youth. Before I close, Mr. Speaker, I would again call the attention of the House to the fact that the best way to meet months of depression or cycles, as they are called, is by a coordination in the performance of all public works by the Federal, State, county, and municipal Governments throughout the United States. In other words, in slack times the full force of all of these governmental activities should be utilized for the purpose of taking up the slack resulting from depression in commercial and industrial operations. No bigger task confronts the statesmen than to solve the problem of meeting unemployment, which saddens the faces of millions of men, writes the lines of care on the woman's brow, and puts the haunting look of "why?" in the eyes of children just beginning to understand their parents' woe at the thought that on to-morrow the bread chest will be empty.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional amount for the erection of a four-room extensible building in Potomac Heights, fiscal year 1928, $24,000.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD: On page 10, in line 11, after the word "Heights," strike out "fiscal year 1928."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The sum of $11,000 of the appropriation of $37,250 for the purchase of school-building and playground sites, contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1928, is made available for the acquisition of land in the vicinity of the Peabody School in accordance with the final award in condemnation proceedings, without limitation as to price based on assessed value.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIMMONS: On page 11, after line 17, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to employ a consulting landscape architect under the appropriation of $250,000 for treatment of grounds of the Langley Junior High School and the McKinley High School, contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1929, at a cost not to exceed $1,500, which amount shall be included as a part of the 3 per cent of said appropriation allowed the municipal architect's office for personal services."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Nebraska state why the office of Colonel Grant could not furnish all of that labor?

Mr. SIMMONS. We are expending on those high-school sites between two and three million dollars. The municipal architect asked for this authorization, and I believe it is one that is justified.

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield to the gentleman's judgment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND PUBLIC PARKS

Park police: For an additional amount for pay and allowances of the United States park police, in accordance with the act approved May 27, 1924, as amended, fiscal year 1929, $6,700.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NEWTON: On page 17, line 5, after the figures "$6,700" insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

"National Zoological Park: For construction and equipment of necessary exhibition cages and walks around the exterior of public exhibition building for birds, fiscal years 1928 and 1929, $30,000."

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, this item is for the purpose of finally completing the bird house at the Zoo. I understand it is acceptable to the chairman of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF FISHERIES

Fish distribution car: For the purchase or construction of a steel car for the distribution of useful food fishes, including the necessary equipment, $60,000, to remain available until June 30, 1929.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANHAM: On page 24, line 5, after the figures "1929," insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"That portion of the appropriation, miscellaneous expenses, Bureau of Fisheries, 1927, which was made available for a fish-cultural station at Lake Worth, Tex., shall continue available for such purpose during the fiscal year 1929."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 4, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to return to page 4, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, the urgency for getting this bill through is such that I am obliged to object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Michaud division, Fort Hall Indian Reservation, Idaho: To carry out the provisions of an act entitled "An act authorizing an appropriation for the survey and investigation of the placing of water on the Michaud division and other lands in the Fort Hall Indian Reservation," approved March 28, 1928, fiscal years 1928 and 1929, $25,000 (reimbursable).

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Mexico offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MORROW: On page 30, line 4, insert a new paragraph:

"Middle Rio Grande conservancy project, New Mexico: For payments to the Middle Rio Grande conservancy district, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled 'An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to execute an agreement with the Middle Rio Grande conservancy district providing for conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood control for the Pueblo Indian lands in the Rio Grande Valley, N. Mex., and for other purposes,' approved March 13, 1928, fiscal year 1929, $100,000 (reimbursable)."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORROW. I yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. The contract between the Government and the conservancy district authorized by the act referred to has not yet been signed and therefore our committee could not give consideration to that contract and the extent to which it conformed with the act.

It is the understanding of the gentleman and his expectation that if this appropriation is given now, and I know there is some urgency requiring it, that when the next appropriation comes along next December, the committee will not be estopped, but it will be expected that the committee will make a study of the situation and of the contract that will then have been entered into.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I will say my understanding was that everything concerning that contract had been practically complied with before the gentleman who represented the district left for New Mexico, but something arose afterwards concerning the same and I had a conversation with the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs to-day in which he says it is perfectly satisfactory. This amount was approved by the Budget, went to the President, and I was assured up until this morning, when I got the bill, that it was in the bill, and I was surprised when the bill came out without this item being included.

Mr. CRAMTON. With the understanding I have suggested I would have no objection to the gentleman's item, and I am sure the committee would not.

Mr. MORROW. It will be carried out without any question.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Crop damage, Isleta Pueblo, N. Mex.: Indian pueblos, New Mexico: For payment of damages to crops and improvements destroyed in constructing the Isleta drainage canal, fiscal years 1928 and 1929, $161.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not want to make a nuisance of myself. Sometimes I do, although I do not intend it.

I want to make an appeal to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], if he will give me his attention. A few moments ago by action of the committee we increased certain salaries of employees of the House, and properly so. I understand the bill also provides a timely and proper increase for the pay of the reporters. A few years ago we increased our own salaries. This leaves the salaries of the executive officers of the House of Representatives entirely out of proportion to the salaries of the employees and the salaries of the Members.

I have prepared a little amendment. I do not believe it will meet with the objection of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropirations. I do not believe there is any opposition to it from the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Tennessee. I am sure it meets with the approval both of the majority floor leader and if I may say so, the Speaker of the House, with whom I have just talked. This being so, it is a rather simple matter. It does not involve any legislation that will require a great deal of study.

May I appeal to the gentleman from Michigan to withdraw his objection and permit me to ask unanimous censent to go back to page 4 and insert this item?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, of course the gentleman has the right to appeal, but let me say this to the gentleman: There are certain items that were gone into carefully by the subcommittee on the legislative bill.

They have been carefully investigated. An appeal was made on the floor for certain other employees when the legislative bill was up. At that time I made a point of order for the reason that there had been no preliminary investigation by any committee. I suggested that every employee around the Capitol had some Member to speak for him, and if you once started there would be no place to stop. So I made the point of order. There has been a further investigation made as to employees. I did not think it wise to put them in to-day but, because there has been an opportunity for investigation and study, and feeling that they ought to be put in, I did not make objection.

Now, the gentleman from New York suggests that some other employees whose cases no committee has given any study or consideration to, and right now on each side of me have been forming lines of Members of the House awaiting an opportunity to make an appeal for their employees if the gentleman from New York is successful; because I think there is no other place to stop it except right here I am going to object. If the gentleman would offer the amendment I should make the point of order, so there is no object in going back.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I realize my helplessness unless I have the gentleman's good will.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman from New York has my good will.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired, and the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, fees, and expenses of marshals, United States courts: For salaries, fees, and expenses of United States marshals and their deputies, including the same objects specified under this head in the act making appropriations for the Department of Justice for the fiscal year 1924, $1,861.35.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLACK of New York: Page 40, line 2, after the figures "$1,861.35," insert the following: "Provided, That such marshals and deputy marshals shall not be employed to serve or enforce injunction orders against the officers of a municipality or a State in matters affecting the rates of public utilities."

Mr. WOOD. To that Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. WOOD. No; I make it.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I want to be heard, Mr. Chairman, on the point of order. I am offering this amendment for the sole purpose of keeping the marshals and their deputies within the proper sphere of their duty. It is my contention that the Federal Government should not through the executive branch, to wit, the marshals under the Department of Justice, interfere with the State officials trying to maintain the laws of the States. If I may be permitted to give a concrete example——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires that the gentleman confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I want to limit the marshals of the United States courts where the court has taken jurisdiction without warrant under the Constitution. There is one case that comes to my mind where the court took jurisdiction on an ex parte application in the middle of the night. I do not want such action in the executive branch of the Government stepping into a State or a city with the strength of the United States back of them and interfering with local laws and regulations.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's amendment is a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair considers the amendment as a direct instruction in the form of legislation and sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman spoke five minutes on the point of order without saying anything about the point of order.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I do not think the Chairman of the committee wants to keep me from speaking on the merits of the amendment for five minutes.

Mr. WOOD. I do not want to object, but I do want to get along, because we want to finish this bill to-night.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I will not take but three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I want to call attention to the situation that confronts this Government in the city of New York.

For years in New York they have been charging on the subways a 5-cent fare under a contract between the people of the city of New York and the transit companies. We have courts in New York to which the transit companies could go, were there any proper question concerning the contracts. The transit companies of New York have gone into the Federal jurisdiction and on motion a statutory court was created, and the opinion was handed down by that court against the 5-cent fare, and to read the opinion you would think that it was written by the transit companies' lawyers.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It was.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I am vouchsafed some information by the gentleman from New York that I did not have. The people of the city of New York are concerned about this situation. They resent the Federal court interfering with this matter. We have had bills here to give us more judges in the Federal courts in New York upon the theory that they had too much work to do now. They have enough work within their own proper jurisdiction. The State courts of New York were there for the transit companies to appeal to. They should not summarily have gone into the Federal courts to try out this proposition. There is a general resentment throughout the country against the Federal courts becoming rate-making bodies. We have in each State utility commissions to pass upon the question of rates, because these commissions can give the time required for a proper study of this question. This statutory court in New York, on papers filed by both sides, without going into the evidence, came to the conclusion that the 5-cent fare contract proposition is confiscatory. I have not the time to go into the entire question now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "$1,861.31" and insert in lieu thereof "$61.35."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 40, line 2, strike out "$1,861.31" and insert "$61.35."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, it may appear unseemly that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] and myself should take this time when the committee is anxious to adjourn, but this encroachment of the Federal court in New York City on the powers of the State courts and interferences in the rights of the city is so vital to 6,000,000 people in New York, so vital to the confidence that the American people should have in the Federal courts, that this House can not spend too much time on the question. It will be squarely before you sooner or later. There is not a lawyer in this House but will agree that the Federal Government either by legislation or through its courts can not interfere in the rights of contract. It is guaranteed in the Constitution that no law shall impair such rights. We are operating in New York City with the Interborough Co. on a contract that is 15 years old. This company applied to the Legislature of the State of New York to amend the law, so as to permit them to change their contract. During my time at the city hall they made an application to the board of estimates for the modification of that contract.

They have appealed to the State courts time and time again, and yet after going to the State legislature seeking a modification of the contract, after themselves insisting when they were making huge profits that it was a valid contract, after going to the city government seeking a modification of the contract, after appealing to the State courts time and time again to get away from that contract, they went to the Federal court and found three judges that were willing to do the dirty work for the grafting exploiters of the Interborough. We can not help becoming indignant about this. As my colleague from

New York [Mr. BLACK] stated, this was granted on paper, and when I say that the lawyers of the transit company wrote the opinion, the gentleman from New York knows and others may be convinced by simply taking the brief of the transit lawyers and comparing it with the opinion of the court. It is easy to find where the court got its law. The situation in New York City is serious. It is very serious. It is not necessary to be a constitutional lawyer to know that the Federal courts, these so-called statutory courts, have gone beyond their powers. Every strap hanger in New York knows it. I tell you it is going to make a very bad impression upon the people of the country when 6,000,000 people refuse to obey the order of the court, because the people of New York will never pay the extra 2 cents on this outrageous decision, improperly obtained. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Damage claims: To pay claims for damages adjusted and determined by the Secretary of the Navy under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to amend the act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to settle claims for damages to private property arising from collisions with naval vessels," approved December 28, 1922, as fully set forth in House Documents Nos. 271 and 296, Seventieth Congress, $25,741.22.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the bill be considered as read. We have it before us, and it will take a good deal of time to read it. I suggest that the amendments be offered and then pass the bill. Let the bill be considered as having been read, and print it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho wishes to offer amendment a little later on.

Mr. EDWARDS. Very well. I will withhold my request.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ammunition storage facilities, Navy: Toward providing ammunition storage facilities in accordance with the recommendations contained in House Document No. 199, Seventieth Congress, fiscal years 1928 and 1929, $1,193,998, of which sum $638,998 shall be available for the acquisition of land, and $80,000 shall be available for the employment of classified personal services in the Bureau of Yards and Docks and in the field to be engaged upon such work and to be in addition to employees otherwise provided for.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENCH: Page 47, after line 2, in lieu of the matter appearing in lines 3 to 12 both inclusive, insert the following:

"Ammunition storage facilities, Navy: Toward providing ammunition storage facilities in accordance with the recommendations contained in House Document No. 199, Seventieth Congress (and the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into contract or contracts for such facilities at a cost in the aggregate not to exceed $9,179,500, which amount will include the establishment and development of a naval ammunition depot in the vicinity of Hawthorne, Nev., at a total cost not to exceed $3,500,000, the establishment and development of a naval ammunition depot in the Territory of Hawaii, at a total cost not to exceed $3,540,000, and the replacement of storage facilities at the Naval Station, Cavite, P. I., subject to and in conformity with the treaty limiting naval armament, ratified August 17, 1923), $1,193,998, of which sum $638,998 shall be available for the acquisition of land, and $80,000 shall be available for the employment of classified personal services in the Bureau of Yards and Docks and in the field to be engaged upon such work and to be in addition to employees otherwise provided for."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I renew my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to consider the bill as having been read and to print it in the RECORD.

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman will just withhold a moment, we wish to offer another amendment.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I withhold my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

St. Louis, Mo., courthouse, customhouse, etc.: Toward the acquisition of a site and construction of a building in lieu of carrying out the authorization in the act of July 3, 1926, $600,000, in addition to the unexpended balance of any money heretofore appropriated for that purpose, which is hereby made available, under an estimated total cost of $3,825,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to enter into a contract or contracts for the entire foregoing estimated cost of such project: Provided, That any cost in excess of $1,600,000 shall be charged against the $100,000,000 authorized in section 5 of the public buildings act approved May 25, 1926, as amended.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, the bill carries an item of $3,825,000 for a new Federal building in St. Louis. Construct this building and over $5,000,000 will be received by the Government when the present customshouse, erected in 1884, the appraiser's stores building, erected in 1859, and a vacant lot belonging to the Government are sold.

Then, again, when this new building is constructed the Government will save annually over $62,000 it is now paying in rents to house Government agencies in St. Louis. The exact figure for the present fiscal year is $62,762. This explanation alone should satisfy the House the proposal carried here for the St. Louis building is a good business proposition.

The people of St. Louis found it hard to understand why the Government will not put back in a public building in our city the amount it will receive when the present holdings are disposed of. This has been explained by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carl T. Schuneman, to the satisfaction of the civic organizations of St. Louis and if the Department keeps its promises, which I am sure it will do.

St. Louis, my friends, is now engaged in beautifying the city. A bond issue was passed several years ago which provides for an expenditure of $87,000,000. A large amount of this money is being spent in constructing public buildings and creating a plaza in front of our union station. I predict in three years St. Louis will look like a new city to the visitor. Therefore you will fully understand why we want the Government to erect a building of a type which will coincide with the municipal program.

Mr. Schuneman has promised us a monumental type of building six or seven stories high, so constructed as to enable the Government, if necessity demands, to erect additional stories. He has promised us a building which will be a credit to the Government and one of which St. Louis will be proud.

This proposition means a great deal to St. Louis. It so happens the Government owns the most valuable block of ground in St. Louis, the block now occupied by the present Federal building, Eighth, Ninth, Olive to Locust Streets. Upon this site was erected in 1884 one of the most substantial public buildings constructed by the Government up to that time. It cost over $5,000,000. It is built of granite, 4 feet thick, and there are two basements. The granite, I am told, is used from the lower basement up. At that time it was used as the main post office, as well as for the courts and other Government agencies. When that building is sold the purchaser will be required to construct a building which will equal in size any structure in our city in order to secure a fair return on his investment. It is expected the Government will realize from four and one-half to five and one-half million dollars when the sale is arranged. The trains that cross the famous Eads Bridge, which spans the Mississippi River at the foot of Washington Avenue, enter a tunnel which passes directly alongside of the eastern boundary of this site.

Many suggestions have been offered as to what use it will be put, some contending it will make an ideal location for a downtown railroad station, which we do not now have. A suggestion has been advanced to arrange construction so that suburban trains will be brought to this point, thus discharging passengers in the heart of the business district, and not 15 blocks distant, as is now the case. We hope that when we see the plans for this new building they will prove satisfactory to all, but in the event we do not receive a building of the type to which we feel we are entitled I say now we will be back asking that this appropriation be increased.

Below will be found a table prepared by the Supervising Architect:

I withdraw the pro forma amendment. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Okmulgee, Okla., post office, courthouse, etc.: For acquisition of site and commencement of construction, $75,000, under an estimated total cost of $330,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to know that the claims of Okmulgee for a public building to house her Federal activities are at last to be realized. Okmulgee is one of the splendid, populous, growing, progressive cities of the new State of Oklahoma. It has a population of more than 30,000 and I am sure that before this building is completed its population will exceed 50,000.

It is the center of a large oil area and in every direction oil derricks delight the eye. Perhaps there are fewer dry wells found in that vicinity than in any other area.

In the southern part of the county there are great quantities of coal. The oil, gas, and coal has invited factories to that section and in the near future it is expected that Okmulgee will be one of the great industrial centers as it is now one of the commercial centers in eastern Oklahoma.

In addition, Okmulgee is surrounded and supported by the very best agricultural land that is to be found in the Middle West.

The authorization of this building is the realization of an effort that I have been making since I first came to Congress. We have always been able to present such a showing that the committee has at each session made a favorable report, but we have not passed an omnibus public building bill since 1913, and I was first elected in 1914.

Okmulgee was made a Federal court place through an amendment which I offered to the bill in February, 1925. This justified a larger building. The population has increased rapidly and the postal receipts are in excess of $100,000. It is the fourth city in population in Oklahoma.

In addition to housing the post office and Federal court the building will care for a larger number of agricultural employees, Indian Service, and numerous other governmental activities. For several years past public-spirited citizens have been contributing from their own means to the payment of rent for a building to house the post office. I am glad to know that this financial burden is to be lifted and soon to be borne by the Government.

Okmulgee is entitled to a building that is not only attractive but one that will care for the future needs of all governmental activities. [Applause.]

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sterling, Colo., post office, courthouse, etc.: For commencement of construction of the building, $50,000, under an estimated total cost, except for the courts, of $100,000: Provided, That such building shall be so constructed that accommodations for the courts may be added later.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 83, line 12, strike out "$100,000" and insert "$120,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TREADWAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13873) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1928, and June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, reported that that committee had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Clerk will report them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WOOD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DR. WALTER REED

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the life and character of Dr. Walter Reed and include therein a speech made by Col. J. Randolph Kean, of the United States Army, now retired, delivered at the birthplace of Walter Reed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Walter Reed was a world hero whose work brought immeasurable blessing to mankind.

On Saturday, October 15, 1927, there was dedicated at Belroi, Gloucester County, Va., the birthplace of Dr. Walter Reed. The house in which Doctor Reed was born is still standing, and it has been restored as nearly as possible to the same condition that it was in when Doctor Reed was born there on the 13th day of September, 1851. His father was a minister of the Methodist Church and was stationed on the Gloucester circuit at the time of Walter Reed's birth.

This property was purchased by the Walter Reed Memorial Commission for the encouragement of research work upon the direction of the Medical Society of Virginia. Funds were raised by popular subscription. The house has been restored, and when sufficient funds have been raised it is intended to complete the restoration of the entire property, to furnish it in keeping with the period when Doctor Reed was born, to inclose the property, to plant shrubs and flowers, and to preserve the property as a national shrine in such condition as to make it a fitting memorial to the hero who was born there.

At the dedication on October 15, 1927, there was delivered a notable address by Col. Jefferson Randolph Kean, Medical Corps, United States Army, retired, editor of the Military Surgeon, Washington, D. C., former chief surgeon at Gen. Fitzhugh Lee's headquarters in Cuba when Doctor Reed's experiments were conducted. Colonel Kean was an intimate friend of Dr. Walter Reed and had personal knowledge of Doctor Reed's work. His speech is a valuable historical contribution to the life, character, and service of Doctor Reed and deserves preservation in the records of the Congress of the country which Doctor Reed served with such distinction and upon which he reflected such glory by his contribution to humanity.

I have sought and obtained permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing the speech made by Colonel Kean at the dedication of Dr. Walter Reed's birthplace.

Colonel Kean said:

Ladies and gentlemen, in the lives of great men two places have in all ages and among all peoples had a peculiar interest and sacred quality—that where they are born and that where, when life is ended, their remains are laid to rest in the last sleep. It was my sad duty on a November day in 1902 to select the spot where Walter Reed should rest, on a beautiful hillside in Virginia overlooking the Potomac and the Capitol, in that silent city where the soldier dead of the Republic sleep in their thousands in the consecrated fields that once belonged to the great captain, Robert Lee. I feel it therefore a great privilege and honor to be present also at this spot where Walter Reed was born.

Sir William Osler said in one of his addresses:

"Of the altruistic instincts, veneration is not the most highly developed at the present day; but I hold strongly with the statement that it is the sign of a dry age when the great men of the past are held in light esteem."

It is my hope and my belief that Virginia may never be dry in that sense.

To the Romans the word "pietas," which is our word piety, meant dutifulness, and it had reference not only to their attitude to their parents but to the spirits, or genii, of their dead and to the cult of the quaint little gods, the Lares and Penates, who presided over the family hearth and the domestic affairs. Their cult consisted in offerings of flowers or dainties from the table, and it has survived the ages in the offerings of flowers which we lay upon the graves of those we love.

It is to this Roman belief that he was always the object of observation and solicitude by spiritual beings which he had been taught to venerate that gave to the Roman character, in the opinion of Pater, its steadiness and regard for duty and dignity in all the affairs of life. I like to believe that we Virginians are in this sense a pious people, that we hold in high esteem the great men of the past, that in our lives we are not unmindful of them, and that we would like so to live as not to shame them. This is a cult which brings the great men of the past into our lives, and will perpetuate their virtues and reproduce their qualities. It is such a feeling I am sure which has crowded the fair capitol of this State with the statues of soldiers and statesmen, has made shrines at Mount Vernon and Monticello, and has impelled your State Medical Society to purchase this humble dwelling, and to dedicate it to the memory of the great man and choice spirit which here first saw the light of day.

Walter Reed was born on this spot September 13, 1851, the fifth and youngest child of Lemuel Sutton Reed and Pharaba White, his first wife. Lemuel Reed, though he spent his adult life in Virginia as a minister of the Gospel, was a North Carolinian by birth, and it was to the old North State that his now famous son went at the age of 25 to wed his chosen wife, Emilie Lawrence—the gracious lady whom we have with us here to-day.

Of the 26 years of his Army life, much of interest might be told did time permit, his varied experiences in his stations in the then far distant Arizona, in Nebraska, Alabama, Dakota, and posts farther west. It was not until 1893 that he became professor of bacteriology and clinical miscroscopy in the then newly organized Army Medical School and was able to devote himself to the special branch of medical science in which he attained enduring fame. But for this he had a year of preparation in 1890 when he was stationed in Baltimore and had the rare good fortune to study under that great scientist and grand old man, Dr. William H. Welch, now the Nestor of medical science in America. Never was opportunity more eagerly seized or more profitably pursued. Then was made the liaison between master and pupil which profoundly influenced and guided the 12 brief years of life which the fates then allotted to Reed. I can not now undertake the narrative of even these few years. We have for the story of his life Howard Kelly's admirable biography and many shorter sketches, with some of which each of you is doubtless familiar. I will therefore, if you will permit me, depart somewhat from the text which has been assigned me and give you some personal reminiscences of the man as I knew him and of his work in Cuba as it came under my observation. He had been my predecessor at Fort Robinson in the uttermost parts of Nebraska, and I had heard much of his professional skill and his devotion to his patients, not only those in the garrison but the poor pioneers who gained a miserable existence by the cultivation of those arid plains.

My first acquaintance with Walter Reed came in July, 1896, when he came to my station at Key West, Fla., attracted by an epidemic of smallpox which then afflicted the town. He wished to study a curious ameboid body which he had observed in the blood of children and of the Rhesus monkey after vaccination, in the hope that it might be the much-sought cause of smallpox. In the mornings we went to the smallpox hospital to take blood from the victims of that loathsome disease; the afternoons he spent over his microscope; and the evenings were passed on the broad veranda looking out over the tranquil bay or at the strange stars in the southern sky while he told with whimsical humor tales of his life in the West. Except for a few days that I was his guest in Washington, I did not see him again for two years when came the Spanish War and the fever camps of the South. A board was ordered with Major Reed at the head and Majs. Victor C. Vaughan and Edward O. Shakespeare, both distinguished in the medical profession, to study these fevers. They went from camp to camp, observed, studied, and advised. They showed how the diagnosis could be made between the milder typhoids and malarial fever, for which the former were so commonly mistaken. Thus I saw Reed again when the board came to Gen. Fitzhugh Lee's camp of the Seventh Army Corps at Jacksonville, where the most important hospital happened to be in my charge. The work lasted over a year, and their famous report, which shed a flood of light on the whole subject of the mode of spread of typhoid fever in camps, had not been completed when Reed was ordered to Cuba in 1900.

His first visit to Habana was in March when he came to investigate the use by the engineers of a disinfectant called electrozone, made by a patented process out of sea water. It was fondly hoped by many that the free use of this fluid on the streets of the city might banish diseases as well as smells and even disinfect the sewers and cespools. As may be imagined this procedure received small support from Reed and was promptly abandoned.

The yellow-fever board, or commission as it is usually called, was created by War Department order, May 24, 1900, and was composed of Maj. Walter Reed and three acting assistant surgeons—James Carroll, Aristides Agramonte, and Jesse W. Lazear. The two latter were already on duty in Cuba when Reed arrived there on June 25.

A severe epidemic was in progress in Habana and at the neighboring town of Marianao, where Gen. Fitzhugh Lee has his headquarters. He was in command of the two Provinces of Habana and Pinar del Rio, which include the western end of the island, but the city of Habana was excepted from his command and was under another general. Major Gorgas was the health officer of the city, and I was the chief surgeon of General Lee's command, and had sanitary control of the outside country. I had been taken with yellow fever on June 21 and was ill when Reed landed on the morning of June 25, and he hastened to visit me in the hospital at Camp Columbia. It pleases me to think that in my person he saw the first case of the dread disease with which his fame will be forever associated. The board was given quarters and laboratory space in a barracklike wooden building belonging to the hospital and some half mile from General Lee's headquarters.

The other members of the commission were capable and well-trained scientists.

James Carroll had risen from the ranks in the Army and by hard work and Reed's encouragement and assistance obtained his medical education. He had been for several years Reed's laboratory assistant.

Aristides Agramonte was born in Cuba during the 10 years' war in which his father, a Cuban officer, was killed in battle by the Spaniards. His family had refugeed in the United States, and he had been educated in New York. He had graduated from the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York in 1892 and at this time was in charge of the laboratory of the Division of Cuba in Habana. He is the only surviving member of the commission and has for many years been a distinguished professor in the school of medicine of the University of Habana. He has never received from the Government of the United States any honor or material reward for his share in the work of the commission.

Dr. Jesse W. Lazear, the fourth member of the commission, was a graduate of Johns Hopkins. He then studied medicine at Columbia and was a classmate of Agramonte's at the College of Physicians and Surgeons. After graduation he studied in Europe, part of the time at the Pasteur Institute. When he came to Cuba he was bacteriologist to the medical staff at Johns Hopkins Hospital and was assistant in clinical microscopy in the university. He spent much time in the study of malaria and was expert in work with mosquitoes.

It seems to me that the time has come and is long overdue when our Government should show its gratitude for the noble and beneficent work of these four men by an adequate and fitting provision for the families of those who died, and by suitable honors and material rewards for the one who survives.

The first work of the board was to study the Bacillus icteroides, which had been announced three years before by Sanarelli to be the cause of yellow fever. His claims were generally accepted and had been corroborated by two investigators, Wasdin and Giddings, of the Public Health Service of the United States, who had been at work in Habana since the American occupation of the city. Their claims had been disputed, however, by the findings of Agramonte, and the Reed board was instructed to decide the matter. And they did decide it, in a report so clear, thorough, and conclusive that, though hotly contested by both Wasdin and Sanarelli at the time, their conclusions have ever since stood unshaken.

It was then decided on August 1 to study the theory that yellow fever was conveyed by the mosquito. This theory had been advanced by several observers in preceding years, but its chief and, at that time, only proponent was Doctor Finley in Habana. He had written a paper 20 years before advancing this theory and giving good epidemiological evidence in support of it. He had even fixed on the variety of mosquito which was the criminal, and had made many efforts to transmit the disease by its agency. He claimed some successes, but these results seemed to be doubtful. The reasons for his failures, for we know now that they were all failures, were the same that defeated the efforts of Reed's board in the first weeks of their work.

Yellow fever had always been the most elusive and puzzling of diseases and had defeated the attempts of a multitude of able investigators to find out its secrets. A study of Lazear's wonderfully detailed and accurate notes, including the individual history of each of his mosquitoes, uncovered two traps:

The first is that the yellow-fever patient ceases to have the infective agent in his blood after the third day of the disease and can not infect mosquitoes after that time.

The second trap is that after the mosquito has bitten a case of yellow fever, even in the first three days, she is quite harmless for a period of incubation of 12 to 14 days, after which she becomes able to infect.

Now, it happens that in most cases yellow fever in the first three days is much like malaria and other fevers, and it is only about the third day that the patient begins to take on the characteristic yellow tinge and the diagnosis becomes certain. So it was quite natural that the experimenter would take his mosquito to a well-marked yellow-fever case more than three days old, and she would fail to become infected when she bit.

This was trap No. 1, and if by good luck the experimenter escaped it and hit on a patient in the first three days, what would he do next? Naturally he would take the mosquito to the volunteer who agreed to be bitten, with as little loss of time as possible, for captive mosquitoes in jars and test tubes are delicate creatures and apt to die, or to be eaten by ants, or escape. So those who missed trip No. 1 were caught by trap No. 2 and, as we have said, none of Doctor Finlay's experiments got by both of them, nor did our board's at first.

Finlay's theory was, as Gorgas once said to me, "a wonderful instance of scientific clairvoyance."

Reed was called back to the United States during the first week in August on account of the death of Doctor Shakespeare, to put in order the manuscripts of the typhoid-fever board and the experiments began in his absence.

They fed the supposedly infected mosquitoes every few days by letting them bite the arm of a member of the board or a volunteer, and these were not difficult to find among the young doctors and orderlies at the post hospital. On August 27 Lazear took his mosquitoes to Las Animas Hospital to be fed on yellow-fever patients, but one of them refused to bite. It happened that this insect had bitten a man in the second day of fever 12 days before and was thus past both traps and was what we came to call "loaded"; but this fact was not then appreciated. As the insect appeared to be weak and liable to die, Carroll offered to feed it on his arm and did so. On the 30th Carroll felt badly and had a chill. He was thought to have malaria, and no one thought of yellow fever until the symptoms of that disease were apparent. Carroll thought so little of the mosquito bite and was so far from regarding it as a scientific experiment that he went into the infected zone and even into the post-mortem room, where Agramonte was conducting an autopsy on a yellow fever case. This greatly vexed Reed when he returned and heard of it, as it vitiated to a large extent the value of the case as an experiment. When Carroll's diagnosis became clear, Lazear and Agramonte were greatly troubled but determined to verify the virulence of this mosquito by putting her on the first volunteer who presented himself. A young soldier of the Seventh Cavalry, Pvt. William H. Dean, came by the laboratory soon after they had agreed to do this (August 31) and readily agreed to feed the mosquitoes. He became sick five days later, and as he had been in the quarantined camp all the time and so could not have acquired yellow fever in any other way, the demonstration of mosquito conveyance was perfect. A little later Lazear was bitten while feeding his mosquitoes in a yellow-fever ward by a mosquito not of his flock, and died September 25 after a few days' suffering of yellow fever in its most malignant form. His case as a demonstration was of even less value than Carroll's as he had been in frequent contact with cases of yellow fever. Such were the conditions when Reed returned from the United States a few days after Lazear's death. The three cases, especially that of Dean, convinced him, and he determined to hasten back to the United States to report these cases to the American Public Health Association and also to consult the Surgeon General and his wise mentor, Doctor Welch, as to the next steps to be taken, for it was evident that this small and imperfectly controlled series of cases was not sufficient to convince the medical profession and the general public.

I had at that time returned from a short sick leave in the States and was chief surgeon at Gen. Fitzhugh Lee's headquarters. When Reed mentioned to me on October 11 his intention to go to Habana next day to get General Wood's permission to go to the United States, I offered to get transportation and take him down. Accordingly, through the courtesy of the adjutant general, Major Michie, I got permission to use General Lee's fine horses and carriage, and so we drove down in great style. When we were on the road I urged him to ask General Wood for a considerable sum of money to pay the expenses of a series of experiments and give liberal bonuses to Spanish immigrants, who I was sure could be induced in that way to volunteer, especially as they came to Cuba with always the probability of having yellow fever. He did not commit himself as to what he would do, and I awaited the interview with keen interest.

General Wood received us graciously, as he knew us both well and had taken a course of study under Reed. They stood facing each other in the embrasure of a window of the palace looking out on the Plaza de las Armas and to me, a silent observer, it was a most dramatic scene with all the setting of a great historic moment. Looking out between them I could see Morro Castle and the blue waters of the harbor and on our left the ancient Fort la Fuerza, built by the gallant De Soto before he sailed northward to find his grave in the turbid current of the Mississippi. The two men offered a singular contrast in their appearance. General Wood, massive, leonine, impassive; Reed, slender, alert, with mobile features and sparkling blue eyes as he told the story of the three cases and summed up the evidence. Then, after a moment's pause, he said very earnestly, "General Wood, will you give me $10,000 to continue and complete these experiments?" General Wood's reply came almost without hesitation—"I have this morning signed a warrant for that amount to aid the police in the capture of criminals, and surely this work is of more importance to Cuba than the catching of a few thieves. I will give you $10,000 and if that proves insufficient I will give you $10,000 more."

We said good day to the military governor and with joyous hearts betook ourselves to the Paris restaurant, where we celebrated this happy outcome with a good luncheon, and I pledged his success and future fame with a bottle of Rioja Clarete.

Next day Reed sailed for New York and read his paper before the American Public Health Association on October 24. There he encountered Wasdin full of his demonstration that B. sanarelli was its cause and that it was transmitted through the respiratory channel like measles or grippe. The clash was sharp, bitter, and personal on Wasdin's part, courteous and impersonal on Reed's, but conclusive that the organism which had led Wasdin and the rest of the world astray was common in the Tropics and was simply accidentally present in the bodies of some cases, and it was in fact a member of the hog-cholera group of bacteria.

Reed did not linger to enjoy his victory, and four days later he was back in Cuba eager to take up the work with all the facilities which General Wood's financial and moral support placed in his hands.

When Reed applied for the promised money General Wood told him that he would place it for disbursement in Kean's hands, as he was an officer permanently on duty there and Reed would be saved the worry of it. So this was done, and I acquired in a subordinate and business way a connection with this famous board.

The building of his experimental station, Camp Lazear, where the tests should be made, was at once begun, and Spanish immigrants were readily found who for a handsome sum were willing to be bitten by the "little flies," and if they were taken sick to be nursed by the señoritas Americanas, as they called the nurses. A most dramatic episode of this period was the volunteering of Moran and Kissinger to be the first victims of the experimentation. Kissinger was in fact the first case—a noble offer which has been often and fully told. These were followed by other American soldiers from the Hospital Corps, so that between the Americans and the Spaniards the supply of subjects for experiment was ample. The Spaniards furnished Reed much amusement, especially a jolly young Spaniard peasant named Antonio Benigno, but whom Reed called Boniato, which means a sweet potato, on account of his fondness for that vegetable. His contract with Reed in Spanish, signed by both, hangs on the wall of my office. He was first to recover, and when I took his reward to him I got it in ten $20 gold pieces. The poor Spaniard had never seen such great coins or so much money, and his joy was that of a child with a new toy.

The revolting test of the infected clothing and bedding by Dr. Robert P. Cook—Virginian, by the way—and his six privates of the Hospital Corps, who slept in them by twos for 60 successive nights, was another heroic episode. All this makes it a wonderful and thrilling story, which is well told in Kelly's admirable work.

Suffice it to say that his demonstrations carried conviction with them to the physicians of Habana, who had remained incredulous during the 20 years that Dr. Carlos Finlay had been laboring to convince them with arguments and experiments of this very thing. So then they bethought themselves of this dear old man who was at the head of the yellow-fever board, and 60 doctors of Habana gave him a dinner to celebrate the verification of the Finlay theory.

Dr. Juan Guiteras, who died this year in Habana, presided, and as I recollect the military governor sat on one side of him and Doctor Finlay on the other. Reed, Carroll, and Agramonte were there and Gorgas and I and perhaps other medical officers. Guiteras, with his musical voice and admirable diction, undertook to divide the honors between Finlay and Reed. He compared this work to the demonstration that the Anopheles mosquito carried malaria, which had been published by Ross two years before. Finlay was like Patrick Manson, who propounded the theory, and Reed was like Ross, who demonstrated it so that it was accepted by the scientific world. We all agreed that the simile was a good one and the division of credit just. But as the years have passed and the fame of Walter Reed has spread to all corners of the world our Cuban friends have come to feel that Finlay has not had his share. They do not realize that it is to the demonstrator and not to the theorist that the world of science gives the highest place.

About the time that Doctor Finlay made the first announcement of his theory a distinguished physician of Washington, Dr. A. F. A. King, read a remarkable paper before the Philosophical Society, which was afterwards published in the Popular Science Monthly, entitled "Insects and disease—Mosquitoes and malaria," in which he pronounced his theory that malaria was carried by mosquitoes and gave 19 good epidemiological reasons in support of his theory. But it remained a barren theory, although it had later the powerful support of the father of tropical medicine, Patrick Manson, until Ross furnished the demonstration. Although Doctor King was loved and admired in Washington, as was Finlay in Habana, no one that I have heard has raised the cry that he has been robbed of the fame and credit that is due him, as the Cubans have recently done in an official publication in the case of Doctor Finlay. Goldberger, of the Public Health Service, has stated the case in one pithy sentence, "Reed has converted a discredited theory into an established doctrine."

My remarks have already taken too much time for me to make even a brief estimate of the value of Reed's work, or of the vast sum of human suffering and loss of life from this terrible plague which he made it possible to bring to an end. Professor Welch said of it in a letter to the Secretary of War:

"Doctor Reed's researches in yellow fever are by far the most important contributions to science which have ever come from an Army surgeon. In my judgment, they are the most valuable contributions to medicine and public hygiene which have ever been made in this country with the exception of the discovery of anæsthesia. They have led and will lead to the saving of untold thousands of lives. I am in a position to know that the credit for the original ideas embodied in this work belong wholly to Major Reed. Such work, if done in Europe, would receive substantial recognition from the government."

General Wood, whose recent death we still mourn, said:

"I know of no man on this side of the world who has done so much for humanity as Doctor Reed. His discovery results in the saving of more lives annually than were lost in the Cuban war, and saves the commercial interests of the world from a greater financial loss each year than the cost of the Cuban war. * * * Hereafter it will never be possible for yellow fever to gain such headway that quarantine will exist from the mouth of the Potomac to the mouth of the Rio Grande. Future generations will appreciate fully the value of Doctor Reed's services. His was the originating, directing, and controlling mind in this work and the others were assistants only."

It was stated in a recent biography of General Gorgas that Reed, when his demonstration was complete, did not know what to do with it, that he did not see how mosquitoes could be successfully fought, and that his attitude in the first months of 1901 was one of pessimism and depression.

Nothing could be further from the truth. His letter to Dr. L. O. Howard, Chief of the Bureau of Entomology, at Washington, on January 13, 1901, rings with joyful anticipation, and in it he says "with Howard and kerosene we will soon knock out old Culex fasciatus" (the name applied at that time to the yellow-fever-bearing mosquito).

In the paper which he read to the Pan American Congress held in Habana on February 4 the tenth conclusion is:

"The spread of yellow fever can be most effectually controlled by measures directed to the destruction of mosquitoes and the protection of the sick against the bites of these insects."

This was written at a time when Gorgas, according to his own statement, still was in doubt whether this was the only way or even the common way in which yellow fever was spread.

Such claims grievously misrepresent Gorgas. Between Reed and Gorgas, I am glad to say, there was never any rivalry or any feeling but the most cordial friendship and confidence. Their relation as they saw it was well expressed in a letter from Gorgas to Reed, dated from Habana August 26, 1901, in which he said:

"I am very happy to shine in the more humble rôle of being the first to put your discovery to extensive practical application."

The fame of Gorgas is secure in the performance of the greatest feat of sanitary administration that the world has seen. That of Reed is admirably stated in the citation of President Eliot, of Harvard University, which is the epitaph on Reed's tomb—

"He gave to man control of that dreadful scourge, yellow fever."

We here to-day may make for Walter Reed the proud boast of the Roman poet:

"Exegi monumentum aere perennius."

He has indeed "built a monument more lasting than bronze and loftier than the pyramids of kings, which neither storms, nor winds, nor the immeasurable flight of time can destroy."

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The Speaker laid before the House the following messages from the President of the United States, which were read, and, with the accompanying papers, were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed:

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 3470. An act granting relief of Havert S. Sealy and Porteus R. Burke;
